ADVERTISEMENT BY THE PUBLISHER.

In the previous Editions of this invaluable Commentary, the Annotations were printed without the Sacred Text, thus rendering it a mere book of reference for the study. In this Edition, the Text is placed at the head of each page, as in other Commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, thus adapting it to general use both in the family and the closet. The Publisher hopes, by this improvement, undertaken at a very considerable increase of expense, to find his advantage in a much wider circulation of the work than it has heretofore obtained.

“TABLE OF AUTHORS CITED AND REFERRED TO IN THIS COMMENTARY.”
Having been persuaded to put together some scattered notes, which I long ago made upon several places of Holy Scripture, I began the last year to consider some texts in the book of Genesis; where I soon found there would be a necessity of making an entire commentary, upon a good part of it: and therefore I resolved to go through the whole, in the same manner as I had done the three first chapters.

After I had finished the better half of my work, I was informed that Mons. Le Clerc had published a Critical Commentary upon the same book: but whether I have concurred in any thing with him, or contradicted him, I am not able to say; having wanted leisure to peruse his work, by reason of the public business, which came upon me in the end of the year: when I likewise understood that a very learned friend and brother had put into the press Annotations upon all the five books of Moses. But by communicating some of our papers to each other, we found there would be no reason that either of us should lay aside our design; but go on, in our several ways, to make the scriptures better understood, by all sorts of persons: for all helps are little enough in this age, which seems to take pleasure in being ignorant of the most important truths.

In which we are so particularly instructed by Moses, as by no other author, nor by all the authors that are, or have been known to be, extant in the world. For to him we owe the knowledge of the beginning of the world; of the first parents of mankind; the inventors of arts; the original of nations; the founders of kingdoms and empires; the institution of laws; the fountain of religious rites; yea, of all the ancient mythology; and, which is most considerable, the means of propagating that sense of God and of religion, which mankind brought into the world with them; and how it came to be corrupted.

There have been those who have taken the liberty to say, that it is impossible to give any tolerable account of the creation of the world in six days; of the situation of Paradise; the fall of our first parents by the seduction of a serpent, &c. But I hope I have made it appear, there is no ground for such presumptuous words; but very good reason to believe every thing that Moses hath related: without forsaking the literal sense, and betaking ourselves to I know not what allegorical interpretations. Particularly, I find the truth of what I have noted concerning Paradise very much confirmed by a learned and judicious discourse of Mons. Huetius; which I did not meet withal till I had made an end of these Commentaries: but then took a review of what I had written, and found cause to correct what I had noted out of Mr. Carver, concerning the spring of Tigris and Euphrates. I might also have given a clearer account of the Deluge, if I had observed some things which are come to my notice since these papers went to the press: but I hope I have said enough to evince that it is not so incredible as some have pretended. For, having made the largest concessions concerning the height of the highest mountains, which, according to the old opinion, I have allowed may be thirty miles high, Gen. vii. 19 (whereas if, instead of thirty, I had said not above three perpendicular, I had had the best of the modern philosophers to defend me), it appears there might be water enough to cover the loftiest of them, as Moses hath related; whose account of the families by whom the earth was peopled after the flood, is so surprisingly agreeable to all the records that remain in any language, of the several nations of the earth, that it carries with it an uncontrollable evidence of his sincerity and truth, as well as of his admirable universal knowledge. For, as there is no writer that hath given us an account of so many nations, and so remote, as he hath done, so he hath not satisfied himself with naming them, but acquainted us with their original, and told us at what time, and from what place, and on what occasion, they were dispersed into far distant countries; and this with such brevity, that he hath informed us of more in one chapter than we can find in the great volumes of all other authors: having shown us from whom all those people descended, who are spread over the face of the earth, from the Caspian and Persian sea, to Hercules' pillars (as the ancients speak); that is, all the world over.

In short, whatsoever is most ancient in those countries, which are farthest from all commerce with his own, is clearly explained by Moses; whose writings therefore cannot but be highly valued by all those who will apply their minds seriously to the study of them. For if they, who have now no regard to him, would but compare what he hath written on the forenamed subject, with what they find in those heathen writers, whom they have in the greatest veneration, they would be forced to confess him to be a man of wonderful understanding; and could not reasonably doubt he had an exact knowledge of the truth of those things whereof he wrote. To this purpose, I remember, the famous Bochartus speaks; who hath given the greatest light to the tenth of Genesis, wherein these things are delivered.

And truly, it is some wonder, that they who so much cry up the Egyptian learning, should not easily grant (unless they will believe all historians but only those whom we account sacred) that Moses must needs be qualified, even without the help of divine revelation (which he certainly had), to write both of their original, and of all those who were related to them: being bred up in their country; nay, in their court, till he was forty years old; and well versed in all the wisdom that was to be found among them, Acts vii. 22. Which wisdom of theirs, I doubt not, was much augmented by Abraham's living among them (as I have observed upon xiii. 2), but especially by Joseph's long government of that country, for the space of eighty years: who was endued with such an incomparable spirit, that the wisest men among them learnt of him; for he "taught their senators wisdom," Ps. cv. 22. And, in like manner, Moses lived forty years more among the Midianites, where, it appears by Jethro, there wanted not persons of great knowledge. And from thence he might easily be instructed in all that the Arabians knew: who were no mean people (it appears by the story of Job and his three friends, and Elihu, who is supposed by some to have written that admirable book), and were near neighbours to the most famous nations of the eastern countries: from whom, it is evident by this history, all learning, arts, and sciences, originally came.

April 10, 1694.
THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES,
CALLED
GENESIS.

That Moses wrote this and the four following books hath been so constantly believed, both by Jews, Christians, and heathens, that none, I think, denied it, till Aben Ezra (a Jewish doctor, who lived not much above five hundred years ago) raised some doubts about it, in his Notes upon the First of Deuteronomy, out of twelve passages in these books themselves: which he pretended could not be his, but the words of a later author. But when I meet with those places, I shall make it appear that all such exceptions are very frivolous, and ought not to shake our belief of this truth, that these five books were penned by Moses, and nobody else.

The first is called Genesis, because it contains the history of the creation of the world, with which it begins; and the genealogy of the patriarchs, down to the death of Joseph, where it ends. It comprehends a history of two thousand three hundred and sixty-nine years, or thereabouts: the truth of all which it was not difficult for Moses to know, because it came down to his time through but a very few hands. For from Adam to Noah, there was one man (Methuselah) who lived so long as to see them both. And so it was from Noah to Abraham: Shem conversed with both. As Isaac did with Abraham and Joseph; from whom these things might easily be conveyed to Moses, by Amram, who lived long enough with Joseph. In short, Moses might have been confused, if he had written any thing but the truth, by learned men of other nations, who sprang from the same root, and had the like means of being acquainted with the great things here reported by tradition from their forefathers; who lived so long in the beginning of the world, that they more certainly transmitted things to their posterity. Besides, it is not reasonable to think, they had not the use of writing as we have, whereby they conveyed the knowledge of times foregoing to those that came after.

CHAPTER I.

1 The creation of heaven and earth, 3 of the light, 6 of the firmament, 9 of the earth separated from the waters, 11 and made fruitful, 14 of the sun, moon, and stars, 20 of fish and fowl, 24 of beasts and cattle, 26 of man in the image of God. 29 Also the appointment of food.

1 In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1. [In the beginning] The world is not eternal; but had a beginning, as all philosophers acknowledged before Aristotle. So he himself informs us, (lib. i. de Caelo, cap. 2, speaking of the ancient opinions concerning the original of the world) ἐνίκατος ὦν ἐκ συγκηρύζοντος, they all say it had a beginning; but some thought it might have no end; others judged it to be corruptible.

God created.] He who is eternal gave a being to this great fabric of heaven and earth out of nothing. It is observed by Eusebius (in the beginning of his book De Prepar. Evang. p. 31, 35, Edit. Paris), that neither the ancient historians, nor the philosophers, do so much as mention God, ὁ παθὴς ἡμῶν; no, not so far as to name him, when they write of the beginning of the world. But this Divine lawgiver designing to hang the whole frame of his polity upon piety towards God, and to make the Creator of all the founder of his laws, begins with him. Not after the manner of the Egyptians and Phœnicians, who bestowed this adorable name upon a great multitude; but he puts in the front of his work the name of the sole Cause of all things, the Maker of whatsoever is seen or unseen. As if he had told the Hebrew nation, that he who gave them the law contained in these books was the King and Lawgiver of the whole world; which was, like a great city, governed by him. Whom therefore he would have their look upon, not only as the enactor of their laws; but of those also which all nature obeys. See lib. vii. de Prepar. Evang. cap. 9, 10; and lib. xii. cap. 16.

The heaven and the earth.] The Hebrew particle א֤ת put before both heaven and earth, signifies as much as with, if Maimonides understood it aright; and makes the sense to be this: He created the heavens with all things in the heavens, and the earth with all things in the earth; as his words are in More Neochim, p. ii. cap. 30. Certain it is, these two words heaven and earth comprehend the whole visible world. Some would have the angels comprehended in the word heaven; as particularly Ephraimus (Hær. xxxix. 15, ed. Antony), and others. But others of the fathers are of a different opinion, as Pætavius observes. It is a pretty conceit of Theophilus Antiochenus (lib. ii. ad Autolycum), that the heavens are mentioned before the earth, to show that God’s works are not like ours: for he begins at the top, we at the bottom; that is, he first makes the fixed stars and all beyond them (so I take the word heaven here to signify), for they had a beginning, as well as this lower world, though they do not seem to be comprehended in the six days’ work, which relates only to this planetary world, as I may call it, which hath the sun for its centre. And thus Philo understood the first wordberechith, in the beginning, to mean the earth, as well as the heavens, which God began his creation with the heavens, as the most noble body, and then proceeded to the earth; an account of which follows.

Ver. 2.] Some connect this verse with the foregoing, by translating the first verse in this manner: When God first created, or began to create, the heaven and the earth, the earth was without form, &c. That is, at first he only created a rude matter of those things, which afterwards were fashioned as we now see them.

Without form.] A confused, indigested heap, without any order or shape.

And void.] Having no beasts, nor trees, nor herbs, nor any thing else, wherewith we now behold it adorned.

So these two words, tohu vabohu, are used in Scripture, where we meet with them (which is not often) for confusion and emptiness (Isa. xxxiv. 11; Jerem. iv. 23), being a description of that which the ancients called the Chaos (of which the Barbarians had a notion, no less than the Greeks), wherein the seeds and principles of all things were blended together. This Chaos is called, in the pagan language, by Epicharmus, παράθυρον θεών, the first of the gods; because all things sprang out of this; which was indeed the first of the works of God, who, as Moses shows in the sequel, produced this beautiful world out of this chaos.

Darkness was upon the face of the deep.] Nothing was the effect of light; which lay buried, as all things else did, in that great abyss, or vast confused heap of matter, before mentioned. So the Hebrew word TEHM (which we translate deep) signifies tumult and turbid confusion; the first matter being very heterogeneous, as they speak, i.e. of various sorts and kinds, huddled together without distinction.

And the Spirit of God moved.] Men have been extremely fneculous in the exposition of these plain words: some understanding, by the Spirit of God, the sun, which gives spirit and life to all things upon earth; others, the air, or the wind; when as yet there was no sun in the firmament, nor any wind that could stir, without the power of the Almighty to excite it. This to me alone, where these words stood to be meant: the infinite wisdom and power of God, which made a vehement commotion, and mighty fermentation (by raising, perhaps, a great wind) upon the face of the waters i.e. on that fluid matter before mentioned, to separate the parts of it one from the other.

3 And God said, Let there be light: and there was light.

Waters.] That which Moses before called the deep, he now calls the waters; which plainly shows that some parts of the confused mass were fluid and light, as other parts were solid and heavy. The heavy naturally sunk, which he calls the earth; and the lighter parts got above them, which he calls the waters; for it is clearly intimated the waters were underneath. The word appeared, signifies literally brooded upon the waters, as a hen doth upon her eggs.

So the ancient and modern interpreters have observed: and Morinus, who opposes it, hath said nothing to make us doubt of this sense of the phrase. From whence some have, not unhappily, conjectured, the ancients took their notion of a σαρκίτων ὄρνη, a fresh-laid egg, out of which all things were formed: that is, the chaos (out of which all the old philosophers, before Aristotle, thought the world was produced) consisting of earth and water, of thicker and thinner parts, as an egg doth of the yolk and white.

Now the Spirit of God thus moved upon the waters, that it might proceed to the earth. For the earth was then (as we may also see), it might not only separate, as I said, those parts which were jumbled together; but give a vivific virtue to them, to produce what was contained in them. The souls and spirits, that is of all living creatures, were produced by the Spirit of God, as Porphyry saith Numenius understood it. For his opinion, he tells us, was, that all things come out of the water, Νεωπόρας, and that water was joined with these words of the prophet, as he called Moses. See Porphyry παρά τού Νουφ. Ἀντίγονον on these words of Homer:

Which gives us to understand, that the spirits of all living creatures (which we call a ψυχή ὄρνη) did not arise out of matter, for that is stupid; but proceeded from this other principle, the powerful Spirit of God, which moved upon the face of the waters, by a vital energy (as St. Chrysostom speaks), so that they were no longer standing waters, but motion, having ξενικεῖν ταύτα διήμορον, a certain living power in them. For we may see, that the spirits of living creatures are distinct things from matter, which of itself cannot move at all, and much less produce a principle of motion.

And thus indeed all the ancient philosophers apprehended this matter: and some of them have most lively expressed it. For Laertius in the Life of Anaxagoras tells us, that he taught, among other things, Παρὰ τοῦτον εἰς τῷ ἐκείνους Νεωπόρας τὸν οὐκ ἔχοντα ἐκ τῆς διημορώσας, all things were huddled together: and then the Mind came and set them in order. And Thales before him (as Tully informs, lib. de Nat. Deor.), Aqua dixit esse initium rerum; Deum autem eam mentem quâe ex aqua cuncta fingere t, said, "Water was the beginning of things; and God that Mind, which forms all things out of the water." By the Spirit of God some of the ancient Jews have understood the Spirit of the Messiah (as Harkspan observes in his Cabala Judaica, n. lxvi. out of Baal Hatturim, the Hierusalem Targum, &c.), which explains the evangelist, St. John, who in the beginning of his Gospel says, all things were made by the eternal AÔTÔS, or Ο&omicron;ρώδιος God (the same with the Nous of the ancient philosophers), whose almighty Spirit agitated the vast confused mass of matter, and put it into form.

Ver. 3. And God said.] These words are taken notice of by Longinus, παρὰ όρνης, as a truly lofty 4 And God saw the light, that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness. 5 And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

CHAPTER I.

6 | And God said, Let there be a firmament to be the instrument of rarefaction, separation, and all the rest of the operations, which were necessary to mould it into such creatures, as were afterwards made out of it. Divided the light from the darkness.] Appointed that they should constantly succeed one another; as we see they do now, that this light is inabodied in the sun; and as they did then, by the circular motion of this first light of fire, round about the chaos, in the space of twenty-four hours: which made it day to those parts where it shone; and night, where it did not. It is the instrument of fire, by which God, the former of all things; who, by making this light move round about the chaos, still more prepared and exalted the remaining indigested parts of matter for their several uses.

Ver. 5.] He settled them (that is) in such a constant course, that it gave them these distinct names.

And the evening and the morning were the first day.] In the Hebrew language, evening and morning signify a whole day; which the motion of this light made, if we conceive it to have been formed about noon, and to have gone round the forementioned heap of matter in twenty-four hours.

How long all things continued in mere confusion, after the elements were created, before this light was extracted out of it, we are not told. It might be (for any thing that is here revealed) a great while; and all that time the mighty Spirit was making such motions in it, as prepared, disposed, and ripened every part of it, for such productions as were to appear successively in such spaces of time, as are here and afterwards mentioned by Moses; who informs us, that after things were so digested, and made ready (by long fermentations, perhaps) to be wrought into form, God produced every day, for six days together, some creature or other, till all was finished; of which light which was the very first. This Maimonides hath very happily illustrated, in his More Nevuchim, p. ii. c. 30; where, observing that all things were made by God, and that these afterwards separated one from another successively, he says, their wise men resemble this proceeding to that of a husbandman, who sows several seeds in the earth at the same moment; some of which are to come up after one day, others after two, and others not till three days be past; though the whole sowing was one and the same moment. Thus God made all things at the first, which did not appear together; but, in the space of six days, were formed and put in order one after another; light being the work of the first day.

Ver. 6.] The next thing that God commanded to come forth of the chaos, was the air; particularly that region next to us, wherein the fowls fly, as it is explained afterwards. (ver. 30.) The Hebrew word רוח, properly signifies a body expanded, or spread forth (as may be seen in Exod. xxxix. 3; Isai. xL 19; Jer. x. 9; where it can have no other meaning); but it is by the LXX. translated στερεωμα, and from thence by us, firmament; because the air, though vastly extended and fluid, yet continues firm and stable in its place.

In the midst of the waters,] This region of the air manifestly parts the waters above it in the clouds from those below it here upon earth; the one of which waters bears a good proportion, and is in some measure equal unto the other: for there are vast treasures of water in the clouds; from whence the waters here below, in springs and rivers, are supplied. This in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

7 And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so.
8 And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.
9 ¶ And God said, Let the waters under the appeared afterwards in the deluge, which was partly made by continued rains for many days. The great objection against this exposition is, that now there were no clouds, neither had it, after this, rained on the earth. (Gen. ii. 6.) But it must be considered, that neither were the waters below as yet gathered into one place: and therefore Moses here speaks of the air, as a body intended to be stretched between the waters above and beneath, when they should be formed together.

That the clouds above are called waters in the Scripture language, is plain enough from Psalm civ. 3; Jer. x. 13; and other places.

Ver. 7.] What his Divine will ordered, his power effected, by that light which rolled about the chaos, and that heat which was excited within it; whereby such vapours were raised, and spread over the called earth, that it had the name of heaven, to distinguish it from the other. So all above the earth is called, as appears by the following part of the chapter, in the verses now mentioned. And that is the very import of the word shammaim, which in the Arabic language (as Aben Ezra observes) signifies height, or altitude.

This was the work of another whole day. Conceived which is commonly noted, that it is not said of this, as of all the works of the other five days, "God saw that it was good." What the reason of this should be, is inquired by all interpreters; and the most solid account that I can find of it is this:—that the waters mentioned upon this day, were not yet formed and distinguished from the earth; and, therefore, in the next day's work, when he did gather the waters together (ver. 10), and when he commanded the earth (which was become dry) to bring forth (ver. 12), these words, "God saw that it was good," are twice repeated. Which made Pichercillus and Ger. Vossius think the two next verses (9, 10) belonged to the second day's work; and that the first word of the ninth verse should be thus translated, "And God had said, Let the waters under the heaven," &c. And so the words in the end of the tenth verse, "God saw that it was good," relate to the second day. Lib. ii. de Orig. Idolol. c. 67.

Ver. 9. ¶ And God said, Let the waters] All the waters, which continued mixed with the earth, and covered the surface of it.

Be gathered together.] Collected into one body by themselves.

And let the dry land appear.] Distinct and separate from the waters.

There being such large portions of matter drawn out of the chaos, as made the body of fire and air, and water are excluded, there remained, in a great body, only water and earth; but they were so jumbled together, that they could not be distinguished. It was the work therefore of the third day to make a separation between them, by which meaning of course all the particles which make the earth, which before was mud and dirt: and then, by raising it above the waters, which covered its supericiles (as the Psalmist also describes this work, Psalm civ. 6); and, lastly, by making such caverns in it, as were sufficient to receive the waters into them. Now this we may conceive to have been done by such particles of fire as were left from the temples of the elements, whereby such nitro-sulphureous vapours were kindled, as made an earthquake; which both lifted up the earth, and also made receptacles for the waters to run into; as the Psalmist (otherwise I should not venture to mention this) seems in the forementioned place to illustrate it (Psalm civ. 7), where he says, "At thy rebuke they flew as smoke: and up to the skies were the noise of thy thunder as thou hasted away." And so God himself speaks (Job xxxviii. 10), "I brake up for it (i. e. for the sea) my decreed place, and set bars and doors." Histories also tell us, of mountains that have been, in several ages, lifted up by earthquakes; may, islands in the midst of the sea; which confirms this conjecture, that the waters were, as it were, thrown back by this means; and so separated, that they should not return to cover the earth: for the word, in the beginning of this verse, which we translate gathered, comes from kar, which signifies a square, a rule, or perpendicular line; and therefore denotes they were most exactly collected, and so poised in such just proportions, that they should not again overshadow the dry land, whereby many of the interpreters.

This work of God (whereby the waters were sent down into their proper channels, and the earth made dry, and fitted for the habitation of such creatures as were afterwards created) is observed by Strabo in his Geography as an act of Divine Providence. (Lib. xvi.) Because, says he, the water covered the earth, and man is not θερσις ζων, a creature that can live in the water, God made δύο πέτρες και σατύρος, &c. and many cavities and receptacles in the earth for the water; and raised the earth above it, that it might be fit for man's habitation.

Ver. 10.] This is sufficiently explained, by what has been said upon verses 5 and 6: only this may be added, that the word crete, earth, in Arabic signifies any thing that is low and sunk beneath, opposite to shammaim, heavens, which, in that language, as I noted before, signifies high and lifted up.

Ver. 11.] Rather, it should be translated, and the herb yielding, &c. though the copula be omitted, which is usual in Scripture; particularly in Habek. iii. 11, "the sun, moon," i.e. the sun and moon, herbs, bearing a seed, which comprehends (as Abarinell here notes) all sort of corn, and whatsoever is sown.
and trees, which also bear fruit. There are several kinds of all these; which some have cast into eighteen, others into six-and-thirty classes; none of which could at the first spring out of the earth, of itself, by the power of external and internal heat, and of the water mixed with it, (no, not so much as a single pile of grass) without the almighty power and wisdom of God; who brought together those parts of matter, which were fitted to produce them; and then formed every one of them, and determined their several species; and also provided for their continuance, by bringing forth seed to propagate their species to the end. And it was very wonderful, how God had secured the seeds of all plants with singular care; some of them being defended by a double, nay, a treble inclosure.

Ver. 12. And the earth brought forth grass.] These things did not grow up out of seed, by such a long process as is now required to bring them to maturity; but they must grow up immediately in the space of a day, with their seeds in them, completely formed, to produce the like throughout all generations. Thus Moses gives a plain account of the first production of things, according to the natural method: for supposing they had a beginning, the herb and the tree must naturally be before the seed they bear, as the horn is before the sheep. But it is a still more remarkable question, which was first (as some of the philosophers did) very frivolous; because that Power which alone could produce the seeds of all things, could as easily make the things themselves, with a power to propagate their kind by seed.

It is therefore most judiciously noted by Abarbinel, a learned Jew, that the production of plants, in the beginning, differed from what it is in their formation; in these two things: first, That they have sprung ever since out of seed, either sown by us, or falling from the plants themselves; but, at the beginning, were brought out of the earth, with their seed in them to propagate them ever after. And, secondly, They need now, as they have done since the first creation, the influence of the sun, to make them sprout; but then they came forth by the power of God, before there was any sun, which was not formed till the next day. Of this last Theophrastus Antiochenus, long before Abarbinel, took notice (lib. ii. ad Autolycum), where he says, God produced things in this order; foreseeing the vanity of philosophers, who, saying nothing of Him, made all things, and produced them in the same order, "as out of the elements." Porphyry himself also, (lib. ii. πολλα ποιηματα, &c.) observes out of Theophrastus, that the earth brought forth trees and herbs before beasts. διός, μεν γαρ ἐν τοις πρώτοις ἐπωνομαζομένοις, &c. which Eusebius remembers in his Praep. Evangel. lib. i. cap. 9, p. 28.

Ver. 14. Let there be lights!] This is a different word from what we had, ver. 3; signifying, as Paulus Fagus observes, that which is made out of light; luminous bodies, whereby light is communicatid to us: the Hebrew particle, men, before a word, being used to express the instrument of an action. And so now we are to conceive, that the light produced at first, having for three days circulated about the earth, and that near unto it, to further the production of the things before mentioned, was on this fourth day distributed into several luminaries, at a great distance from the earth. So it follows—in the firmament of heaven, in the upper region, which we call the ether, or sky, where the sun and the planets are placed. To divide the day from the night.] By a continued circular motion, finished in four-and-twenty hours; in one part of which, by the presence of the sun, the day is made: and, in the other part, by the sun's absence, night is made, in a constant succession.

For signs and for seasons.] That is, for signs of the times or seasons. For Venus expounds it, by the figure of νυξ δεως. And by times are meant, the spring, summer, autumn, and winter; and, by consequence, the seasons for ploughing, sowing, planting, pruning, reaping, vintage, sailing, &c.—I. de Scientiis Matemat. cap. 38.

And for days and years.] By a speedy swift motion round, for twenty-four hours, to make days; and by a slower, longer motion, to make years: and a grateful variety of seasons, in the several parts of the earth, which by this annual motion are all visited by the sun's beams.

Ver. 15. And let them be for lights, &c.] i. e. Let them there continue to give constant light and warmth to the earth throughout the year

Ver. 16. And God made two great lights.] It is observable that nothing is said to have been created since the first matter, out of which all things were made or formed. And the two great lights, or luminaries, enlighteners (as the word signifies) are the sun, which enlightens by day; and the moon, which enlightens us by night. The moon, indeed, is not so great as the rest of the planets: (for it is the least of all, except Mercury,) but it affords the greatest light to us, by reflecting the beams of the sun to us in its absence; and thereby very much abating the disconsolate darkness of the night.

He made the stars also.] That is, the rest of the planets, and their attendants.

Ver. 17. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven, &c.] By the repetition of this so often, Moses intended to fix in the people's mind this notion—that though the heavenly bodies be very glorious, yet they are but creatures, made by God, and set or appointed by his order to give us light; and, therefore, He alone is to be worshipped, not they.

It is commonly taken notice of, that there is no mention of the creation of angels in all this history; nor was there any need of it. For the ancient idolatry, consisting in the worship of the sun, moon, and stars (as appears from the very names of the most ancient idols in the Old Testament, such as Moloch, Ashteroth, and the like), which they believed to be eternal beings, the great design of Moses was to confute this opinion, by representing them over and over as the work of the eternal God, which struck at the very root of idolatry. The worship of angels was a later invention.

Ver. 18.] Some have fancied that the ancient idolatry sprung from this word rules; men looking upon these glorious lights as having a dominion over them.
night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good.

And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

20 And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

21 And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

22 And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth.

23 And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

24 And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and every part of them, very wonderful, especially in those parts whereby they are fitted to swim, and to fly, which demonstrate a most wise Agent, by whose infinite power they were so contrived, as to be able also to propagate their kind.

Ver. 21. [God created great whales.] The vastness of these creatures, perhaps, made Moses again use the word create (which he had not done since the beginning of the chapter); not because they were made as the chaos was, out of nothing; but because it required a greater power to make out of the precedent matter moving things of so huge a bulk, and of such great capacity, than it did in the chaos.

The Hebrew word tanin, which we translate whales, comprehends several sorts of great fishes, as Bochart observes in his Hierozoic. p. 1. lib. i. cap. 7, where he shows the prodigious bigness of some of them. But he should have added, that this word also signifies crocodiles, which he himself shows are set forth in Job xli, as the most astonishing work of God. For, Job Ludolphus, I think, hath demonstrated, that nothing but the crocodile can be meant by this word tanin, in Ezek. xxix. 3; and xxxii. 2, and some other places. Vid. lib. i. Comment. in Hister. Ethiop. cap. xii. n. 86.

God saw that it was good.] Was pleased with the structure of these several creatures: of the birds, who were furnished with wings to fly in the air; and of the fishes, whose fins serve them to swim in the water; and of water-fowl, whose feet are formed so, as to serve for the same use; and some of them (such as dive under water), covered so thick with feathers, and those so smooth and slippery (as the learned and pious Mr. Ray hath observed) that their bodies are thereby defended from the cold of the water, which cannot penetrate or moisten them. See Wisdom of God in the Creation, pt. i. p. 135.

Ver. 22. God blessed them, &c.] His blessing them was giving them a power to multiply and increase, till they had filled the water with fish, and the air with fowl, which required a particular care of Divine Providence, as Athanasius observes: because they do not bring forth young ones perfectly formed, as the beasts do, but lay their eggs in which they are formed, when they are out of their bodies. This, saith he, is a wonderful thing, that when the womb, as we may call it, is separate from the generat, a living creature like itself should be produced, which is the reason, he fancies, that a blessing is here pronounced upon them, and not on the beasts, that were made the next day. The ancient fathers are wont to observe, that the first blessing was given to the waters, as a type of baptism. Theophilus ad Autolyc. lib. ii. and Tertullian. de Baptismo, cap. 3.

And let fowl multiply in the earth.] There, for the most part, there move their habitation and their food, though some live upon the water.

Ver. 23.] See verse 19.

Ver. 24.] By a gradual process, the Divine Power produced creatures still more noble: the matter being more digested and prepared in five days' time than it was at first. I do not know whether there be any creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so.

25 And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

weight in the note of Abarbanel, who observes that Moses here uses a new word, which we translate bring forth, to show the difference between plants and animals. The former of which spring out of the earth indeed, but continue fixed in it, and perish if they be separated from it; whereas animals, though made out of the earth, and living upon it, have a separate existence, and do not still adhere to it.

Verse 25.] Three classes of living creatures are immediately mentioned, which were formed out of such matter as the earth afforded (not simple earth, we must understand, no more than before simple water; for it was impregnated with many other principles); the first of which, behemah, which we translate cattle, always signifies the flocks and herds of our language, and not only removed, as all which we translate in the end of the verse, beasts of the earth, that is, wild beasts: between which two, he mentions a third kind of living creatures on the earth, which he calls remesh—creeping things; because, whatever feet they have, they are so short and small, that they seem to the naked eye to have none at all. The word is therefore used here, not of reptiles, of which there are many sorts wherewith God hath replenished the earth: and of every kind, some vastly great, and others very little; as Abarbanel notes even among reptiles, there being serpents of a prodigious length, and other creeping things far smaller than ants.

Verse 26.] The earth did not bring them forth, by virtue of the influence of heaven upon prepared matter: but God framed them out of the matter so prepared, and produced them in their full perfection after their several kinds.

And God saw that it was good.] Was pleased with the great variety of these creatures, and their complete structure, fitting them for their several uses.

Ver. 26. Let us make men: and not only renewed man for the last of his works; but doth, as it were, advise and consult about his production. Not to signify any deliberation within himself, or any difficulty in the work; but to represent to us the dignity of man, and that he was made (as Abarbanel glosses) with admirable wisdom and great prudence. To the same purpose St. Chrysostom here speaks. And see Greg. Nyssen. de Opificio Hominis, cap. 3, and Orat. i. on these words; with Greg. Nazianzen. Orat. xliii. p. 699; who observes, that God brought him into this world, as into a noble palace, ready furnished with all manner of things; which is the notion also of Methodius; see Epiphanius Hares. Ixiv. n. 18. It is to be observed also, that God doth not say, "Let heaven before us bring forth (as ver. 21) of other animals; for the same reason: to represent man as a far more noble work, than any other upon earth: for though he was made (as we read in the next chapter) of the dust of the ground; yet a greater power and skill was employed in producing a creature of such beauty and majesty.

Let us. The ancient Christian looked upon this as a plain intimation of a plurality of persons in the Godhead: insomuch that Epiphanius says, "This is the language of God to his Word and only Begotten, as all the faithful believe." See Hares. xxiii. n. 2; and xliv. n. 4; and xlvi. n. 3, where he says, Adam was θεοσπασμενος εν γηι. Παρασε ειναι ως, και ωνων πνευματος, formed by the hand of the Father, and the Sun, and the Holy Ghost.] To which one cannot but incline, who considers how poorly the Jews expand this place; who fancy a kind of senate or council of angels, without whom God doth nothing (which they ground upon Dan. iv. 14); whereas, there is not the least signification as yet of any such beings; much less, that they had any hand in the making of man, who was not made in their image, but in the image of God. Of this, the Jews foolishly expanded these words, as Epiphanius informs us, in the forenamed Hares. p. 62. Edit. Paris. And Moses Germensinis still more foolishly imagines God spake to the earth, that it should bring forth man, as it had done other creatures: but Maimonides, who magnifies that saying of their masters (that God doth nothing without them), is of another opinion (More Nevox. p. ii. cap. 6), that it is not to be understood, as if he asked their advice, or was assisted by their judgment, but only that he used them as instruments in the producing of every thing, which is directly contrary to the very words, which are not in the form of a command, but of a consultation before they should be effectuated.

"Whence I find, after the manner of kings, who advise with their counsellors, but do things themselves; and are wont to speak in the plural number, when they declare their pleasure. But I take this to be a custom much later than the days of Moses, when they spake as the King of Egypt doth to Joseph: (Gen. xli. 41, 44) I am Pharaoh, and there is none that shall set up his stroke over the land of Egypt.

In which style the King of Persia writes long after this: (Ezra vi. 8) "I Darius make a decree."

All these poor shifts are a plain confession, that they found it very hard (as the Socinians do at this day) to give any account of this way of speaking, without granting a plurality of persons in the Godhead. And therefore Menasseh Ben Israel, in his Comment. on the Book of Esther, and the Sephardim, in general, mention one of their doctors, who, in Bereshith Rabbah, says, that when Moses by God's direction was about to write these words, "Let us make man," he cried out, "O Lord of the world, why wilt thou give men occasion to err about thy most simple unity!" To which he received this answer, "Write as I said thee; and if any man have me to err, let him err." The same story is told by Joseph Albo; which shows, that their doctors have been long puzzled with this manner of speech, which unavoidably suggested to their thoughts more than one person in the Deity; which, till they believe, they are at a loss what to say about it.

In our image, after our likeness.] Two words (some think) to express this sense of this phrase. At first, Abarbanel explains it, that the last words, after our likeness, give us to understand that man was not created properly and perfectly in the image of God; but in a resemblance of him. For he doth not say, in our likeness (says that author) as he had said in our image, but after our likeness; where the eph of similitude (as they call it) abates some thing of the sense of what follows; and makes it signify only an approach to the Divine likeness, in understanding, freedom of choice, spirituality, immortality, &c. Thus Tertullian explains it, "Habent illas ubique lineas Dei, qua immortali anima, qua libera et sui arbitrio, quasi praeclara plerumque, qua rationalis, capax intellectus et scientiae." Lib. ii. contra Marcion. cap. 9. And so Gregor. Nyssen. cap. 16, De 28 And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

29 ¶ And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat.

30 And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.

2 And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made.

3 And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.

4 ¶ These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens.

5 And every plant of the field before it was in the reason), that the seventh day, he observes, may be truly called ἡμέρα πάνσεις, the universal festival, kept by all people. Josephus speaks to the same purpose; and others, as Aristotle, a peripatetic philosopher, out of Hesiod, Homer, and others, in Enseb. Prag. Evang. lib. xiii. cap. 12, concerning the sacredness of the seventh day. Which, though Mr. Selden (lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 17, &c.) endeavours to prove is meant of the seventh day of the month, not of the seventh day of the week; yet we may look upon that as a remainder of this ancient tradition. Which, in time, men forgot, as they did the most natural duties; having so corrupted their ways (as we read Gen. vi. 10, 11) that there was nothing good among the generality of them. And therefore no wonder if they did not regard the service of God every seventh day: to which I shall show, in due place, Noah, the righteous, among the patriarchs, gave some regard. Which continued in the family of Abraham after the flood: Moses speaking of it, not long after their coming out of Egypt (where it is likely they were not suffered to observe it, having no time free from their intolerable labours), as a day known to them before the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, Exod. xvi. 23, 25, 26. Which is not to be understood, if the patriarchs, before and after the flood, kept such a rest as God enjoined the Israelites by Moses: for that was proper to them, for a peculiar reason—because they had been slaves in Egypt; and therefore were commanded to keep the sabbath, without doing any manner of work upon that day. (Deut. v. 13.) Which is all the Christian fathers mean, when they say the patriarchs did not Sabbathize, keep the Sabbath as the Jews did. (See Tertullian adv. Judæos, cap. 2, et 4. Irenæus, and others.) For in religious offices I doubt not they observed the seventh day; as a proper time for that sacred hymn, which Galen himself (lib. iii. de usu partium) says, we should all sing to the Creator of all. "If we ourselves first, and even by those who may sing, ye owe to the Creator, &c., how wonderful he is in wisdom, how great in power, and how rich in goodness."

Because that in it he had rested from all his work]

This is the reason why this day was distinguished from the other six; that a remembrance of God's resting from all his works on this day, might be preserved; by men's laying aside their other employments so long as to praise Him solemnly, by whom this great world was made.

Which God created and made.] Or, as the Hebrew phrase is, created to make, i.e. rested from all the six days' work. For he created something at the first, out of which to make all the rest, in six days' space; and now he ceased from all. Vol. I.—2 the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew: for the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground.

But there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground.

A faithful account of the original of the world. Which Moses here reports, more deeply to imprint on the people's minds, that the world was not a god, but the work of God: which they were to acknowledge every soul that lived in the earth.

In the day, i.e. at that time, so day often signifies.] It is observed by Tertullian, that exinde Dominus qui retro Deus tantum, &c. from henceforward (ver. 7, 8, 9, 15, &c.) he is called Lord, who hitherto was called only God: of which he endeavours to give a reason. (L. adv. Hermog. cap. 3.) The Hebrew doctors observe, that Jehovah Elohim (Lord God) joined together, is the full and perfect name of God: and therefore it is reserved till this place, when the works of God were perfected, and not before.

Ver. 5. Every plant.] That is, before there was any seed to produce them, God made them to spring up with their seed in them; as was said before, in the first chapter. And Moses here mentions these alone, because they were the first productions out of the earth: without which there had been no food for living creatures.

Here are two reasons to confirm, that plants were not produced in the way they are now; for, there had been no showers of rain; nor was there any man to prepare the earth to receive the seed (if there had been any); both which are necessary to work the method of Divine providence, ever since the world was made. From hence some collect there were no Preadamites (people before Adam), for then Moses could not have said, "There was no man to till the earth."

Ver. 6. But there went up a mist, &c.] Many think this will best cohere with what went before by translating it, nor did there (taking the particle as, nor, from the foregoing verse, as is usual) a mist go up from the earth. See Drusius in Levit. x. 6. and Hottinger in Hexapli. Paris. p. 89. But I see no necessity for this; and think it more likely, there did go up a vapour or steam out of the earth, when it came seeking out of the earth upon the earth (as upon verse 9 of chap. 1), to moisten the superficies of it; before any clouds were raised, by the power of the sun, to give rain.

Ver. 7. Out of the dust of the ground.] Not dry, but moist dust, as the LXX. have it, τον αριθμητον, γινεν ανος γης. From whence the apostle calls him αριθμητον γινεν ανος γης (1 Cor. xv. 17), which teaches us this dust was mixed with water; for so γινεν signifies; limus, as the Vulgar Latin hath it. Which agrees with the Hebrew jahzar, formed; which is used concerning potters, who make their vessels of clay, not of dry earth. Diodorus Siculus seems to have had some notion of this, when he saith, man was made out of "the slime or mud of Nile." Upon which original of man's body the ancient fathers make many pious reflections; but none better or shorter than that of Nazianzen's, who says, it is to teach us, ιδαν εαυτωμενοι δας την εικονα, δαι την γινεν ανος γης, "that when we are apt to be lifted up because we are made after God's image, the thoughts of the dirt out of which we were taken, may humble and lay us low."

This being said of matter, it is proper for nostrils the breath of life.] And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

7 And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul. 8 And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed.
CHAPTER II.

9 And out of the ground made the Lord God to every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

10 And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and there was an east river, whose name is the Pison: and it watereth that whole land; wherefore the name of it was called Gihon; the same is the river that goeth by Asshur to water the plain of Goon. And the river, the river, divided and became four rivers. The name of the first river is Pison: and it watereth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good; there is bdellium and the onyx stone. The name of the second river is Gihon: and it riseth from Eden, and goeth toward the southeast, and goeth into the Arabah, the land of the Asshur, and into the land of Goon. The name of the third river is Hiddekel: and the fourth river is the Euphrates.

Ver. 9. And out of the ground.] Of that garden before mentioned.

Every tree.] The greatest variety of the choicest plants, flowers, and fruits: for he comprehends everything that grows out of the earth.

Pleasant to the sight.] He gratified man's eye, as well as his taste and his smell.

The tree of life.] So called, because there was a virtue in it, as several of the ancient fathers think, not only to repair the animal spirits, as other nourishment doth; but also to preserve and maintain them, and all the organs of the body, in the same equal temper and state wherein they were created, without any decay: until a man should have been fit to be translated into another world. To this purpose Ireneus, St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, but especially Greg. Nazianzen speak, Εἰ μήν ἦταν σωτηρία καὶ Δίος πνεύματος, &c. "If therefore we had continued what we were, and kept the commandment, we should have been a part of the glory of the tree of life, ἀνακοινωσθήσας καὶ τὸν πνεύματα, being made immortal, and approaching nigh to God." (Orat. xiii. p. 699, D.) And why should we think it impossible or unlikely, that God would make such a fruit, I do not see. Nay, it seems necessary there should have been such a kind of food; unless we will suppose the earth's creation (since the continued innocent) from dying, by a continual miracle: which is a harder supposition than the other.

But this garden being also a type of heaven, perhaps God intended by this tree to represent that immortal life, which he meant to bestow upon man with himself: (Rev. xxii. 2.) And so St. Austin in that familiar discourse on the Gentle and the Simple, in isto autem sacramentum, (ib. vili. de Gen. ad Lit. cap. 4:) "In other trees there was nourishment for man; but in this also a sacrament." For it was both a symbol of that life which God had already bestowed upon man (who was hereby put in mind, that God was the author of his being, and all his enjoyment) and to show man, that he was to hope for in another world, if he proved obedient.

In the midst of the garden.] This signifies either its situation, or its excellence: for that which is most eminent in any place, the Hebrews say is "in the midst," xxiii. 10.

The tree of knowledge.] So called, as I take it, because God intended by this tree to prove Adam and Eve, whether they would be good or bad; which was to be made known, by their abstaining from its fruit, or eating of it. It is generally thought indeed by interpreters (of which I leave the reader to judge,) that it had this name afterwards; either because the tempter pretended it would make them so wise, as to know all things (for so good and evil may be expounded, chap. iii. 19.) to signify as much as all things whatsoever; or because, in the event, upon the eating of this fruit, they did actually know, by miserable experience (which they would not learn without it), the great difference between obeying and disobeying God's commands. That is, they who did not sufficiently attend to their duty, nor consider what it was to sin, and what the effect of it would be; presently, upon the eating of this fruit, reflected upon both. For they saw how grievous it was to incur God's displeasure; by believing a creature rather than him; and by being so ungrateful, as not to acknowledge his bounty in all the blessings they enjoyed; without thinking him envious in deying them one, as a proof of their obedience.

Some think it was so called, as a caveat to them, not to study craft and subtilty; but to content themselves in a simple, plain way of life (wherein God made them), without any curiosity to know more than was needful for them. Which they think is confirmed by chap. iii. 6, "She saw it was good to make one wise," i. e. cunning and wily.

Ver. 10. A river went out of Eden, &c.] These words afford us such a key to open to us the place where this garden was planted, that one can scarce doubt whether they were; though the purer spirit of the ancients made not the least mark in this description of it. For it lay in the country of Eden; and we are directed to find that out by this remarkable circumstance, that a river went out of it; which doth not signify that the spring of the river was in Eden; but that the river ran through that country into the garden, to water it. The garden, therefore, it is probable, was placed between the plains of Gihon, which was watered by that river which came from it. The only difficulty is, to find what river this was. Our countryman Mr. Carver, in his learned discourse of the Terrestrial Paradise (chap. vii.), endeavours to prove, that the two great rivers, Euphrates and Tigris, having but one and the same fountain in Armenia the Greater, run some way for several miles, even (as some) a vast distance, which he thinks this garden was seated, before this river parted into two streams, Euphrates and Tigris.

This he confirms out of the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians written to Rome 1552, and translated by Masius; where they call Tigris the River of Eden. And there are indeed some ancient authors, particularly Lucan and Boetius, who say that these two rivers came out of the same spring; but their mistake arose, it is likely, from hence, that they sprung (as Strabo tells us) out of one and the same mountain, viz., Niphates, which is a part of Taurus: and Euphrates sprung out of the northern side of it, and Tigris out of the southern; as Salmasius observes upon Solinus, (p. d31, &c.) Certain it is, that the best authorities, both ancient and modern, have supposed that springs, from whence they hold different courses, Euphrates towards the west, and Tigris towards the east: and do not make one river, till (after they have run through many countries) they meet and join together about Apania, according to Ptolemy. And then indeed they make, for a long way, but one great stream; which I take to be the river here mentioned by Moses, that ran through the country of Eden, which perhaps lay on both sides of the river; as the garden, it is plain, by ver. 8, did on the eastern side of it; extending itself to the place where these united rivers parted again. For so it follows: And from hence I. e. Below the garden.

It was parcel.] Or, was divided again, as it had been before into two other streams. By which words we seem to have found the place where the garden ended; but not being told where it began, nor how far it spread itself eastward from the river side, I will not presume to say what country or countries it included. Certain it is, there was a country, as I observed before, called Eden in aftertimes, which was part of the kingdom of Assyria (2 Kings xiv. 25.) and that kingdom then comprehended not only the country anciently called Ashur, but Mesopotamia and Babylonia, &c. In some part of which last province it is probable this garden was seated.

And became into four heads.] He doth not say was parted into four heads, but became into four heads (whose names here follow); two before they united, the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads.

11 The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah; where there is gold;

viz. Tigris and Euphrates; and two after they again parted, viz. Pison and Gihon.

These he calls heads, or principal rivers, as David Chytreaus, I think, rightly understands it; quatuor illustris et magna flumina efficiebant, made four famous and great rivers. For all divisions from the main stream are called the heads of a water; as Sir W. Robinson, out of Uphazim. And it is indifferent, whether the water come out of a fountain, or out of a river, or a lake: for that part of the river (suppose) where the branch forsakes the main stream, is called the head of that branch; which becomes a new river. In like manner may Euphrates and Tigris be called the heads of that river which they made at their meeting; as where they name again, the beginnings (as the LXX. translite the word) of the other two rivers, Pison and Gihon, are properly called the heads of them.

Ver. 11. The name of the first is Pison, or Pison: This is that branch which runs westerly; and being nearest to the place where Moses wrote, on the other side of the river Jordan, seemeth most likely to be so. It is a long time since both this river and Gihon have lost these names: the Greek and Roman writers calling them still, after their parting, by the names they had before they met, Euphrates and Tigris. But there was a remainder of the name of Pison preserved in the easterly river, called Pasitigris, which is the same with our Phasis. In Plinius it is called Phasis Pliniana in Sol. p. 701, 702: and is called (as Mr. Carver notes) by Xenophon simply Physcus, in which the name of Phison is plainly enough retained. Which continued to the time of Alexander the Great; for Q. Curtius, as he further notes, commonly calls Tigris itself by the name of Phasis, and says it was so called by the inhabitants theecabout. Which, in all probability, was at first the name of the whole river Phison: but lost by the many alterations which were made, for a long time, in the course of the river, as Pliny tells us. For he says, the Orcheni, and other neighbouring nations, made great and deep cuts or canals to carry the water of Euphrates (meaning this river and the river Gihon) and so lost its course, and run through Tigris and the mountains into the sea. Strabo saith the same, that from these δαπηγυς, as he calls them, deep trenches, which carried the water of Euphrates into Tigris, came the name of Pastigiris; that is, Pison mixed with Tigris. See Salmusianus in the forenamed Exercitations, page 703, where he shows this river was not perfectly restored to its course till the times of Alexander the Great, the beginnings as the LXX. translite the word of the other two rivers, Pison and Gihon, are properly called the heads of them.

That is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah.] By finding where this country was, we certainly find the river Phison. Now Moses makes mention of two Havilahs; one descended from Cush (Gen. x. 7), and the other from Joktan (ver. 25). The latter of these cannot be here meant, for his posterity were planted eastward; but the former, who were a more western people, in that part of Arabia Felix which bordered upon this stream. For the Ishmaelites (who inhabited Arabia Deserta) are described by Moses (xxxv. 18), as bounded by Shur towards Egypt, and by Havilah in the way to Assyria. And Saul found Havilah in aftertimes in that same part of Arabia Felix which bordered upon this stream. And still, much later, Strabo mentions the Naaxiari (which are certainly the posterity of Chavilah) among the people of Arabia. See Bochart's Phæleg. lib. iv. cap. 11.

12 And the gold of that land is good; there is bdellium and the onyx stone.

13 And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia.

Where there is gold;] Nothing is more famous than the gold of Arabia: where Dioscorus Sicius says it is digged up in great lumps, as big as a Vesuvian: lib. ii. p. 93. Edit. H. Steph.

Ver. 12. The gold,--is good.] i. e. is excellent: for the forenamed author says, it is of such a flaming colour, that it adds much to the lustre of precious stones, that, being put in a metal, it took the Bdellium] The Hebrew word being bedolah, some have thought bdellium to come from thence, which is an aromatic gum. Others think bedolah to be crystal, others amber; but Bochart rather thinks it signifies pearl; which he proves (in his Hierozoic. pt. ii. lib. v. cap. 23) from the country itself here mentioned, viz. the easterly stream that arose from the partiring of Euphrates and Tigris; as Pison, I said, was the western.

Compasseth, or, runneth along by—Ethiopia.] Or Cush: who was seated more eastward than his sons, Havilah, Seba, and the rest (mentioned Gen. x. 6, 7), upon the borders of this river. For when people first began to spread themselves, they kept as near to the great rivers as to those which flowed into the sea. For Cush, which is called Kish, was in another, and affording mutual succour and assistance. It is probable that he gave name to the country of Susiana; which the Greeks called Kisa, and is now called by the Persians, Chuzestan; i. e. the province of Chus. And when his posterity multiplied, they went more westward, toward the Arabian sea, where he lent his brother Mitrum passed into Egypt. Our translators follow the LXX. in rendering the Hebrew name Cush, by Ethiopia: not meaning that in Africa, but this in Asia. For the ancient frequently mention a double Ethiopia, as many have observed; particularly Job Ludolphus, who herein justifies the LXX. in great part; lib. ii. Comment. in Histor. Ethiop. cap. iii. p. 16.

Ver. 13. Gihon:] There are no footsteps of this name remaining that I can find; but we are directed, by the country it is said to compass, to take it to be the easterly stream that arose from the partiring of Euphrates and Tigris; as Pison, I said, was the western.

Daniel (x. 4) the great river; cannot be, as many have fancied, Naharmlucha: for that was but a cut, made by Trajan to waft his army out of Euphrates into Tigris (as Ammianus Marcellinus tells us), and therefore Hiddedelk is Tigris itself. Which, as Pliny says, was called Digitio in those parts where its course was slow, and when it began to be rapid, it took the name of Tigris. And so the Arabs call this river Deglat, and Degela, from the Hebrew word Hiddedelk, 14 And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates.

15 And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it.

Which Salmasinus derives from Hadade, or Chadda, sharp pointed; and Kol, swift; because of its very quick and happy motion. The modern name of Tigris is called Tighe, he observes, derivates, derive the name of Tigris, τιγρες [tigres]. (Exerc. in Solin. p. 684.) Rauwolf, in his Travels (pt. ii. cap. 5.), says, that when he was at Caruch, on the confines of Media (which was about a hundred years ago), Tigris was still called in their language Hiddekel.

Which goeth toward the east of Assyria.] If it make a great bend northward (as Pliny saith it doth about Apanias), it must needs run towards the east of Assyria, for some time. But this is not the course of the river; and therefore the LXX. translate the word ἱδανας, which we English towards the east, simply toward: and it is certain Tigris did run by Assyria; for Nineveh, the chief city of Assyria, stood upon the eastern side of the river, as his host hath demonstrated in his Phleg. lib. iv. cap. 20.

Euphrates.] None doubt that the river called here in the Hebrew Pareth, or Phrathe, is the same that hath been called for many ages Euphrates. The course of which was so well known in those days, that Moses gives no description of it.

16 And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat:

17 But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.
18 ¶ And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him.

19 And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof.

18 Ver. 18. And the Lord God said, &c.] Or, had said, as it is by some translated, the better to show that the foregoing precept was given to both. And to say in this place is as much as to resolve and decree: as Melancthon well explains it, in one of his Epistles: Di. the author of Catechet. Sh. to sons, mentions it, and notes how decreetum tradere: “To say here signifies to establish with wonderful wisdom, and to deliver this decree to us.” (lib. i. Epist. 126.) Where he again repeats it, “The Lord said;” that is, by his wise counsel and immutable decree, he established this order.

It is not good that the man should be alone.] Uncommon, yet great, encouragement to the whole chapter. Concerning which Phato hath left these wonderful words (lib. vi. De Logibus): This is the encouragement to marriage—not only that the human race may be perpetuated; but a man may, Πάντες οἱ ημέρες οἱ τῶν θεοῦ ἐπέτρεψαν ἐν των παραλ- δάνων, “leave children’s children behind him when he is one, to serve God,” or辐, “wherein his seed.”

In helpe.] For all the necessities and uses of life.

Meet for him.] In whose company he shall take delight; so the Hebrew phrase, as before him, imports; being as much as, answerable to him, every way fitted for him; not only in likeness of body, but of mind, disposition, and affection; which laid the foundation of perpetual familiarity and friendship, Or, as the author of Catechet. Sh. to sons, mentions it, and notes how: “Leaves children’s children behind him when he is one, to serve God,” or辐, “wherein his seed.”

Adam.] It is commonly thought that this name of Adam, given to the first man, signifies as much as red earth. But Job Ludolphus hath made it far more probable that it imports elegant, or beautiful. (See his Histor. Ethip. lib. i. cap. 15. n. 17, 18, and his commentaries upon that chapter, n. 107.) How the beasts and birds were brought to him we are not told; but it is likely by the ministry of angels; who were perpetual attendants upon the Scechinab, or Divine Majesty.

To see what he would call them.] To exercise and improve his understanding.

Whatever Adam called, &c.] God approved of it.

Ver. 20. And Adam gave names to all creatures; yet among them all, when they were brought before him, there was not a fit companion found for him. It doth not follow, from his giving names, that he knew the nature of all those creatures; the names of them in Scripture (which they who are of this opinion generally suppose were the names given by Adam) are taken from their voice, their colour, their magnitude, or some such external difference, and not from their nature. Therefore, this imposing names upon them, denotes rather his dominion than his knowledge. The anonymous author of the Chron. Excepta before Job, Antiochenus Malala, says, That Adam imposed names upon all creatures, σατα κινητων θεοι; “by the commandment of God,” το δ αυτων ονομα και της γυναικος αυτου Αγγελος Κυριος ετιν αυτω, “but his own name and his wife’s were told him by an angel of the Lord.”

And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof;

And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man.

23 And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man.

Divine Majesty (which now appeared to Eve) presented and gave her to him, to be his wife. God himself made the espousals (if I may so speak) between them, and joined them together in marriage.

Ver. 23. And Adam said, &c.] Now indeed I have found, what I could not see before among all God's creatures, another self.

She shall be called Woman, &c.] Partake of my name, as she doth of my nature. For he called her Issha, as he was called Ishh. From whence Sepher Coris and Abarbinel endeavour (in a very long discourse) to prove the Hebrew to be the primitive language. And Abarbinel observes the Christians to be of the same opinion, quoting, for a proof of it, St. Austin's book, De Civitate Dei.

Ver. 24. Therefore shall a man, &c. cleave unto his wife.] Cohabit with her, rather than with his parents (if they cannot all dwell together), and be joined to her in the closest and most inseparable affection: as if they were but one person, and had but one soul and one body. That is the meaning of the next words.

They shall be one flesh, &c.] Most intimately conjoined in entire and inseparable love. Which arose from the singular union of the flesh of our first parents; one of them being taken out of the other. From whence Maimonides and other Hebrew doctors infer all mixture with beasts to be contrary to nature; who are neither one flesh with us, nor one with another.

For in this our bodies, as well as our souls, have a preeminence above theirs; which were not made one flesh after such a manner as man and woman were. They hence also conclude all incestuous marriages, &c. to be unlawful, as may be seen in Mr. Selden. (De Jure N. et G. lib. v. cap. 2.) Their observation is more pertinent, who take notice, that God, creating and joining together but one man and one woman in the beginning, intended mankind should be so propagated, and not by polygamy. Which in process of time indeed became the general practice; but "from the beginning it was not so," as our Saviour speaks in the case of divorces. Which he concludes, from these very words, were against the Divine institution, which made "two to be one flesh" (Matt. xix. 5, 6, 8;) so he interprets these words, and St. Paul doth the same 1 Cor. vi. 16). "They shall be one flesh:" and so doth Jonathan's Paraphrase, and the Samaritan Code, as Mr. Selden observes, in the place now named.

Ver. 25. They were both naked.] They did not yet find any necessity for clothes.

And were not ashamed.] Did not blush; no more than little children do when they beheld one another naked, and embrace with an innocent affection. Besides, there was nobody but they two (who in effect were as one) to behold them: and therefore they had no more reason to blush, than a man doth when he is naked alone by himself.

CHAPTER III.

1 The serpent deceiveth Eve. 6 Man's shameful fall.

15 The promised seed. 16 The punishment of mankind. 21 Their first clothing. 22 Their casting out of paradise.

1 Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?

2 And the woman said unto the serpent, names upon them: and there being none of them a meet help for him, he slept some time, till Eve had taken her beginning out of him. Whom, when he saw, he received, and owned her for his wife; and no doubt made more reflections upon God's wisdom, power, and goodness, than are set down in this sacred story. They both also received a command from God, not to eat of one tree in the garden: into which, when they were brought, we cannot but think they walked about, and took such a view of it, as to be convinced, by the bountiful provision God had made for them, they had no reason to complain of the small restraint he had laid upon them. All which could not be performed so speedily as some have imagined: for though God can do what he pleases in an instant, yet man cannot; and God himself did not in one day create the world. And, besides that, some time was necessary for transacting all these things; it is not likely the devil would immediately set to work to excite Eve as soon as the command was laid upon them; but rather let it be a little forgotten. And if the time be observed when he assaulted her, it will much confirm this opinion, which was in the absence of her husband: for that we cannot easily believe to have been upon the same day they were created. The extra-

We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: ordinary kindness they had one for the other, will scarce allow us to think it possible, they should be so perverted. It is plain also, God "saw the seventh day" before their fall; which is highly probable they spent in admiring and praising the almighty goodness.

Ver. 1. The serpent] Or, that serpent (as some think it should be translated) which the tempter made use of, as his instrument to deceive man. The word serpent is used by Aristotle (lib. i. Hist. Animal, cap. 1) to be μωστά ἰδιωλοχ, "extremely insidious;" but this was extraordinarily wily. What sort it was is not here express ed: but all agree there is none like it; the curse of God having degraded it. St. Basil, in his Book of Paradise (p. 627) saith, it was not a frog, nor a creature, as others say. I can not θέλωσον, but mild and gentle: not crawling and winding about, in a terrible manner, upon the ground, ὥσπερ ἤφαντο ἐν πασί βιοκρίνον, "but lofty, and going up-right upon its feet." Several of the Jews have been of this opinion; and our famous Mr. Mede inclines to it. (Discourse xxxviii. p. 291, &c.) But I take the opinion of the ancient church, who, since the sixth to the eleventh century, have considered of it as a symbol of the church, to be far more probable: which I shall endeavour to strengthen. There were (and still are in the eastern and southern parts of the world) serpents having wings, and shining very brightly, like to fire. So we read (Isa. xiv. 29) of "a flying fiery serpent." Which fiery serpents are called seraphim, and termed fiery, not merely with respect to their venom, which made sore inflammations on the bodies of those who were bitten by them, but because they appeared shining like fire when they flew in the air.

Whence seraphim is the name also of the highest sort of angels (called the "angels of the presence," Isa. vi. 2, 5), who appeared, I suppose, in some such form to our first parents; and some have thought, this was the archangel Michael, who is called the captain and ruler of the host of the Lord, and was there to aid and strengthen the chosen people; but we are not told what form he appeared in, except that he appeared mighty in war, when he said (in his book De Precipit. Hæret. cap. xiv.), I summi serpentinae, cui Eva, ut filio Dei, crediderat; "this was the serpent to whom Eve gave credit as to the Son of God." Which, if any one take to be the words of the hebreus he is there speaking of; yet these are not what we find in his book against the Valentinians (cap. 2), where he saith the serpent was a primordial Divine imagines præato, "an usurper of the Divine image from the beginning." (See Dr. TENISON OF IDOLATRY, p. 356.) To which that passage in Ephippius may be added, who mentions some hebreus (who might have some thing among them) that said, the woman listened to the serpent's words, and "vóluit non sibi mittere, sibi nusquam mârichto, sed vultu damnato," or was persuaded by him, "as the Son of God." (Hæres. xxxvii. n. 25.) And, one would think, Rabbi Bechaj had this notion in his mind, when he said (upon the 14th verse of this chapter), "This is the secret (or mystery, of the holy language), that a serpent is called Seraphe, as an angel is called Seraph." For which he quotes the former passage (Numb. xxvi. 6), and then adds, The Scripture calls serpents seraphim, because they were to be dishonoured, and thereby seduced Eve to give credit to him.

However this be, it is most reasonable to suppose, it was some beautiful creature; by whom Eve thought an angel, and therefore said, Ye shall not eat of every her; for she was not so simple as to think that beasts could speak; much less that they knew more of God's mind than herself. Nor doth it seem at all credible to me, that she could have been otherwise deceived, but by some creature which appeared so gloriously, that she took it for a heavenly minister; and therefore she supposed she could explain to them the meaning of the Divine command.

Yea, hath God said.] This doth not look like the beginning of a discourse, but the conclusion: as the Jews themselves have observed. And it is not improbable, that the tempter, before he spoke these words, represented himself as one of the heavenly court; who came, or was supposed to come, to give happiness that God hath bestowed upon them in paradise: which was so great, that he could not easily believe he had denied them any of the fruit of the garden. He desired therefore to be satisfied from her own mouth, of the truth of what he pretended to have heard; or to know how they understood the command of God: for so these words may be translated, "Is it not written, that Ye shall not eat of any fruit of the tree, &c." The ancient interpretation, and more probable than theirs, who would have the Hebrew particles, apk ki, signify as much as ut ut: "Although God hath said, Ye shall not eat, notwithstanding, ye shall not die." So they suppose he was going to add; but, before he had spoken the latter part of the command, Eve pretended to know what he meant; and says, "We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden." This had been too gross, flatly to contradict what God had said; whereas, the beginning of the verse tells us, he went more subtilly to work.

Ver. 2. The woman said unto the serpent, We may eat, &c., &c.] She seems to have understood him, as if he had bidden them to eat of any fruit in the garden. And indeed the foregoing question is ambiguous; like those oracles of his which made him be called Λοχίας (oblique or crooked), by the ancient heathen; because they had two meanings. She truly therefore reports the sense of God's prohibition, in this and the following verse. Though there are those who think she pronounced these words, "We may eat of the fruit," &c., with some admiration, that they should be restrained from one fruit, when God had most liberally granted them all the rest. The reason of which she did not know, and showed her desire perhaps to understand it.

Ver. 3. But of the fruit,—in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it.] Some suppose the reference here began to prevaricate in two things: First, In saying they might not touch it? Secondly, In saying only there was danger if they meddled with it, and not an absolute threatening. Of shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die.

4 And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die:

5 For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.

6 And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat.

7 And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons.

8 And they heard the voice of the Lord God.
walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden.

9 And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou?

10 And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself.

11 And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, maximum, umbrosissimumque, "the greatest and most shady leaf of all other."

Apros.] A covering, which they girt about them.

Ver. 8. The voice of the Lord God walking] The sound of the majestic presence, or the glory of the Lord, approaching nearer and nearer unto the place where the Son of God, who appeared in very glorified voice as well as to the Lord: signifying that the sound as I said (for so voice is often used in Scripture) of the Divine Majesty’s approach, came still nearer, and made a louder noise, to terrify them. For thus the word walk is applied to the voice (i. e. sound) of the trumpet at the giving of the law, when Moses says of it, The voice of thy brother’s blood crieth unto me from the ground.

Ver. 9. And he said, I heard thy voice, &c.] The very sound of the approach of thy presence by their transgression, because I found I had lost my innocence, that I hid myself from thee. This was a foolish and vain attempt; but as guilt makes men fearful, that so bereaves them of all consideration.

Ver. 11. Who told thee that thou wast naked? Diested of those noble endowments, which I bestowed on thee.

12 And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat.

13 And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat.

14 And the Lord God said unto the serpent, *Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; in the pain of thy belly shalt thou eat un whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat!

15 And the man, said, The woman whom I gave to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat.

16 And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat.

17 Of whom Cain stubbornly refusing to give an account, the Lord said immediately (to show he needed not to be informed), "The voice of thy brother’s blood crieth unto me from the ground."

Ver. 10. And he said, I heard thy voice, &c.] The very sound of the approach of thy presence by their transgression, because I found I had lost my innocence, that I hid myself from thee. This was a foolish and vain attempt; but as guilt makes men fearful, that so bereaves them of all consideration.

Ver. 11. Who told thee that thou wast naked? Diested of those noble endowments, which I bestowed on thee.

Ver. 12. And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest, &c.] *I confess my guilt; into which I was drawn by her whom thou gavest me for a help. Thus we are apt to excuse and palliate our faults; by laying that load upon others, with which we ought to charge ourselves, before he ended this discourse with them. Which shows the infinite mercy of the Creator of all, who would not abandon them; but sought after them to save them, when they had lost themselves.

Ver. 13. The Lord God said unto the woman, &c.] What moved thee to violate my command?

The woman said, The serpent beguiled me.] My weakness was deceived by the cunning of the devil. Thus she also threw the blame upon another. But God, no doubt, convinced them both of the greatness of their guilt, and the miserable condition into which they were then cast, by their transgression, before he ended this discourse with them. Which shows the infinite mercy of the Creator of all, who would not abandon them; but sought after them to save them, when they had lost themselves.

Ver. 14. Thou art cursed, &c.] It is observed by Tertullian, that though God inflicted punishment on Adam and Eve, yet he did not curse them as he did the serpent, ut restitutionis candidatos, they standing fair for a restitution to his favour (lib. ii. adv. Marcion. cap. 25). And I may add, God did not begin with them; but first sentences the serpent, before he proceeds to judgment upon them: which denotes that he (the old serpent) was the great offender, being the first mover to sin; which made his crime more grievous than theirs.

Now, to be cursed, is to be deprived of what was before enjoyed, and doomed to a miserable wretched condition of life: the particulars of which follow. The only difficulty is, why the serpent (literally so called) should be cursed, as it manifestly is (though the devil also, I shall show, is intended), being but an instrument wrought by the curse upon the earth; which will to sin, nor yet understanding or knowledge of what the devil did. It is commonly answered, that this is no more than the curse which God inflicted upon the earth (which was not capable of sinning) for Adam’s sake (ver. 17). But still the reason of that curse is inquired; which is evident enough; man himself being the curse upon the earth; which did not yield its fruit so plentifully and so easily, as it had done before his transgression. And the reason of this curse upon the serpent may be the better above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life:
15 And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.

16 Unto the woman he said, I will greatly discerned, by another instance which we find Exod. xxxi. 28, where an ox, which gored a man or woman that they died, is ordered to be stoned, and his flesh not to be eaten. This sure was to show the great value God set upon man's life: which he secured also by this punishment; which moved all owners to look well to their beasts that might endanger it.

For he had the property (to namely, in money to Adam and his wife (whom, it is manifest by what follows, God intended to restore into his favour), that they might be ever mindful of the fœnality of their guilt, and excited to repentance; by seeing a noble creature (who was but the instrument of it) so extremely debase into a most vile condition.

Upon thy belly shalt thou go.] This shows the serpent to have been a more noble creature before this fact; but changed after it, from a flying scurch (as the word is, Numb. xxi. 6) into a foul creeping serpent; not moving aloft in the air, but crawling upon the earth, and licking the dust. So it follows:

Dust shalt thou eat.] There is no viler food than this: which doth not signify the serpent should feed upon dust, but that it is made of a great creeping earth creature, it cannot but lick up much dust together with its food, whatsoever that be.

All this is, literally, the curse of the serpent; but as the devil lay hidden under the covert of the serpent, though he be not named; so his curse is intended in this curse of the serpent, though it be not separately made upon it. All men of a greater capacity in a great evil are certain to have a peculiar respect to the devil under the name of the serpent. And the devil's curse in general was this: to be thrust down further than before, from his ancient heavenly habitation; and condemned to live in the lower smoky region of the air: where he hath lost all relish of celestial enjoyments, and pleases himself only in his vile endeavours to make mankind as wretched as was this a more noble creature before.

Ver. 15. I will put enmity, &c.] An irreconcilable feud, throughout all generations. Which is true of the serpent, literally understood, between whom and mankind there is such an antipathy, that it discovers itself both in the natural and sensitive faculties of them both: their humours being poison to each other; and man's being a very great devourer of any creature more than any other creature: and the serpent in like manner, at the sight of a man, especially (if naturalists say true) of a naked man. Thus Mr. Mede (Disc. xxxix. p. 295). But this is far more true and certain of the spiritual serpent, the devil and his angels (who joined with him in his apostasy), and the woman and her seed, in whom these words are more literally fulfilled. For Maimonides justly admires, that the seed of the woman should be only mentioned and not of Adam (without whom she could have no seed; which therefore must be his seed), and that it should be said of her seed, not of his, that it bruised the serpent's head (More Nevochim, pt. ii. cap. 30).

"This," saith he, "is one of the passages in Scripture, which is most suitable to the meaning of the story, stood, according to the letter; but contains great wisdom in it." In which words he wrote more truth than he was aware: but was not able to unfold this hidden wisdom, as we Christians, blessed be God, are able to do. For this seed here spoken of is Christ, as both the Targums (that ascribed to Jonathan, and that to the Jewish Midrash) undoubtedly make it; and as we are taught to understand it, by God's words to Abraham, when he renewed this promise: "In thy seed (that is, Christ, saith the apostle) shall all nations be blessed, (Gen. xxii. 18, Gal. iii. 8, 16). For he vanquished the devil, who had now vanquished mankind. So here it follows,

It shall bruise thy head.] i. e. That seed of the woman shall despoil thee of thy power (meaning the devil), and abolish thy tyranny. For in the head of the serpent (to whom, by his very nature) lies his strength: as Epaminondas represented to the Thebans when he exhorted them to set upon a band of Lacedemonians, by showing them the head of a vast snake which he had crushed (πυγή πεταξάμενη τον Σπάνον νυομένου), saying, "Look ye, the body can do no hurt now the head is gone;" meaning, that, if they routed the Lacedemonians, the rest of the confederates would signify nothing. (Polyb. lib. xiv. 25.) And therefore Mr. Mede has rightly interpreted the serpent's head, to signify the devil's sovereignty (Disc. xxv. p. 113, and xxxix. p. 298), and that sovereignty is the power of death: which headship of the devil, the seed of the woman (that is, Christ the Lord) hath broken in pieces, and at last, will utterly destroy (1 Cor. xv. 25, 26).

There is a notable example of this enmity in the struggle between Christ and the devil for empire, in Rev. xii. 7, 8, where Christ destroyed the sovereignty of the serpent in the Roman empire so effectually, that there was "no more place found for the dragon and his angels in heaven," i. e. the devil utterly lost his sovereignty in that state, as Mr. Mede interprets it.

Thou shalt bruise his heel.] This victory over the devil was not to be gotten without blood: for the devil did all that he was able to destroy this seed. But that was impossible to be done; he could only assault his lower part (called here the heel), viz. his body or flesh: which, by his instruments, he persecuted, despitefully used, and at last crucified. By which very means (as据 to the goodness of God) the seed of the woman conquered the devil, as the apostle shows, Heb. ii. 14, 15. For it must be here noted, that Christ was properly and literally the seed of the woman, and not at all of the man: being born, without him, of a pure virgin. The tender mercy of God also must here be acknowledged; which, in the hope of the seed, very, as soon as they were fallen: by making them this most gracious promise. Which, though here something obscurely delivered, grew clearer and clearer, in every age, till Christ came. It cannot be denied likewise, but that by seed may be understood (collectively) all the faithful, who, by the power of their Lord, vanquished all the power of their spiritual Adversaries (see Lev. xix. 19). Yet that we must confess, there was one eminent seed here primarily intended, by whom they overcome. Unto whom another seed is not here opposed in this last part of the verse (as in the former part), but the serpent himself: which points out a single combat (as I may call it) between this promised seed and the serpent. But in the rest of the interpretation of understanding by seed, Christ with all his members, then the bruising their heel signifies (as Mede expounds it) the devil's deceit and guile in assaulting us unawares: as they do who come behind others, when they do not observe them, and catch hold of their heel. For that this is an emblem of guile and deceitful dealing, appears from the words of Obadiah and Jacob; the latter of which had his name from catching his brother by the heel at his birth, which multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.

17 And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life;

18 Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field;

Here the Rabbins cry out, Mensura pro mensura; "behold the justice of God, who brings them in his kind!" He was not satisfied with the choice fruits of the garden in which God put him; and therefore he took them from him, and sent him to eat the ordinary food of beasts; and that not without hard labour (Maimon. More Nevoch. pt. I. cap. 2).

Ver. 19. In the sweat of thy face, &c.] Some conclude from hence, that the earth brought forth before the fall without any pains to cultivate it. And indeed there needed none; all things being produced at the first, by the divine power, in full perfection. But what labour would have been necessary in time, if man had continued innocent, we do not know: only these words signify, that less toil would have served than man must now take for their sustenance.

Some of the Jews reckon up the punishments, besides death, which God inflicted upon Adam; and as many upon Eve. (See Pirke Elzezer, cap. xiv. and Vorstius upon him.)

Till thou return unto the ground.] i. e. Till thou diest, and moulderest into dust.

The rest of this verse needs no explication.

Ver. 20. Called her name Eve.] Some think she was called Ishah before, and now he changed her name into Eve; in belief that God would make her the mother of all mankind, and of the promised seed particularly; by whom (as D. Chrysostom adds) he hoped to be raised from the dead to immortal life.

Mother of all living.] Of all men that should live hereafter, or of Him that should give life to mankind. So Hovah may be interpreted, qaro or ṣeφאתא because she was the mother of all mankind, or because mankind, now sentenced to death, were by her seed to be made alive.

Ver. 21. Coats of skins, &c.] The first clothes of mankind were of the leaves of trees, which they made themselves; being ready at hand, woven by Divine art. The next were of the skins of beasts; which were the first made for them from the injury of cold and weather, and these were made by God's direction. That Adam was made in another place, and thence brought into paradise: from whence, being now expelled, he was sent back to the place where he was first formed; there to labour in all the toils of husbandry. Though, it must be confessed, these words may signify no more than those ver. 19, of this chapter, that he had his original from that source by the tilting of which he was put in mind of his return thither.

Ver. 21. So he drove out the man.] (With his wife) or, as Aben Ezra translates it, after he had driven him out, he placed, &c. This word צו is that which the Hebrews properly use in divorces; and therefore doth, they think, that the Lord put him away from his presence. Aben Ezra observes, &c.] Or, a flame of a sword. Concerning which Maimonides thus discourses (p. i. More Nochoc, cap. 4). Our wise men understand by לבח (flame) an angel: according to the psalmist, “He maketh his angels spirits; his ministers (לובק) a flaming fire.” (Ps. cxv. 4.) That is, one of the seraphim, or a flaming angel, in the form of a flying serpent: some understand it of the sword, which resembled the vibration of a sword, was appointed, with the cherubims, to guard the entrance of the garden. For the cherubims and seraphim are frequently mentioned in Scripture as attendants upon the Shechith, or Divine Majesty: which appeared here in great glory, at the passage into the garden of Eden; as it did in aftertimes at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation of Israel, to their great astonishment.

Which turned every way.] “Angels,” says Maimonides, in the forenamed passage, “can turn themselves into all forms and shapes; some of which strike greater terror into those that behold them than others do.” But I take this expression, not to signify mutation of shapes, but the motion of the angel: which was so very sudden, that to the devout mind, as the flames seemed to come streaming out on every side.

To keep the way of the tree of life.] To secure the passage into the garden of Eden, where this tree was; that none should dare to attempt a re-entry. But Adam was so far from thinking of this, that, if the eastern traditions were to be credited, I should add, he plunged himself into the deepest sorrow for a long time; bewailing his sin, begging pardon, &c.; till God despatched an angel to comfort him, and further assure him of his favour; which being but probable conjectures, I say no more of such matters.
from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken.

Nor can I assert, with any degree of confidence, what our great primate of Ireland says, in his Annals, that it seems to have been the tenth day of the world's age, when Adam was cast out of paradise; in memory of which calamity, the solemn day of expiation, and the great fast, was instituted in aftertimes, wherein all were to afflict their souls (Lev. xvi. 29). This indeed is the doctrine of the Jews, who say, "The great day of expiation (which was on the tenth of September) was appointed and sanctified from the creation of the world." But there is no other authority for it.

It will be more useful, I think, to observe what footsteps there are of these things remaining in the gentle world. I will mention but two. One of which is noted by Eusebius, who shows (lib. xii. Prepar. Evang. cap. 11) that Plato, in his Symposium, hath preserved the memory of Paradise: his ἔρπος Διός, garden of Jupiter, being the same with this garden of God, in which man was at first placed. The other by St. Austin, who says, Perecydes, the scholar of Pythagors, called the beginner of evil, Ὄφωνια: that is, a demon in the shape of a serpent. So Heiddeggerus observes out of him, Exercit. iv. De Adamo et Eva, n. 82.

CHAPTER IV.

1 The birth, trade, and religion of Cain and Abel. 8 The murder of Abel. 11 The curse of Cain. 17 Enoch the first city. 19 Lamech and his two wives. 25 The birth of Seth, 26 and Enos.

1 And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the Lord.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1. And Adam knew Eve his wife, &c.] After they were thrust out of paradise; not before (whatsoever some of the Jewish doctors fancy to the contrary); for, as some will have it, after they had spent some time in acts of repentance, which is not an improbable opinion.

A man from the Lord.] i.e. The promised Messiah; which she imagined would have been her first-born. For the words of the promise (iii. 15) might as well be expanded of the first seed the woman had, as of any of his posterity.

Ver. 2. Abel.] But gives no reason of his name, which signifies vanity; as she did of Cain's, which signifies acquisition, or possession. Nor is it said who gave this second son the name of Abel: but it seems they made no account of him, in comparison with the first-born. Cain was not asATTERN to spes; factae promissionis de semine, ut in Cain (as Joh. Forsterus judiciously speaks, in his Lexicon, on the word Hevel), "Because they did not place in him their hope of the promised seed, as they did in Cain."

Abel was a keeper of sheep, &c.] The younger son was a shepherd; and the elder a husbandman and planter. For this last seems to have been Adam's chief employment, both before and after his fall (Gen. ii. 15, iii. 23), and therefore either chosen by Cain, in imitation of his father, or put upon him by his direction, as the more noble of the two.

Whence the eastern people gave him the name of Abul-Karim; which some mistake for another son of Adam: but in truth was another name of Cain, signifying a tiller of the field, as Mr. Selden shows, lib. v. De Jure N. et G. cap. 8.

The patriarchs indeed after the flood, at least in Abraham's family, chose to feed cattle: but that was because it was less laborious, and more suitable to that unsettled station wherein they lived for many years, removing, like the ancient Nomades, from one country to another.

Ver. 3. In process of time] In the Hebrew the words are, in the end of days: that is, in the conclusion of the year, or after harvest. So days signify in many other places, particularly Judg. xi. 4, wherein after days is after a year. This was a very seasonable time to make their grateful acknowledgments to God, who had given them a fruitful year, and blessed them with increase. Accordingly God ordained, in future times, that the Israelites should keep a solemn feast, in the year's end, to thank him for the ingathering of their fruits (Exod. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22). But in what year of the world it was that Cain and Abel brought these sacrifices, we have no means to know. It was, no doubt, when they were grown men; and perhaps had more brethren and sisters besides themselves. See ver. 17.

Cain brought of the fruits of the ground an offering] These were the most ancient sacrifices among the gentiles, both Greek and Roman, as their authors tell us; and therefore it is most likely that Adam began with these oblations of herbs, flowers, frankincense, meats, &c. and that Cain followed him; being of the same profession, and provided with store of such things. Now, as there were solemn times of making their devout acknowledgments to God: so, I doubt not, there were some set places where they met for that purpose. For the word in Hebrew for brought, is never used about domestic or private sacrifices, but always about those public sacrifices, which were brought to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to be offered by the priest. As (Lev. iv. 1) "He shall bring the bullock to the door," &c. Which occurs all along, especially in the ninth chapter of that book.

And therefore, I suppose, they brought these sacrifices, here mentioned, to some fixed place: looking towards the Shechinah, or glorious presence of God, at the entrance of the garden of Eden, from which Adam had been expelled. For there being no doubt, some settled place where they performed sacred offices, it is most reasonable to think it had respect to the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty. Whereupon, therefore, they appeared (as the Scripture speaks) before God; because there he manifested his special presence, which moved them to go thither to worship him, to give him thanks, or to inquire of him, as we read Rebecca did, xxv. 29.
3 And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord.

What kind of sacrifices these were, is a question among learned men. The Talmudists are of opinion that they were whole burnt-offerings, and that there were no other before the law was given (which I shall not now examine), nor would the Jews, after the giving of the law, permit the gentiles to offer any other at their temple.

It is their opinion also, that Cain and Abel brought these sacrifices to Adam, to be offered by him: for which I see no reason, nor can I find that there was ever any sacrifice offered to them by any other than themselves, which seem to have offered them. And then this effectually confutes their opinion, who say the first-born were separated to the office of priest-hood: for, by these words, it is plain, the youngest sacrificed, as well as the eldest. And so they did in following ages; when we find Jacob performing the office of a priest (Gen. xxviii. 18, xlvii. 1). Which pure Eusebios very judiciously resolves, in many other places, such as "the man very strongly determined, to run them the least burdensome inconvenience: which hath led some to conclude that men did this out of a grateful inclination, to return him some of his own blessings; though they had no directions from him about it. But if this were true, how came Abel to believe that his sacrifice of a beast would be so acceptable to God, as the apostle says it was by faith? (Heb. xi. 4.) That faith had something in it very glorious, and very sweet, no more than that Abel made himself no more the less content with the law of Moses, which permitted none to officiate among the Israelites, but the family of Aaron; and no sacrifices to be offered, but at the tabernacle of the congregation, Lev. xvii. 3, 4, 5.

It is a much harder question, how they came to sacrifice at all, either meat or beasts; since we read of Enochios very judiciously resolves, in many other places, the reason. Adam, in all likelihood, had received some order concerning it; and began to sacrifice (as I noted before, iii. 21) by direction from the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty: from whence a voice spake to him upon several occasions, (ii. 16, 17, iii. 8, 9, &c.) This order, indeed, is not rebutted; no more than that Moses in his short history omitted (as Enoch's prophecy, Noah's preaching, the peopling of the world, &c., see ver. 15), but it doth not seem probable that Adam would have presumed to invent a way of worship by killing beasts and burning their fat: especially since one cannot perceive any inclination of it in nature. And therefore it was obviously requisite of a man, in this manner, that this way of worship was not taken up by chance, or by a human motion, χωρία δ ε' ἐπικατα τὰς εἰς θυσίαν, but suggested to them by a divine inspiration (lib. i. Demonstr. Evang. cap. 10). Of which Plato, one would think, had some notion, when he forbids his law-maker (in his Epinomis) to make any alteration in the rites of sacrificing, because the συνεθέστα ἡ τὰς τοιούτων τιμάς, it is not possible for our mortal nature to know any thing about such matters.

Ver. 4. Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock, &c.] Many have fancied, from this, that Cain's guilt lay in this, that he did not bring the first of his fruit, as he ought to have done, and as the heathens ever did, or were bound to do by their pontifical laws (as Mr. Selden observes, chap. i. of his Hist. of Tyrs), in their Premessum, i.e. the first-fruits of their corn, or their Calpar, which was the richest of their wine. For it is only said, he brought of the fruit of his ground, when Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock. And Moses also adding, that Abel brought of the fat thereof, is, the very best; they think Cain's fault was, that he brought not the fullest ears of corn (which he kept for himself), but the lankeat, or brought them with a niggardly hand, or a grudging mind. And, in another place, the sponse, says, "He was the first that tasted the first-fruits, and kept the best things for his own belly." Των αἵτων ἀπέκδισεν πρωτός τι γενομένοι τα πρωτα γενεας, p. 108. But there is no certainty of this; and the apostle to the Hebrews hath directed as to a better account (xi. 4). Abel offered with a pious mind; Cain without a due sense of God, and of himself. He offered the fruit of his ground; but did not devote himself to God. Therefore it follows, The Lord had respect unto Abel: he graciously accepted them: and his offering was accepted, because he himself was accepted. It is a metaphor from those who, when a present is made them, look eagerly upon the person that brings it, if they like him and his present; or turn away their faces, if they disdain them.

How God testified his acceptance of Abel's sacrifice is the only difficulty: which the Jews say was by fire coming from heaven (or rather, I think, by a stream of light, or a flame from the Shechinah, the first glory of God, universal thoughts away and from the law of Moses, which permitted none to officiate among the Israelites, but the family of Aaron; and no sacrifices to be offered, but at the tabernacle of the congregation, Lev. xvii. 3, 4, 5. And if Abel's sacrifice was acccepted and by a great fire, he was honored. Thus Theodotion of old translated these words: Λέιναι τοις Αβελ ελπίδα και ἀνίκητος: "He looked upon Abel's sacrifices, and set them on fire." Which St. Hierom, and other ancient writers approve. The footsteps of which we meet withal, in Gen. xv. 17, and examples of it very many in future times, when the Greeks offered the first grain of a new harvest, according to the law (Lev. xix. 24), when Gideon offered upon the rock (Judg. vi. 21), and David stayed the plague (1 Chron. xxii. 26), and Solomon consecrated the temple (2 Chron. vii. 13), and when Elijah contended with the Baalites, (1 Kings xviii. 38, &c.) Whence the Israelites, wishing all prosperity to their king, pray that God would accept (in the Hebrew, turn unto us) of his burnt sacrifice (Psalm xx. 4). And we find some relics of this among the heathen: for, when the Greeks went on ship-board to the Trojan war, Homer represents Jupiter promising them good success in this manner, Iliad. ii. 354:

'Αστραπητειν ἄνθισθαι ὑψιστα σήματα φαινοντα

by "lightning on the right hand of them (as it may be translated), or shining gloriously upon them (as the ancient scholiast expounds it), and making favourable tokens appear to them." In like manner, he gave the same encouragement to the Trojans, when they were going to set upon the Greeks, Iliad. x. 236, 237:

'Αριστείς δι' αυτοῦ Κροκολαθα οὖσα σήματα φαινοντα,

"Jupiter giving them good signs, lightened upon them." And thunder sometimes accompanying these flashes of lightning (as it did on Mount Sinai), Virgil makes him to have established covenants in that manner (Ensid. xii. 390). Where, after Æneas had called 5 But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wretched, and his countenance fell.

6 And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth, and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou dost not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.

7 And Cain talked with Abel his brother; and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.

8 ¶ And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?

9 And he said, What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.

10 And now art thou cursed from the earth, who, if he would do well, as Abel had done, should find favour no less than he. Secondly, That there was no reason he that did ill should fare like him that did well; but quite contrary, should feel the marks of God's displeasure. And yet, Thirdly, This should not alter his civil right, nor give Abel any authority over him; but he should still retain the privilege of his birthright; and need fear no harm from his brother, who was his anit and advantage.

9 Ver. 8. Cain talked with [Abel.] Asked him in a friendly manner (as one brother speaks to another) if he would walk into the fields? This seems more likely to me, than that he told him how the Lord had chidden him (as Aben Ezra interprets it), or that he disputed with him about the other world, and the judgment to come, as others have expounded it. Which Mr. Selden very judiciously concludes to have arisen from Onkelos's paraphrase on the foregoing verse, which is this: "If thou amend thy worship (or service of me) shalt thou not be pardoned? but if thou dost not amend it, thy sin shall remain to the day of judgment, in which thou shalt be punished if thou dost not repent; and thou shalt be taken off the earth, and the judgments of the Pentateuch, the dispute which Cain had with Abel about the day of judgment, as a traditional explication of this eighth verse. Lib. vii. de Jure N. et Gen. cap. 4.

In the field.] When he had drawn him from company, and had him alone.

10 Cain rose up against Abel.] Assaulted him on a sudden; and took him at an advantage.

Slew him.] Gave him a stab; or some other way wounded him; so as to shed his blood. Ver. 11.

11 Ver. 9. Where is thy brother?] Which is not spoken as if he was ignorant, but to awake Cain, and make him sensible, that he knew what had passed.

Knowest thou?] I can give no account of him. Ver. 10. What hast thou done?] Consider what a heinous crime thou hast committed; which cannot be concealed from me. For Thy brother Abel crieth, &c.] Calls for speedy and severe vengeance. In the Hebrew it is bloods, in the plural number; because, say the Hebrew doctors, he killed Abel and all his posterity, which were in his loins: according to what we read, 2 Kings ix. 26, "I have seen the blood of Naboth, and the blood of his sons (though we read of nobody stoned but himself), saith the Lord, and I will require thee in this blood, &c." See Sanhedrin, cap. iv. and Excerpt. Germa, cap. vi. N. 7. a Job. Coch.
and which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand;
12 When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.
13 And Cain said unto the Lord, My punishment is greater than I can bear.
14 Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.
15 And the Lord said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.
16 And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden.
17 And Cain knew his wife, and she conceived from her husband. And Cain built a city, and called the name of the city Enoch.

Ver. 11. Thou art cursed from the earth, &c.] I pass a sentence of perpetual banishment upon thee, from this country; which hath drunk in the blood of thy brother. Hitherto Adam and his children had lived together; but now, as Aben Ezra well observes, Cain was banished into a region far off from his father, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of Paradise.

Ver. 12. When thou tillest the ground, &c.] And wheresoever thou shalt heeve the earth, which thou tillest, shall be barren; and not bring forth answerable to thy labour.

A fugitive, &c.] Wandering up and down in unknown regions. Every one that findeth me shall slay me.] I shall be looked upon as a common enemy: so that whosoever lights upon me, taking me for a dangerous person, will kill me. To find another, in Scripture language, signifies to fall upon him by chance or unawares; without any precedent hatred: as Bochart observes, the vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.

Ver. 15. Therefore whoso slayeth Cain, &c.] Or, (as the word we translate therefore may be rendered) others) it shall not be as thou suspectest. But Lub. de Dieu gives many instances where this word signifies is used as an affirmative, signifying as much as surely. So the meaning is, Take it for a certain truth, that if any man slay Cain, he (that is Cain) shall be avenged sevenfold; or rather, through seven generations, God will punish the slaughter of Cain a long time: for the number seven being tripled and squared (as the Chronic. Excerpt, before Job, Antiochus speaks) "an indication of an indeterminate, but great number;" signifying as much as he shall endure many punishments. For God intended the life of Cain should be prolonged, in a miserable estate, as an example of his vengeance; to deter others from committing the like misdeeds. Accordingly we read, presently after this, that Cain had a wife; and more than that, he built a city: which supposes a great company of people to inhabit it (ver. 17). And here, by the way, we need not wonder there is no mention made of the institution of sacrifices; when the first peopling of the world is only supposed, not related.

From the presence of the Lord.] There was a Divine glory, called by the Jews the Shechinah, which appeared from the beginning (as I have often said before); the sight of which Cain never after this enjoyed; but was banished from it: and God withdrawing his gracious presence from him, so entirely shut out of his special protection. If Cain, after this, turned a downright idolater (as many think), it is very likely he introduced the worship of the sun (which was the most ancient sort of idolatry), as the best resemblance he could find of the glory of the C.
and bare Enoch: and he built a city, and called the name of the city, after the name of his son, Enoch.

Lord: which was wont to appear in a flaming light.
And in aftertimes they worshipped fire, in the eastern countries; as the best emblem of the sun, when it was absent.

The land of Nod.] At last he settled in a country, which had the name of Nod; from his wandering up and down, like a vagabond, till he fixed here: where, it seems, he still continued restless and moving from part of the country to another, till, in conclusion, "he built a city" (for his security, some think), as we read in the verse following.

Some translate it, in the land of vagabonds. And R. Solomon fancies the very ground shaken under him, and made people run away from him, saying, "This is the cruel man that will slay his brother.

The east of Eden.] He still went eastward from that country, that Adam settled after he was thrust out of paradise. See iii. 24. Which Junius thinks was in that tract of ground where the Nomades afterwards dwelt, bordering upon Susiana. Which is far more probable, than the conceit of the author of the book of Job (par. ii. § 14), who would have Cain's going "from place to place", as the Lord consented to his request, but his expulsion out of the land of Canaan, where Adam dwelt after he was thrust out of paradise: and consequently the land of Nod was not far from the land of Canaan. Nothing can be more ungrounded than this; which overthrows, also, all that Moses saith of Eden, and the garden planted there: from whence Adam went out on the east side, and therefore not towards Canaan, which was westward.

Ver. 17. And Cain knew his wife.] There hath been no mention hitherto of any woman in the world but Eve, much less of Cain's having a wife. And therefore it is uncertain whether this were a wife he took before he killed his brother, or after. It is most probable he married her before; because we may well think all the world had harboured the thoughts of marriage with such an impious murderer, whom God also had accursed. But whether it were before or after, I see no reason to conclude that this wife was his sister: there being women beside in the world, before this time, as was said before. For even in our country, in the age before us, there sprang from common persons, three hundred and sixty-seven children, within the space of eighty years. And therefore, the world being now (when Cain slew Abel) a hundred and twenty-eight, or a hundred and thirty years old, according to Abp. Usher, and Jachet's Chronology, we cannot but conceive there were a great number of people in it, descended from all those sons and daughters which Adam begot (chap. v. 4). We are not told how many, but some of the ancient eastern traditions (in Cedrenus) say, he had thirty-three sons and twenty-seven daughters.

It is true, indeed, that at the first Cain could marry none but one of his sisters. Which was then lawful because absolutely necessary: and prohibited by God when that necessity ceased. Of which the eastern people were so sensible, that they took care to have it thought, that Cain and Abel did not marry those who were nearest akin to them, but those that were at some distance. For their tradition is, that Eve at her birth bore two fratellins, brought twins, a son and a daughter; viz. Cain with his sister, and Abel with his sister Avin; as Suidus Patricles, patriarch of Alexandria, reports. Now such was their caution not to match with those that were nearest in blood, but with those further off, as much as was then possible; Cain was not suffered to marry his twin-sister, nor Abel.

his: but Adam gave Awin to Cain, and Azzon to Abel. I cannot vouch the truth of this story; which I mention only to show, that mankind have had a sense, that all possible care should be used to avoid marriages with the nearest relations: for though this story was derived, perhaps, from the Jews, yet it was believed by other people. See Mr. Selden, lib. v. De Juris Gent. cap. 4. Hence Diodorus Siculus says, lib. i. it was κατά τινα ἐπαγόρα, "the common use of mankind," that brothers and sisters should not be joined in marriage. And Plato (lib. viii. de Legib.) calls such marriages περάσας ὡς καὶ Σιναγογή, "by no means holy, but hateful to God." For though they were not so in the beginning of things, they became criminal, and that being natural on both sides of things (as Grotius well observes, lib. de Jure B. et P. cap. 10), which is unnatural in another state.

He built a city.] Not as soon as he came into this country: but when he had a numerous progeny, able to people it; and consequently in his old age. His end in building it, some think, was to cross the curse of wandering to and fro; others, to defend himself against the enemies of his posterity; others, to confirm his name and fear; or, to secure the spoils which, by force and violence (as Josephus relates, lib. i. Antiq. cap. 3), he had taken from others. There are those who imagine that when he attempted to build this city, he often broke off the work, out of a panic fear; such a one as Romulus felt, after he had killed his brother Remus.

Called the name of the city, &c.] Some think he declined his own name, because he knew it to be odious everywhere: but it is more likely, it was for that reason which moved men in aftertimes to do the same. For it hath been a very ancient usage for great men to call the cities which they built by the name of their sons, rather than of their own: out of the great love they bare to their children. Thus Nimrod called Niniveh after the name of his son Nimas: which the psalmist notes as a piece of the vanity of mankind, to call their lands (that is, the houses where they dwell, as R. Solomon Jarchi interprets it) by their own names, to be a lasting monument of them and of their family. Enoch: and Nimrod: and Lamech: and the rest: and Pliny, Heniochi; by Menelaus, and Enochi; and by Lucan, Enochi: some of which lived so far eastward, that Sir W. Raleigh fancies they might be the posterity of this Enoch.

Ver. 18. Unto Enoch was born Ira; and Ira begat Mehujael; and Mehujael begat Methusael; and Methusael begat Lamech.

It is remarkable, that though Moses gives us some account of the descendants of Cain, yet he saith not a word of the years that they lived; and carries his genealogy but a little way. Whereas he deduces the genealogy of Seth down to the flood, and so to his own time, &c. And also relates particularly (chap. 5), to what age the life of his principal posterity was prolonged. It seems, he looked upon Cain's race as such a reprobate generation, that he would not number them in the book of the living: as St. Cyril speaks.

Ver. 19. Lamech took unto him two wives.] By a small transposition of letters, Lamech being the same with Melech, which signifies a king, some of the Jews fancy him to have been a great man: for none but such, they say, had two wives in those ancient times; and through that hence they called him Libech (lib. v. De Juris Gent. et P. cap. 6), for any body that could maintain them to have had more. But it is more likely that Lamech was the first that adventured to transgress the original institution; which was observed even by the Cainites till this time. When, perhaps his earnest desire of seeing that blessed seed which was promised to Eve, might induce him to take more wives than one; hoping, by multiplying his posterity, some other of them might prove so happy as to produce that seed. And this he might possibly persuade himself was the more likely, because the right that was in Cain the first-born, he might now conclude was revived in himself: who, being the seventh from Cain, had some reason to imagine the curse laid upon him, of being punished sevenfold, l. e. for seven generations, was now executed on his posterity restored to the right of filling the promise.

Ver. 19. And Lamech took unto him two wives: the name of the one was Adah, and the name of the other Zillah. 20 And Adah bare Jabal: he was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle. 21 And his brother's name was Jubal: he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ. 22 And Zillah, she also bare Tubal-cain, an instructor of every artificer in brass or iron; and the sister of Tubal-cain was Naamah.

23 And Lamech said unto his wives, Adah and Zillah, hear my voice; ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech: for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt: 24 If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold.

Ver. 22. Tubal-cain.] The Arabianst still call a plate of iron or brass by the name of Tubal (as Bochart observes out of Avicenna, and others, lib. iii. Phaenec. cap. 12.), who, as it follows in the text, was an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron. i.e. found out the art of melting metals, and making all sorts of weapons, arms and other instruments of iron and brass. Many think that Vulcan is the same with Tubal-cain (their names being not unlike); particularly Gecch. Vossius, De Orig. Idololi, l. i. cap. 16. Naamah. Neither Vossius (ib. cap. 17.) takes it to have been the heathen Minerva, or Venus. Her name signifies beautiful, or fair, one of a sweet aspect: and the Arabians say, she invented colours and painting as Jubal did music. See Elmacinus. p. 8.

Ver. 23. And Lamech said—Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech. And in these words, which were the occasion of them: but it is hard to find what it was. Jacobus Capellus, indeed (in his Historia Sacra et Exotica), hath a conceit that Lamech was now in a vapouring humour, being puffed up with the glory of his sons' inventions; to whose music and other arts he endeavoured to add poetry: which had been expressed in the following line, as a threnodial hymn, wherein he brags what feats he would do. For so he reads the words (with Aben Ezra), not I have slain, but I will kill a man with one blow of my fist, &c. But I can see no warrant for this translation, without a violence to the Hebrew text; and therefore we must seek for another interpretation.

I have slain a man, &c.] These words would have a plain exposition (which otherwise are difficult), if we could give credit to the Hebrew tradition; which, St. Hierom says, several Christians followed: that Lamech, being informed by a certain youth, as he was hunting, that there was a wild beast lay lurking in a secret place, went thither; and unawares killed Cain, who lay hid there; and then, in a rage at what he had done, fell upon the youth that had occasioned this mistake, and beat him to death. But, as there is no certainty of this, so it doth not agree with the next verse: which seems to suppose Cain to be now alive. Therefore, Lud. De Dieu, following Onkelos, reads the words by way of interrogation; "Have I slain a man? or, &c." that you should be afraid of my life! It seems the use of weapons being found out by one of his sons, and grown common, his wives apprehended that somebody or other might make use of them to slay him. But he bids them comfort themselves, for he was not guilty of slaying any body himself: and therefore might reasonably hope nobody would hurt him.

And then the meaning of the next verse is easy.

Ver. 24. If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold,] If God hath guarded Cain so strongly, who was a murderer, as to threaten great and long punishments to those that slay him; he will punish them far more, and pursue them with a longer vengeance, who shall slay me, being a guide these people.

There are divers other interpretations, which I shall...
CHAPTER V.

1 The genealogy, age, and death of the patriarchs from Adam unto Noah. 24 The godliness and translation of Enos.

I Thus is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him;

26 And to Seth, to him also there was born a son; and he called his name Enos: then began men to call upon the name of the Lord.

2 Male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created.

As for the collateral lines, which, no doubt, were very many, by the other sons and daughters which the persons here mentioned begot, they are omitted: because no more than I have said, was pertinent to Moses's purpose.

In the day This is repeated again, only to imprint on their minds that Adam was not produced, like other men, by generation, but by creation.

In the likeness of God This also is again mention-

Natural History, lib. viii. cap. 48. Nay, in times nearer to us, there are instances of this kind, as the Lord Bascon observes, in his Hist. Civ. et Mortis; and Bartholin, in his Hist. Anat. Rariorum, Cent. v. Hist. 28.

But nothing is more remarkable than that which Gassendus reports in the life of Nic. Petreskius, lib. vi. That he esteem'd a letter from Aleppo, no longer ago than the year 1636, a mark of the highest honour to several persons worthy to be believed, who was four hundred years old: Iudaeus omnino esse expeditionem atque inditum: and the persons that wrote this, were fully assured of the undoubted truth of it.

Such instances indeed are rare; and there is one that thinks men did not generally live to such a great age in the old world: For Maimonides is of opinion, that none attained to so many years as are here mentioned, but only the particular persons expressly named by Moses; all the rest of mankind, in those days, living only the ordinary term which man did in aftertimes: or, in other words, this extraordinary length of days, was the privilege only of these singular individuals, born before the deluge, and far removed, rather than those occasions are not so very rare: for instance, the physician Peireskius, some time, according to some, 1300 years ago, by being an hundred years old, was deified and worshipped for a god, under the name of Anatharpochar. The Phœnicians were great magicians: and even the Egyptian history shows, that those sciences were so highly esteemed, that during the time of Num. i. 2, the Egyptians were acquainted with the science of Geometry, and the Art of Astronomy; and the Church Fathers, not from any authority of their own, but because Moses had condemned those sciences, which are the invention of Satan, to the unlearned and unholy vulgar.
6 And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos:
7 And Seth lived after he begat Enos eight hundred and seven years, and begat sons and daughters:
8 And all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years: and he died.
9 And Enos lived ninety years, and begat Cainan:
10 And Enos lived after he begat Cainan eight hundred and fifteen years, and begat sons and daughters:
11 And all the days of Enos were nine hundred and five years: and he died.
12 And Cainan lived seventy years, and begat Mahalaleel:
13 And Cainan lived after he begat Mahalaleel eight hundred and forty years, and begat sons and daughters:
14 And all the days of Cainan were nine hundred and ten years: and he died.
15 And Mahalaleel lived sixty and five years, and begat Jared:

Capellus (in his Hist. Sacra et Exot.), Ne fatale nec cibo quod omen nominibus propriis effingamus:—"that we should not fancy there is, we do not know what fatal omen in proper names." The wickedness of Judas Iscariot did not make the other Judas, called by that name, to think the worse of it. And therefore Jared feared not to call his son Enoch, by the very name of Cain's eldest son (iv. 17). And Methuselah also gave his son Lamech the name of one of Cain's grandchildren (iv. 18).

Ver. 19. Mahalaleel.] This name imports as much as a praiser of God: which Cainan imposed upon this son of his (as Jacobus Capellus fancies), because he was born after he had lived ten weeks of years (i. e. when he was seventy years old), in the beginning of the sabbatic year; which was the eighth jubilee from the creation. For, as there were sacrifices and a distinction of clean beasts and unclean, so he conceives there might be a distribution of years by sevens or weeks (as they spoke in aftertimes), from the very beginning of the world. But there is no certainty of this; nor of what the forenamed Arabian writers say of this Mahalaleel, that he made his children swear by the blood of Abiel (so Patricides), not to come down from the mountainous country where they dwelt, to converse with the children of Cain.

He is mentioned also by the Mahometans, as Hottinger observes in his Histor. Orient, p. 20.

Ver. 15. Jared.] The same Arabian writers make him also a strictly pious man, and an excellent govern- or: but say, that in his days some of Seth's posterity (about a hundred in number), notwithstanding all his persuasions to the contrary, would go down and converse with the children of Cain, by whom they were corrupted. And then, he fancy, he was called Jared (which signifies descending), either because they went down from the Holy Mountain, as they call it, where Seth's posterity dwelt; or pietly, in his time, began very much to decline. See Hottinger's Smegma Orient, lib. i. cap. 8, p. 235, &c.

Ver. 18. Enoch.] Whom the Arabsians call Edris; and represent him as a very learned man, as well as a profoundly skilled in astronomy. See Hottinger, Histor. Orient, lib. i. cap. 3, and Smegma Orient, p. 240. The Greeks anciently had the same notion of him, as appears by a discourse of Eupolemus, which Eusebius quotes out of Alexand. Polyhistor.

16 And Mahalaleel lived after he begat Jared eight hundred and thirty years, and begat sons and daughters:
17 And all the days of Mahalaleel were eight hundred ninety and five years: and he died.
18 ¶ And Jared lived an hundred sixty and two years, and he begat Enoch:
19 And Jared lived after he begat Enoch eight hundred years, and begat sons and daughters:
20 And all the days of Jared were nine hundred sixty and two years: and he died.
21 ¶ And Enoch lived sixty and five years, and begat Methuselah:
22 And Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah three hundred years, and begat sons and daughters:
23 And all the days of Enoch were three hundred sixty and five years:
24 And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him.
25 And Methuselah lived an hundred eighty and seven years, and begat Lamech:
26 And Methuselah lived after he begat Lamech, lib. ix. Prepar. Evang. c. 17, where he says, Enoch was the first who taught the knowledge of the stars, and that he himself was taught, τὸ λάτωμα τοῦ θεοῦ, "by the angels of God;" and was the same person with whom the Greeks call Atlas. Certain it is, his story was not altogether unknown to the ancient Greeks, as appears in what they say of Aρλες, or Καώναρες, which is the same with Enoch, whose name in Hebrew is Chas-
27 Noah. For Stephanus, in his book De Urbibus, says, that this Annaceus lived above three hundred years, and the oracle told the people, that when he died they should all perish: as they did in the flood of Deucalion: in which he confounds the history of Enoch and Methuselah, as Bochart well observes (lib. ii. Phaeg. cap. 13).

Ver. 21. Methuselah.] Enoch being a prophet (as we learn from St. Jude), and foreseeing the destruction that was coming upon the earth by a deluge, immediately after the death of this son of his, gave him this name of Methuselah, which imports as much. For the first part of it, Methu, evidently carries in it the name of death, being as much as he dies; and sela signifies "the sending forth of water," in Job v. 10. And therefore Methusala is as much as "when he is dead shall ensue an emission or inundation of waters," to the destruction of the whole earth. Which ingeneous conjecture of Bochartus (in his Phaeg. lib. ii. cap. 13) is far more probable than any other account of his name.

Ver. 22. Enoch walked with God.] Of all the rest, Moses only says, they lived after they begat these sons here mentioned; but of this man, that he walked with God: i. e. was not only sincerely obedient to God (as we suppose his forefathers to have been), but of an extraordinary sanctity, beyond the rate of other holy men: and held on also in a long course of such singular piety, notwithstanding the wickedness of the age wherein he lived. And the very same character being given of Noah (vi. 9), it may incline us to believe, that, as Noah was a preacher of righteousness, so Enoch, being a prophet, was not only exemplary in his life, but also severely reproved the wickedness of that nation. See ibid. The history of Methuselah, though in the Pseudepigrapha, yet gives much light in the understanding of the genealogies of the patriarchs.

Ver. 24. Enoch walked with God.] Persevered in that course before mentioned, to the end of his days.

And he was not.] He doth not say that he died (as he doth of the rest in this chapter, both before and mech seven hundred eighty and two years, and begat sons and daughters:
27 And all the days of Methuselah were nine hundred sixty and nine years: and he died.
28 And Lamech lived an hundred eighty and two years, and begat a son:
29 And he called his name Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work after), but that he was not any longer among men in this world. For,

God took him.] Translated him to another place. Which plainly signifies the different manner of his leaving this world; insomuch, that the apostle saith, "he did not see death" (Heb. xi. 5), which confutes the conceit of Aben Ezra, and R. Solomon, and others, who would have this word took to signify, that he was snatched away by an untimely death: contrary to the opinion of their other better authors, and particularly Manachem, who, in his commentary on this place, saith, "That God took from Enoch his bodily clothes, and gave him spiritual raiment."

But whither he was translated, we are not told. This is a question, which some of the Fathers in their commentaries have thus engaged in dispute. The most celebrated of these are, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Chalcedon, and all the rest. Hence the Ethiopian interpreter hath added these words to the text: "God translated him into paradise;" as Ludolphus observes (lib. iii. Commentar, in Eulog. Hist. cap. 5, n. 40).

And accordingly we find, in the calendar of that entire epoch of the world, the 25th of July, called "The Assumption of Enoch into Heaven" (for they were not so foolish as to understand by paradise a place upon earth, but a heavenly mansion), unto which he was advanced, εἰς ἀγαθὸν ὀρέξεις τρισίων (as Eusebius speaks, lib. vii. Praepar. Evangel. cap. 8), "because of his consummate virtue."

And it is no unreasonable conjecture, that God was graciously pleased to take him unto himself at this time, to support and comfort mankind in their state of mortality (Adam, the father of them all, being dead not above fifty-seven years before), with the hope of a better life, in the other world. For which reason, it is not improbable, that he was translated in some such visible manner, as Elijah afterward was, by "a fiery chariot," (2 Chron. xxv. 18) called "The Assumption of Enoch into Heaven" (for they were not so foolish as to understand by paradise a place upon earth, but a heavenly mansion), unto which he was advanced, εἰς ἀγαθὸν ὀρέξεις τρισίων (as Eusebius speaks, lib. vii. Praepar. Evangel. cap. 8), "because of his consummate virtue."

Ver. 25. Begat Lamech.] The same name with one of Cain's posterity (iv. 18). But as he was of another race, so he was the grandchild and the father of the best men in those days, viz. Enoch and Noah.

Ver. 27. All the days of Methuselah, &c.] What was wanting in the days of his father, God, in some sort, made up in his age; which was extended to the longest term of all other men. He died in the very year of the deluge, according to the import of his name. See ver. 31.

Ver. 29. Noah.] Which signifies rest, or refreshment, which proceeds from rest and quiet. Because, says he:

This same shall comfort us, &c.] He expected, some think, that he should be the blessed seed, promised iii. 15; or that it should spring immediately from him. But the last words, toil of our hands, seem to impart some inferior consolation, which he expected from Noah: and the Hebrew interpreters generally expound it thus, "He shall make our labour in tilling the earth more easy and less toilsome to us." Which agrees to what follows:

Because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed.] There was a general curse upon it for the sin of Adam; and a particular upon some part of it for the sin of Cain. Now God, he foretells, would take them both off in great measure, and bless the earth to the posterity of this same man; who perfected the art of husbandry, and found out lighter instruments for ploughing the earth than had been known before. When men being chiefly employed in digging and throwing up earth, they came to an opinion, that they could not place their hands in the poorest ground, which which now is much abated, because the pains lie more upon beasts than upon men. And, indeed, Noah is called (ix. 20) Ish haadaham, a man of the ground (which we translate a husbandman); one that improved agriculture, as other famous men had done pasturage, and found out other arts (vi. 20, &c.).

Ver. 28. And Lamech was five hundred years old: and Noah begat Shem, Ham, Japheth.

Ver. 32. Noah was five hundred years old.] See ver. 6, where I have said enough to show it is not reasonable to think he had no children till this age of his life.

Noah begat Shem, &c.] Here ends the line of Adam before the flood. For though these three were married, as appears vii. 13, before the flood came; yet they either had no children, or they did not live: for they carried none with them into the ark.

It doth not follow that Shem was the eldest of these three, because he is here and every where else in this book mentioned first; for I shall show plainly, in its due place, that Japheth was the eldest (x. 21). Sealing, indeed, would have this a settled rule, that, Hune ordinem filii in Scripturam habent, quum illius natura dedit. "That children are placed in Scripture, according to the order which nature hath given them," But it is apparent from many instances, that the Scripture hath regard to their dignity other ways. If it do not so place, also (Gen. x. 29), we read that Abraham is named before Nahor and Haran, merit excellentis, "with respect to his excellency" (as St. Austin speaks), to which God raised him, though he was not the eldest son of Terah (Gen. xi. 28). Thus, Jacob is mentioned before Esau (Mal. i. 1), and Isaac before Ishmael (1 Chron. i. 28). Thus, Shem's eminence in other respects, placed him before Japheth, to whom he was inferior in the order of nature; as appears even from their genealogy both in Gen. x. and 1 Chron. i., where Shem's posterity is placed before those of both his other brothers.
CHAPTER VI.

1 And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, 2 That the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. When men began to multiply To increase exceeding fast; for they were multiplied before, but not so as to fill the earth. Or the word men may be limited to the children of Cain (see ver. 2), who now began to be very numerous.

And daughters were born unto them. In great numbers; for daughters, no doubt, they had before; but now so many more daughters than sons, that they had not matches for all: no, though we should suppose they followed the steps of Lamech (chap. iv. 19), and took more wives than one.

Ver. 2. The sons of God There are two famous interpretations of these words (both of which is the same of the ancients, who took them for angels). Some understand by the sons of God, the great men, nobles, rulers, and judges, whether they were of the family of Seth or of Cain; and indeed, the word Elohim signifies in many places (Exod. xxi. 6, xxii. 23, &c.) and the ancient Greek version, which Philo and St. Austin used, perhaps meant no more, where these words are translated ο εαυτος η του θεου, the angels of God, his great ministers in this world; who, in aftertimes, were mistaken for angels in heaven. These great persons were taken with the beauty of the daughters of men, i.e. of the meaner sort (for sometimes men signifies, Ps. xlix. 2, &c.), and took, by force and violence, as many as they pleased; being so potent as to be able to do anything with impunity. For they that should have given a good example, and punished worse, were the great promoters of it.

But there are other ancient interpreters, and most of them, who, by the sons of God, understand the posterity of Seth, who were worshippers of the true God (iv. ult.).

Saw the daughters of men. Conversed with the daughters of Cain. So Tho. Aquinas himself interprets it, pars 1. q. 51, art. 3 ad 6.

That they were fair. Being excessively taken with their beauty.

And they took them wives. Made matches with them, and perhaps took more than one apiece.

Of all which they chose. Whomsoever they liked (so the word choose is used in many places, Ps. xxv. 12, &c.), without regard to any thing else but their beauty. Some of the Hebrews by daughters understand virgins, which they distinguish from maris, wives, or married women; whom they also took, and married as they pleased. But there is no evidence of this. The plain sense is, that they who had liethro kept themselves (unless it was some few, see ver. 15) unmingled with the posterity of Cain, according to a solemn charge which their godly forefathers had given them, when they were first given to them in marriage, and made one people with them. Which was the greater crime, if we can give any credit to what an Arabic writer saith (mentioned first by Mr. Selden, in his book De Diis Syris, cap. 3, Prolegom. et de Jure N., et G. lib. v. cap. 8, f. 57v.), that the children of Seth had sworn by the blood of Abel, that they would never leave the mountainous country which they inhabited, to go down into the valley where the children of Cain lived. The other interpreters, (who are interpreters, with Ezechias also), says, that they were inveigled to break this oath by the beauty of Naamah, before mentioned (iv. 22), and the music of her brother Jubal. For the Cainites spent their time in feasting, music, dancing, and sports; which allured the children of Seth to come down and marry with them. Whereby all manner of filthiness and uncleanness were brought into the whole earth, and that with impunity, as Eusebius observes (lib. vii. Prepar. cap. 8). This Moses here takes notice of, that he might give the reason why the whole posterity of Seth, even those who sprung from that holy man Enoch (except Noah and his family), were overthrown with the deluge, as well as the rest of Cain's posterity, because they had defiled themselves with their cursed affinity, and thereby were corrupted with their wicked manners.

Ver. 3. The Lord said, Resolved with himself. My Spirit Either speaking by his prophets, such as Enoch had been, and Noah was; or working inwardly in all men's hearts.

Shall not always strive Chide and reprove them, and thereby endeavour to bring them to repentance; but proceed to punish them. There are several other interpretations, which may be seen in all commentators: which to me seem more forced than this. For that he also is flesh For that besides his wicked actions, he is grown wholly fleshy in his inclinations and affections. He savours nothing but carnal things; and consequently all his actions are carnal. Or, as others explain it, even the best of them (the children of Seth) are become fleshy men.

Yet his days I will not destroy mankind presently; but have patience with them so long that it may appear I would willingly have saved them.

Ver. 4. Giants. Men of vast stature and strength, which tempted them to oppress others by violence: for so several of the ancients translate the Hebrew word nephilim, by θαυματικον, violent men, who carried all before them by main force; tyrants who filled the world with rapines and murders, and all manner of wickedness, having society with the devil (as Eusebius understands it, lib. vii. Prepar. cap. 8) in infernal arts, which they introduced. Josephus calls them φαρακος και παρεκεκεραν χαος, insolent contemners of all the laws of God and man. Which made Origen look upon them only as impious atheists: but, no doubt, the extraordinary bulk and strength of their body is also intended.

In these days i.e. Before the sons of God married with the daughters of men. For these giants were produced by those who went down and mixed with the posterity of Cain in the days of Jared: as both Ezechias and Patricides understand it.

They bare children. The word children is not in the Hebrew: and it better agrees with what goes CHAPTER VI.

God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children unto them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown.

5 ¶ And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.

6 And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart.

7 And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them.

8 But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.

9 ¶ These are the generations of Noah:

before to translate it, “Even they bare giants unto them.” Besides those which were before, there was a new race of gigantic persons begot by the sons of God upon the daughters of men.

Men of renown. Of great power, as well as strength of body.

Which were of old. This may refer either to what goes before, or to that which follows.

Every imagination. And that there were no hopes of their amendment; their very minds being so set upon wickedness, that they thought of nothing else but how to satisfy their lusts. In the margin it is, “their whole imagination,” i.e. all the designs and contrivances of all the men of that age, and this continually, day and night, were only rapine, filthiness, and all manner of evil.

Ver. 5. The wickedness of man was great, &c. All sorts of wickedness in a high degree overspread the whole earth.

Every imagination, &c. And that there were no hopes of their amendment; their very minds being so set upon wickedness, that they thought of nothing else but how to satisfy their lusts. In the margin it is, “their whole imagination,” i.e. all the designs and contrivances of all the men of that age, and this continually, day and night, were only rapine, filthiness, and all manner of evil.

Ver. 7. I will destroy man, &c. Though they be my creatures, I am resolved to have no pity upon them, but to abolish them, and all things else upon the earth. For that sort of punishment which God intended, would in its own nature sweep all away.

For it repenteth me that I have made them. See ver. 6. This represents how highly God was offended, that he would leave nothing of the old world remaining, but only to preserve the seed of a new one.

Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God.

10 And Noah begat three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

11 The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence.

12 And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth.

13 And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth.

14 ¶ Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch.

15 And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be

And perfect in his generations, Not guilty of any of those other sins which every where abounded.

Noah walked with God. Not only did well, but was addicted (as we speak) to it; continuing constant in the way of righteousness.

Ver. 11. The earth also was corrupt The Jewish doctors say, that by corruption is always understood either filthiness (or forbidden mixtures), or else idolatry. Some take the first to be here meant; and then the former words, “filled with violence,” denote the perverting of justice, taking bribes, and oppressing men by open force. But others think it better by corruption to understand idolatry; and then this generation is accused of the two highest crimes that can be committed; the one of which is between man and his neighbour, and the other between man and God. The highest degree of the former is, when they that sit in judgment make unrighteous decrees: which R. Solomon thinks is principally meant in these words, “the earth was filled with violence.” See Mr. Selden, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 9, latter end. However we understand the words, they point out some special enormous sins, which are only comprehended in general words, for it is, The earth was满了 corruption.

Ver. 13. God looked upon the earth, &c. No fruits of God’s long-suffering appearing, he resolved to visit men for their wickedness; which had rather increased than been lessened, by his forbearing them one hundred and twenty years: which now, we must suppose, drew near to an end (ver. 13). The observation of some of the Hebrew doctors, perhaps, is too curious, which is that the name of Jachin, which we translate Lord, is used ver. 3, where the first mention is made of this matter; for it betokens the eleemosyne of the divine Majesty, till the one hundred and twenty years were out, and then Moses uses the word Elohim, which is a name of judgment: the time of which was come.

Ver. 14. All flesh (i.e. all men) had corrupted his way Wholly departed from the rule of righteousness; or had made their way of life abominable throughout the whole world.

Ver. 13. The end of all flesh is come before me I am determined to make an end of (i.e. to destroy) all mankind shortly. So it follows: I will destroy them with the earth. I.e. With all the beasts and fowls of the earth. Or, from the earth, as it is in the margin.

Ver. 14. An ark This vessel was not in the form of one of our ships, or boats: for it was not made sharp forward to cut the waves, but broad like a chest; and therefore had a flat bottom, with a cover or a roof.
three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits.

16 A window shalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit shalt thou finish it above; and the door of the ark shalt thou set in the side thereof; with lower, second, and third stories shalt thou make it.

17 And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven.

We do not find it had any rudder, being steered by angels.

Of gopher-wood. There are various opinions about gopher, which some take for cedar, others for pine, &c.; but our learned Nic. Fuller, in his Miscellanies, hath observed, that it is nothing else but that which the Greeks call wsuwsu, the cypress tree. For, taking away the termination, supar and gopher differ very little in their sound. Bochart has confirmed this, and shown that no country abounds so much with this wood as that part of Assyria which was about Damascus, where it is called papyrus, and in other places, wherein of these trees, τοις γαρ τωι των δεκα τεσσαρων εναι ειναι τη χωρα των Ασσυρων, &c. (lib. vii.) “For there is great plenty of these trees alone in the country of Assyria; but of other fit for making ships there is great scarcity.” Strabo saith the same (lib. xvi.); from whence Bochart thinks it probable, that Noah, and his children lived in this country before the flood; for it is not likely that such a vast bulk as the ark was carried far from the place where it was made: and the mountains of Arrarat, which he will have to be the Gordian mountains, are upon the borders of Assyria northward; which way the wind blew (if there were any) in all likelihood; the rain coming from the north, (l. Ptol. i. 10.)

Rooms. Little cabins or cells; to sever the beasts from the birds; the clean beasts from the unclean; and to preserve their several sorts of food.

Pitch it, &c.] So the Arabic translation expressly, “pitch it with pitch.” For the bitumen, which was plentiful thereabouts (which others think is here meant), was of the same nature, and served for the same use with pitch; being very glutinous and tenacious, to keep things close together. But not only the chinks were filled with it, but the whole body of the ark seems to have been all daubed with it.

Without] To give a wholesome scent, some think, among so many beasts.

And without] To make the ark more glib and slippery, to swim in the water more easily.

Ver. 15. This is the fashion, &c.] There are those who take these for geometrical cubits; every one of which contains six of the common. But there is no need of such: for, taking them for common cubits, containing each only one foot and a half; it is demonstrable there might be room enough in the ark for all sorts of beasts, birds, women, and family, and their necessary provision (see ver. 20).

Ver. 16. A window] To let in the light into the several apartments: for which, should we conceive, that one great window might be so contrived as to be sufficient; I do not see how that would exclude many little ones, here and there, for greater convenience.

Finish it above.] That is, finish the ark; which had a cover, it is plain, from viii. 13, and was made shelving, that the rain might slide off.

The door of the ark shalt thou set in the side] But on what side, or whereabouts on the side, is not certain. It is probable on one of the long sides, and in the middle of it. Patricides calls it the eastern side.
CHAPTER VII.

15 Noah, with his family, and the living creatures, enter into the ark. 17 The beginning, increase, and continuance of the flood.

I And the Lord said unto Noah, Come thou and all thy house into the ark; for thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation.

2 Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female: and of beasts that are not clean by two, the male and his female.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. Come thou into the ark.] When the time of God's patience was expired, he required him to enter into the ark which he had prepared; and unto which all sorts of creatures were gathered.

For thee have I seen, &c.] I have observed thee sincerely obedient, when all the rest of the world were impious.

Ver. 2. Clean beast, &c.] The distinction of beasts, clean and unclean, being made by the law of Moses, hath given some a colour to say he wrote this book after they came out of Egypt and received the law; which made him speak in that style. But it may be answered to this, that though, with respect to men's food, the distinction of clean and unclean creatures was not before the law; yet some were accounted fit for sacrifice, and others not fit from the which, and many more considerations, it is easy to demonstrate, that there was more than room enough for all sorts of creatures that God commanded to be brought into the ark; and for their food, during the time they stayed in it.

Two of every sort shall come unto thee, &c.] In the foregoing verse he had said, "Two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark." Which he might think impossible; for by what means should he get them altogether! Therefore here it is explained in these words, "that they shall come unto thee;" by the care of God, who made them and moved them to it. R. Elizer (chap. 23 of his Pirke) is commonly censured for saying, "The angels that govern every species of creature brought them thither." But (setting aside the opinion of angels peculiarly presiding over every kind of creature), I see no incongruity in affirming that God, by the ministry of his angels, brought them to the ark; but it is rather agreeable to the Holy Scriptures, which represent the Divine Majesty as employing their services in all affairs here below.

Ver. 21. Take unto thee of all food that is eaten, &c.] Either by man or beast: food suitable to every creature. Among which, though there be many that feed on flesh; yet other food, as several histories testify, will go down to them, when they are accustomed to it. See Philostratus, lib. v. cap. 15. Tzetzes Chil. v. Hist. 9. Sulpit. Severus, De Monacho Thebaid. Dial. i. cap. 7.

Ver. 22. Thus did Noah, &c.] i.e. He made the ark of such dimensions, and laid up provisions for all creatures, as he was directed. This he did when the hundred and twenty years drew towards an end. See ver. 18.

3 Of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and the female; to keep seed alive upon the face of all the earth.

4 For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth.
And Noah did according unto all that the Lord commanded him.

And Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth.

And Noah went in, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him, into the ark, because of the waters of the flood.

For all the beasts, and of beasts that are not clean, and of fowls, and of every thing that creepeth upon the earth,

There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God had commanded Noah.

And it came to pass after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth.

In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.

And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights.

In the selfsame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, into the ark;

They, and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort.

And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life.

The rain continued forty days and forty nights.

of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.

And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights.

In the selfsame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, into the ark;

They, and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort.

And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life.
CHAPTER VII.

And they that went in, went in male and female of all flesh, as God had commanded him: and the Lord shut him in.

And the flood was forty days upon the earth; and the waters increased, and bare up the ark, and it was lift up above the earth.

And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters.

And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered.

Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered.

upon the earth from beneath; and came down pouring from above.

Ver. 19. "Lord shut him in." Or, shut the door after him: closed it so fast, that the waters could not enter, though it was not pitched, as the rest of the ark. How this was done, we need not inquire. It is likely by an angelical power; which, I suppose before, conducted the several creatures into the ark.

Ver. 17. And the flood was forty days, &c.] After forty days the inundation grew strong and mighty (as the Hebrew word signifies); so strong that the waters bore down houses and trees, as some expound it.

Increased greatly] He said before (ver. 17), they were increased, but now, that they were greatly increased. Which must be by more rain still falling on the earth; though not in such uninterrupted showers as during the forty days.

The ark went upon the face of the waters.] Moved, from place to place, as the waves drove it.

Ver. 19. The waters prevailed exceedingly.] This is a higher expression than before; signifying their rising still to a greater pitch by continued rains. And all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered.] There were these anciently, and they have their successors now, who imagined the flood was not universal. 22. is or pote ov etifteov fiaoyen, "but only there where men then dwell:" as they were preserved in the mountainous region round about the ark. See Q. 31. But they are confuted by these words, and by other passages, which say all flesh died. For the truth is, the world was then fully peopled as it is now; and not only inhabited in some parts of it; as may be easily demonstrated, if men would but consider, that in the space of one thousand six hundred and forty-six years, when men so long as they then did, their increase could not but be six times more than hath been in the space of five thousand years, since men's lives are shortened as we now see them. Therefore it is a strange weakness to fancy, that only Palestine, Syria, or Mesopotamia, or some such country, was drowned by the flood; no more of the earth being then inhabited: for those countries could not have held the fourth part of the inhabitants, which were produced between the creation and the flood; nor, all the earth was not more sufficient to contain them; as many have cleary proved.

Plato says, there were in his days, παλαιοι λόγοι, "ancient traditions," which affirmed there had been sundry instances of mankind being drowned by floods, as well as other ways: in which, έπεις τον ξανθων ηλιοτος γαρ, "a small parcel of mankind were left," And particularly he saith concerning floods, that they were so great, that only μεμικα ζωικα, some very little sparks of mankind were saved, and those upon the tops of mountains: and the like he saith of beasts, that σαρκις πνευμα, very few of them were left to support the life of the world. (Edit. Seren.) But this appears to have been an imperfect tradition; the higher mountains having been covered with the waters, as well as the low countries, and that all the earth over: which need not seem strange, if we consider what was said before upon ver. 11. And withal observe, that the diameter of the earth is so high, that, though a clod of earth might conceivably, from the superficies to the centre, no less than three thousand five hundred miles, it is not incredible (as Sir W. Raleigh discourses, lib. i. cap. 7. § 6), that there was water enough in the great deep, which, being forced up from thence, might overflow the loftiest mountains: especially, when water came pouring in; for so fast, that no mountains could prevent it. For there is no mountain, above thirty miles high, upright; which thirty miles being found in the depths of the earth, one hundred and sixteen times; why should we think it incredible that the waters in the earth (three thousand five hundred miles deep) might be well able to cover the space of thirty miles in height? It would help men's Unbelief, if they would likewise consider the vast inundations which are made yearly in Egypt, only from the rains that fall in Ethiopia; and the like overflows yearly, in America, of the great river Oronooko; whereby many islands and plains, at other times inhabited, are laid twenty foot under water, between May and September. Ver. 22. Fifteen cubits upward, &c.] Some read here, πάντα τά εικοσιούς τόπης, and others πάντα τά είκοσι τόπης, which some understand by the highest mountains; but perhaps they prevailed fifteen cubits above the highest mountains; though I do not see but there might be water enough heaped up, by the forementioned means, to cover them so high; and the whole verse be thus interpreted, "The waters prevailed fifteen cubits upwards, after the mountains were covered." Otherwise, by the high kills in the verse, we must understand only such single hills as are in several countries; and by mountains in this verse, those long ridges of hills (such as Caucasus and Taurus, &c.) which stretch themselves many hundreds of miles through a great part of the earth. See viii. 5. Ver. 22. The waters prevailed—an hundred and fifty days.] These words seem to me to import, that whatsoever short intermissions there might be, yet the rain continued a hundred and fifty days. Otherwise, it is hard to explain how the waters increased more and more, as it is said ver. 17, 18, 19. Besides, had the rain ended, as we commonly suppose, at forty days' end, the waters could not have prevailed a hundred and fifty days, but would have sunk much before that time; by reason of the dryness of the earth. And yet they were so far from falling, that (as Mr. Ray hath observed, in his picturesque and learned discourse of the Dissolution of the World) the tops of mountains were not seen till the beginning of the tenth month; that is, till two hundred and seventy days were passed.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 And God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that were with him in the ark: and God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters assuaged. 2 And the fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained; 3 And the waters returned from off the earth continually: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. And God remembered Noah, &c.] Took compassion upon him, and heard his prayers, which we may well suppose he made for himself and for all created at the end of the day: for the word remember is used, xix. 29, xxx. 22. The Hebrew doctors here again took notice of the word Elohim (see vi. 12), which is the name for judges; and observe, that even God’s justice was turned to mercy. Justice itself was satisfied, as Sol. Jareci expresses it.

And God made a wind, &c.] Some gather from hence that, during the full of the rain, there was no storm or violent wind at all; but the rain fell downright. And consequently, the ark was not driven far from the place where it was built: it having no masts, or sails, but moving as a hulk or body of a ship, without a rudder, upon a calm sea. Philo, indeed (in his book De Abrahame), gives quite a different description of the deluge; representing the incessant showers to have been accompanied with dreadful thunder and lightning, storms and tempests. But there is not a word in this story to countenance it.

This wind, it is very probable, was the north wind, which is very drying, and drives away rain (Prov. xxxv. 29), which came, perhaps, out of the south, as I said upon iv. 14. Thus Ovid represents it in the flood of Deucalion, where he saith Jupiter, “Nubila disjecta, nimbiisque Aquilone remotas,” &c.

The waters assuaged.] This drying wind, and the sun, which now began to shine with great power, made the waters fall. For, if the second month, when the flood began, was part of our October and November; then the flood abated (after a hundred and fifty days) in the beginning of May, when the summer came on apace.

Ver. 2. The fountains also of the deep] There was no farther erosion, or blowing up of the water, out of the bowels of the earth.

And the rain—was restrained.] So that the rains ceased at the end of a hundred and fifty days.

Ver. 3. And the waters returned, &c.] The waters, rolling to and fro by the wind, fell by little and little; and, after the end of the hundred and fifty days, began to decrease. So the Vulgar Latin well translates the latter end of this verse, were abated: i. e. began sensibly to decrease.

Ver. 4. The seventh month] Of the year, not of the flood.

Upon the mountains of Ararat, &c.] i. e. Upon one of the mountains, as xix. 29: “God overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt;” i. e. in one of which he dwelt.

4 And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat.

5 And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen.

6 ¶ And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made:

Judg. xii. 7, “Jephthah was buried in the cities of Gilead;” i. e. in one of the cities. For there was no one mountain called by this name of Ararat: but it belonged to a long ridge of mountains, like the Alps or Pyrenean, which are named quite different to one another. And Sir W. Raleigh, I think, truly judged that all the long ridges of mountains, which run through Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, &c. i. e. from Cilicia to Parapousis, are called by Moses Ararat, as by Pliny they are called Taurus. And that author thinks the ark settled in some of the eastern parts of Taurus, because Noah planted himself in that country, not only; for it is likely not to travel far from the place where the ark rested), as appears, he thinks, from Gen. xi. 2, where we read his posterity, when they began to spread, went westward, and built Babel. The common opinion is, that the ark rested in some of the mountains of Armenia, as the vulgar Latin translates the word Ararat; i. e. saith St. Jerome, upon the highest part of Taurus. But Epiphanius (who was before him) saith, upon the Gordianian mountains; and so Jonathan, and Onkelos, and the Nabiniusian geographer, and many others mentioned by Bochartus: who is of this opinion, as having the most authority. Many of which say that some relics of the ark were remaining upon these mountains which (as Theodoret observes upon Isa. iii. 16) were accounted the highest in the whole world. Vid. Phalag. lib. ii. cap. 3, and lib. iv. cap. 33.

There were such remainders of this history among the ancient Seythians, that, in their dispute with the Egyptians about their antiquity, they argue it partly from hence; that if the earth had ever been drowned, their country must needs be first inhabited again, because it was first cleared from the water; being the highest of all other countries in the world.

Thus their argument runs in Justin, lib. ii. cap. 1, where he hath given us a brief relation of it (if we had Troglus, whom he epitomizes, it is likely we should have understood their tradition more perfectly), in this manner: “If all countries were equally drowned in the deep, profecto editissimam quamque partem, we must needs grant the highest parts of the earth were first uncovered of the waters that ran down from them: and the sooner any part was dry, the sooner were animals there generated. Now Seythia is so much raised above all other countries, that all the rivers which rise there run down into the Messes, and so into the Pontic and Egyptian seas,” &c.

Ver. 5. Tenth month.] For the summer’s heat must needs very much dry them up when there was no rain.
CHAPTER VIII.

7 And he sent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth.
8 Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground;
9 But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark, for the waters were on the face of the whole earth; then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark.
10 And he stayed yet other seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark.
11 And the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off; so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth.
12 And he stayed yet other seven days; and sent forth his dove; which returned not again unto him any more.
13 ¶ And it came to pass in the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and, behold, the face of the ground was dry.
14 And in the second month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried.
15 ¶ And God spake unto Noah, saying:

The tops of the mountains seen.] This shows the mountain on which the ark rested was the highest, at least in those parts; because it settled there above two months before the tops of other mountains were seen. And, perhaps, the ark, by its weight, might settle there, while the top of that mountain was covered with water; which, if it is possible, might not appear much before the rest.

Ver. 6. At the end of forty days.] Forty days after the tops of the mountains appeared; i.e. on the eleventh day of the eleventh month, which was about the end of our July.

Ver. 7. He sent forth a raven.] For the same end, no doubt, that the dove was sent forth; to make discovery whether the earth were dry: for, if it were, the smell of the dead carcasses would allure it to fly far from the ark; which it did not, but only hovered about it, as it follows in the next words.

Went forth to and fro.] In the Hebrew more plainly, "going forth and returning." That is, it often went from the ark, and as often returned to it. For after many flights, finding nothing but water, it still betook itself unto the ark; either entering into it, or sitting upon it; till at last the waters being dried up, it returned no more; that is, fifty days after its first going forth (ver. 13). All which time it spent in going out and coming back. Bochart, indeed, approves of the Greek version; which makes the raven "not to have returned while;" but which gives some erroneous reasons (Lib. ii. cap. 12, p. 2, Hierozoic.), and hath such of the Hebrews to countenance him as R. Elien, who saith (Pirke, cap. 23) that "the raven found a carcass of a man upon a mountain, and so would return no more."

But the next words (which in the Greek and Hebrew are both alike) confute this translation.

Until the waters were dried up.] Which make this plain and easy sense, in connection with the foregoing (as they run in the Hebrew), that while the earth continued covered with water, the raven often flew from the ark, but, finding no convenient place to rest in, returned thither again, till the ground was dry. Whereas, according to the Greek, we must suppose the raven gave return to the ark, when the waters were dried up from the ground: which is very absurd. For, if it had sometimes sat upon a carcass floating in the waters before they were dried up, or upon the top of some mountain which already appeared, what should make it return when all the waters were gone everywhere, and not rather while they remained upon the ground?

Ver. 8. He sent forth a dove.] As a proper creature to make further discoveries: being of a strong flight, loving to feed upon the ground, and pick up seeds; and constantly returning to its rest from the remotest places. These two birds (the raven and the dove) some imagine were sent forth upon one and the same day, or but a day between; as Bochartus conjectures. But this doth not agree with ver. 10, where it is said, "Noah stayed yet other seven days," and then sent out the dove again: which relates to seven days preceding; which seem to have passed between the sending out of the raven and of the dove.

Ver. 9. The dove found no rest, &c.] For though the tops of the mountains appeared, yet they continued muddy, as some conceive; or, they were so far off, that the dove could not easily reach them.

Ver. 10. He stayed yet other seven days.] It appears by this, that on the seventh day Noah expected a blessing, rather than sent forth the dove any other day: it being the day devoted from the beginning to religious services. Which he having, it is likely, performed, thereupon sent out the dove upon this day, as he had done before, with hope of good tidings.

Ver. 11. In her mouth was an olive leaf (or branch, the word signifies) plucked off.] Bochart thinks the dove brought this out of Assyria, which abounds with olive trees, and lay south of Ararat: the wind then blowing towards that country from the north. (See Hierozoic. lib. i. cap. 6, p. 2) where he shows, out of many authors, that not only olive trees, but some other also, will live and be green under water. All the difficulty is, how the dove could break off a branch (as the Vulgar translates it) from the tree. But it is easily solved, if we suppose, as I have before said, that now it was summer time; which brought new shoots out of the trees that were easily cropped.

So Noah knew that the waters were abated.] The tops of mountains were seen before (ver. 5), but now he understood the waters had left the lower grounds. Yet not so left them that the dove would stay; the earth, it is likely, remaining very chill.

Ver. 12. He stayed yet other seven days.] See ver. 10. The observation there being confirmed by what is repeated here.

Returned not again.] There wanting neither food, nor a nest wherein to repose itself. By which Noah understood the earth was not only dry, and fit to be inhabited; but that it was not quite spoiled by the flood, but was fit food for all creatures. But it is easily solved, if we suppose, as there before said, that now it was summer time; which brought new shoots out of the trees that were easily cropped.

Ver. 13. Noah removed the covering.] Some of the boards on the top. For he could see further by looking out there, than if he looked out at the door, or window, which gave him a prospect but one way.

The ground was dry.] Quite freed from water, but yet so soft and muddy that it was not fit to be inhabited: as appears by his staying still almost two months more before he thought fit to go out. So the following verse tells us.

Ver. 14. In the second month, &c.] If their months were such as ours, twelve of which make three hundred and sixty-five days, then Noah stayed in the 16 Go forth of the ark, thou, and thy wife, and thy sons, and thy sons' wives with thee.

17 Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, of all flesh, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply upon the earth.

18 And Noah went forth, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him; 19 Every beast, every creeping thing, and every fowl, and whatsoever creepeth upon the earth, after their kinds, went forth out of the ark. 20 And Noah built an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar. 21 And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every thing living, as I have done.

22 While the earth remained, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease.

CHAPTER IX.

1 God bless Noah. 4 Blood and murder are forbidden. 8 God's covenant, 13 signified by the rainbow.

1 And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. And God blessed Noah, &c.] The Divine Majesty appeared now to Noah and his sons; to

2 And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth to assure them of his favour and protection, and to renew the blessing bestowed upon Adam (as after a new creation), saying, "Increase and multiply."
the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered.

3 Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things.

4 But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat.

Ver. 2. The fear of you, &c.] He seems also to confirm to them the dominion which God gave to Adam, at first, over all creatures. Now it seems, that God might not have given man the dominion over all the creatures of the sea and earth, without some other gift; I mean, dominion over himself. So in Exod. 19, it was given to Moses for the people, and delivered to them, when they obeyed, and kept the Sabbath. But the dominion was not so perfectly given, as the people might not have done it before the law was given. But at that time the dominion was so given, that God might, and did, let them eat of every beast, fowl, and fish, of which the Lord spake; (Gen. vi. 20.) and so at this time the dominion was given to the whole race of men.

Ver. 3. Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you, &c.] Here the first grant made to mankind concerning food is enlarged, as St. Basil observes, πρῶτος τομάδια τινων καρπών ἄπαντας συνεχώριζεν. The first legislation granted to them the use of fruits; but now of all living creatures; which they are as freely permitted to eat of; as formerly of all the fruits of the tree of knowledge. The reason of the reason of it was, because they were of the nature of the beast, and food of the beast.

Ver. 4. But flesh with the life thereof, &c.] Here is one exception to the foregoing large grant, that the blood of beasts should not be eaten; just as, at the first creation, the garden was consecrated. And this was, no charter, but are led by some reasonings of their own, not by the Scriptures: unless we will admit such a criticism upon Gen. i. 30, as seems to me very forced. And they would have this also understood only of clean creatures; but I do not find any ground for the distinction of clean and unclean meats, by reference to food, but only to sacrifice, as was said before.

The reason why God now granted the liberty to eat flesh, Abarbinel thinks, was, because otherwise there would not have been food enough for Noah and his sons: the fruits of the earth, which before were abundant, being all destroyed; so that for the present there was not sufficient for their sustenance. Other things were to be eaten, because the fruits of the earth were not now so nutritive as they had been, before the salt water of the sea very much spoiled the soil.

Ver. 5. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man.

5 And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man.

6 Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man.

which died of itself to a stranger, or to sell it to an alien (Deut. xiv. 21). And therefore the simplest and most important was to take the flesh of the living creature, and not eat the blood of any creature: which was a positive precept, like that of not eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And the reason of it, perhaps, was, that God, intending in aftertimes to reserve the blood for the expiation of sin, required this early abstention from it, that they might be the better prepared to submit in that solemn act to God in the future time, when he would accept of the sacrifice of the lamb. And the reason was, that the blood is the life of the beast which God accepted instead of their life, when they had forfeited it by their sins.

And there is another plain reason given of this prohibition immediately after it; that they might be the more fearful of shedding the blood one of another, when it was not lawful so much as to taste the blood of beast.

Ver. 5. And surely] Or rather for surely, as the LXX., the Vulgar Latin; and a great number of learned men, expound the particle τόσα as a causal, not as a copulative, in this place. So that the sense is this: Therefore I command you to abstain from the blood of living creatures, that you may be kept from the fearful practice of one another, for that is so precious in my account, that I will take care he be severely punished, by whom it is shed: yea, the very beast shall die that kills a man. So it follows:

At the hand of every beast will I require it. Not as if beasts were to blame if they killed a man (for they are capable neither of vice nor virtue); but this was ordained with respect to man, to prevent the shedding of the blood of man: for that is so precious in my account, that I will take care he be severely punished, by whom it is shed: yea, the very beast shall die that kills a man. So it follows:

At the hand of every man's brother, &c.] And therefore much more will I require it at the hand of every man. Whom he calls brother, to show that murder is the most heinous of all sins; because we are all brethren. Or the meaning may be (as some will have it), that though he be as nearly related as a brother he shall not go unpunished.

Ver. 6. Whoso sheddeth man's blood,] He repeats it over again, to enact this law more strongly. Or, as the Hebrews understand it, he spake before of the punishment he would inflict himself upon the murderer: and now of the curse which was to fall upon all hisPosterity. By man shall his blood be shed.] That is, by the magistrate or judges. For God had kept the punishment of murder in his own hand till now; as we may gather from the story of Cain, whom he banished, but suffered nobody to kill him: but here gives authority to judges to call everybody to an account for it, and to the perpetual curse and death which would come on the posterity of every murderer. The sense that would see more of the sense of the Jews about these and the foregoing words, may read Mr. Selden, de Jure Nat. et G. lib. i. cap. 5, and lib. iv. cap. 1, and de Synedriis, lib. i. cap. 5.

I will only add, that they rightly conclude that as
GENESIS.

7 And you, be ye fruitful, and multiply; bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein.
8 And God spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying,
9 And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you;
10 And with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth.
11 And I will establish my covenant with you; neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth.
12 And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations:

13 I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.
14 And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud:
15 And I will remember my covenant, which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh.
16 And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth.
17 And God said unto Noah, This is the token of the postynony: whose fear, lest the like inundation might happen again, was greater than could be taken away by a common or usual sign. The ancient poets had a better philosophy (though they knew not the original of it), when they feigned Iris to be the daughter, rain, (as was in old times) of a messenger of his benevolence, (covenant), the messenger of the great god Jupiter, and his goddess Juno; whom Homer (as he observes) represents as sent with a peremptory command to Neptune not to aid the Grecians: by the swelling, we may suppose, of waters, which much annoyed the Trojans.

My belief is, it is called his, not only because he is the Author of all things, which have natural causes, as there are of this: but because he appointed it to a special end, as a signification and assurance of his mercy to mankind.

Ver. 14. When I bring a cloud over the earth. I. e. When there are great signs of rain, which come out of the clouds.

That the bow shall be seen in the cloud.) Not always, but at certain times; often enough to put men in mind of this promise, and stir up their belief of it. For it doth, as it were, say, I will not drown the earth again, though the clouds have thickened as if they threatened it. Common philosophy teaches us, that the rainbow is a natural sign there will not be much rain after the clouds begin to disperse: for it is never made in a thick cloud, but in a thin: so that if it appears after showers, which come from thick clouds, it is a token that now they grow thin. But the God of nature chose this to be a sign, that he would never let them thicken again to such a degree to bring a deluge upon the earth. And, indeed, the admirable form or composition of this "glorious circle (as the son of Simeon calls it, Eccles. xiii. 12), bent by the hands of the Most High," both naturally excite one to look beyond the material and efficient cause of it to the final, as the forenamed author speaks. And now that we have Moses's commentary upon it, we may see, in the mixed colours of the rainbow, these two things; the destruction of the older world by water, and the future consumption of the present world by fire: whose flaming brightness is predominant in the watershod.}

Ver. 15. And I will remember my covenant, &c.) Look upon it as a token of my faithfulness to my word.

Ver. 16. This is spoken after the manner of men; the more to confirm their belief that God would not go back with his word.

Ver. 17.] As the promise is repeated twice, to express its certainty (ver. 9, 11), so is the token of it as oft repeated, for the same reason (ver. 12, and here ver. 17).
CHAPTER IX.

token of the covenant, which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth.

18. And the sons of Noah, that went forth of the ark, were Shem, and Ham, and Japheth: and Ham is the father of Canaan.

19. These are the three sons of Noah: and of them was the whole earth overspread.

20. And Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard:

21. And he drank of the wine, and was drunken; and he was uncovered within his tent.

22. And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without.

23. And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness.

24. And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him.

25. And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.

26. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant.

Ver. 18.] And the sons of Noah, &c. They are here again named, with respect to what follows: but not in their order, as shall be proved in its proper place (x. 21), for Japheth was the eldest.

And Ham is the father of Canaan.] This son of Ham is here alone mentioned, because he was concerned in the following wicked act of his father: and his posterity were those wicked people, whose country was known by the name of Canaan.

Ver. 19.] By this it appears, that, though Noah lived above three hundred years after he came out of the ark, yet he begat no more children: or, if he did, none of them lived to have any posterity.

Ver. 20. Begun to be an husbandman.] To improve the art of husbandry, which was understood before, but he much advanced it: there being nothing, in old time, which the greatest men thought more worthy their study; as we see by the Romans themselves, till they were corrupted by the luxury which their conquests brought in among them.

And he planted a vineyard.] There were vines here and there before the flood; but Noah seems to have been the first in the world that planted vines in manner of order: and the first, perhaps, that invented wine-presses, to press out the juice of the grapes, and make wine. If he was not the inventor of these two (planting of vineyards and making wine), yet we may well allow him to be the improver of them, as he was of husbandry.

Ver. 21. And he drank of the wine, and was drunken.] Being unacquainted with the strength of the liquor (as several of the fathers, as well as of the Jewish doctors think), or else being old and unable to bear its strength, as Epiphanius understands it (see Heres. lib. vii. n. 3). For it is manifest from what follows, that this happened a great while after the flood. The word vineyard, more than one, for Canaan was not his first-born.

And he was uncovered within his tent.] The heat of the weather, or of the wine, perhaps, made him throw off the clothes: or he was negligent, being not himself.

Ver. 22. And Ham, the father of Canaan, &c. There are some circumstances, which follow, that make the opinion of the Hebrew doctors not improbable: that Canaan, as some say, was, in this indelicate posture, and made sport with it to his father; who was so far from reproving him, as he ought to have done, that he also did the same.

And told his two brethren without.] In the street, publicly before the people, he proclaimed his father's shame, and mocked at it. For it is hard to think that God cursed him merely for his irreverence, but there was something of derision joined with it, and perhaps of profaneness and irreverence: in laughing (we may conceive) at the promise of the Messiah, which, it is likely, he heard his father often speak of, but now thought him incapable to beget. For Ham is generally thought to have been an impious man; and some take him to have been the first inventor of idols after the flood; nay, of magic, which he learned of the wicked kings of the nations. Thus Gaspar Schottus, lib. i. de Magia, cap. 3, prolegom. Where he endeavours to show he was the same with him whom the Persians call Zoroaster.

Ver. 23.] A great argument of their piety and dutiful affection to their father; which God, therefore, greatly rewarded.

Ver. 24. And knew what his younger son had done.] Finding himself covered with clothes that were not his own, he inquired, it is likely, how it came about: and was informed how he had been abused by one of his sons, and honoured by the other.

His younger son.] Some make this an argument that Canaan was the first that made himself merry with his grandfather's liquor, and was therefore called his younger, or little son (nothing being more common than to call those the sons of another who were his grandchildren, as cousin-geners are called brothers), for Ham was neither little, nor his younger son; but the middlemost, as he is always placed. Nor doth it seem at all pertinent to the matter to mention the order of his birth; but very fit, if he spake of his grandson, to distinguish him from the rest. And what follows is a farther proof of it.

Ver. 25. Cursed be Canaan, &c. If what I said before (ver. 23, 24) be allowed, it makes it easy to give an account why Canaan is cursed rather than Ham; because he was first guilty. Ham, indeed, was punished in him: but he had other sons, on whom the punishment did not fall, but only Canaan.

For which I can give no reason so probable as that before mentioned. Which, if it be not allowed, we must have recourse to a harsh interpretation; and, by Canaan, understand Canaan's father, as some do.

A servant of servants.] That is, the basest and vilest of servants.

Ver. 26. Blessed be the Lord God of Shem.] The Lord was the God of Shem, after a peculiar manner, just as he was the God of Abraham, because of the gracious covenant made with him: for God settled his church in the family of Shem; and Christ was born of his posterity; and he himself, in all likelihood, kept up the worship of the true God, and opposed idolatry. In short, to be the God of Shem, was to bestow all manner of blessings upon him; which Noah here prophesies to him, by blessing the Lord for them: whom he acknowledges to be the Author of them, out of his special grace and favour towards him. For he was the younger brother of Japheth, as I shall show, x. 21. Thus Jacob interprets this phrase, xxix. 19, 20.

And Canaan shall be his servant.] This was fulfilled eight hundred years after, when the Israelites (who were descended from Shem) took possession of the land of Canaan; subduing thirty of their kings; killing most of their inhabitants; laying heavy tribute upon the remainder; and using the Gibeonites (who saved themselves by a treachery), though not as servants
27 God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant.

28 And Noah lived after the flood three hundred and fifty years.

29 And all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years: and he died.
CHAPTER X

3 And the sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah.

vii. 13, ix. 18), first Shem, then Ham, and last of all Japheth. But it is observable, that, in the next verse, he gives an account first of the sons of Japheth, who was, indeed, the eldest. There is great use of this genealogy, as Maimonides shows (par. iii. More Nev. cap. 50), because the doctrine of the creation of the world, which is the foundation of the religion (i.e. of religion), would not have been so easily believed, if Moses had not thus given his audience an account of the parentage of mankind, from the first man to the flood; and from the flood to his own time: showing from whom all nations were derived, and how they came to be dispersed.

Shem is named first of Noah's sons, because the blessed seed was to spring out of his family: in which the true religion was preserved: which was soon lost in the posterity of the other two; among whom their names remained in great honour. For, Ham was the heathen Jupiter, who was called Hammon in Egypt; which, it will appear, was part of Ham's portion, and is called the Land of Ham, as every one knows, in many places of the Psalms. And, accordingly, the same country is called by Plutarch, Capellus.

Japheth also seems to have been the same with Japetus, whom the Greeks own to have been their father. Nor do they know any name of greater antiquity: which made them give it to decrepit persons (as many, particularly Bochart, have observed); and it became a proverb in that country, "older than Japetus." Whom their poets feign to have attacked war against Jupiter; because of the dissensions which the unlikeness of their manners begat between them. Which seems to be nothing but the story in chapter ix. of this book, ver. 22. For Ham, as I said, is the heathen Jupiter.

Ver. 2. The sons of Japheth; Seven were; the eldest of which, Gomer, had three sons; and the fourth, Javan, had four; whose names we have in the following verses.

Gomer.] It is hard, at this distance, to find what country was peopled by his posterity; but Bochartus, in his Phælog, hath made such probable conjectures, about this and all that follow, from other Scriptures, and from the remains and relics of the names in ancient geographers, and such like things, that they carry a great appearance of truth in them.

Our famous Camden (in his account of the first inhabitants of Britain) thinks that the Cimbris and Cimmerii descended from this Gomer, who gave them their name; and that the old Britons came from him, because they call themselves Cumnero, Cumro, and Kuneti; which seems to relate to them the posterity of Gomer. But this, as also the notion of Ludov. Capellus in his Chron. Sacra, p. 101, who, if this of Mr. Camden be not accepted, proposes another, of the Coman and Chomari, a people in Seythia, mentioned by Plutemy, within the mountain Imaus, near Bactriana, is confuted by what we read in Ezekiel, which gives Gomer to have been a neighbour of Torgamah (Ezek. xxviii. 6). And Torgamah was a nation that usually went to the marts of Tyre (xxviii. 14), and consequently were not seated in the furthest part of the north; but, as will appear afterward, not very far from Tyre. And in some countries thereabouts we must seek for Gomer; who, it is likely, became Gomery to have been a neighbour of Torgamah, as it was called Karamasap by Diodorus and Hesychius, because it looked as if it were burnt. Such was all the country about Cyaster, Meander, and the city Philadelphia. Now this is the very signification of Gomer. For in the Hebrew Gomer is to consume; and so the Chaldee and Syriac frequently used it; whence Gunna, or Gunro, is a coal. And Prisigis is of the same signification (for φλογη in Greek is to torrefy), which, being the name of part of the country, in time became the name of the whole.

Magen.] The second son of Japheth, was in all likelihood the father of the Seythians; which is the name of these nations: Berytus, Theodore, St. Jerome, and others. For all that is said in Scripture about Magog exactly agrees to them; as Bochartus hath shown large, out of Ezekiel. lib. iii. Phælog. cap. 13. Magog; From him the country of Media took its name; where he and his children settled: and it is the farthest country eastward, where any of the posterity of Japheth inhabited. What is the name of the chief city of this country, is uncertain.

Javan; Planteth himself in Greece; under which word is comprehended, not only Achaia and the rest of Greece, but the islands and isles, near and remote; and the nations neighbouring to it, towards the west, and the south, and the sea that washes them, being called the Ionian Sea. And indeed, the Hebrew word y, taking away the vowels, may be either read Javan or Ion. From whence the Iones; whom Homer calls Janes, which is near to Javan; which a Persian, in Aristophanes' Acharnenses, pronounces Jacous, as Grotius observes. And in a present, is not V. R. C. Homer calls Alexander, who came out of Macedonia, the King of Javan (viii. 21). And the Chaldee paraphrase hath here, instead of Javan, Macedonia. See Bochart, lib. iii. exp. 3.

Tubal and Meshech: These two are constantly joined together; and after Gomer, in many places, (xxviii. 13, xxix. 26, &c.) Which is a signification of Meshech, that they planted themselves not far from one another. And no conjecture seems so probable as that of Bochartus, who takes these to be the people whom the Greeks call Moschi and Tibrani: who are as constantly joined together: in Herodotus, as Meshech and Tubal are in Ezekiel, and none need wonder that Tubal was changed into Thuber, and then into Tiber: for nothing was more common, among the Greeks, than to change the letter L. into R. as Rikos for Belois, and Φιδοκο for Phidoc, &c. The Moschi inhabited the mountains called Moschi, N. E. of Cappadocia, and all the mountains (as Bochart thinks) from the river Phasis to the Pontus-Cappadocicus. The Tibrani were in the middle between the Tapaeumut and the inhabitants of Armenia the Lesser; and Bochart thinks them, who was born not far from these countries, and had reason to know them. Nor is this a new opinion of Bochart's, that the Tibrani came from Tubal: for Ephippius, in his Anecrates, mentions among the descendants of Japheth, Tiasqones, together with the Chalybes and Myssemei, whom our Bruggian for the Tiasqones.

Tiras: Or Thiras, the youngest of the sons of Japheth, possessed Thrace and My sia, and the rest of Europe towards the north. For Φωκας is Thiras or 5 By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations.

Thras, by the change of the letter Samech into Xi; which, in the Greek Alphabet (received from the Phenicians) answers to the letter Samech; so that some of the Hebrews write Thracia with an S, Thra-sia: and a Thracian woman is called by the Greeks themselves Θρασις and Θρασια: which comes very near to Thiras. And that great man Bochartus says a great deal more to confirm this; which was the opinion, he says, of many of the Phenicians. (Chron. Sacra, p. 105.) In like times, of Ludovicus Capellus; who adds, that possibly Tros and Tros were derived from this Thiras.

Ver. 3. And the sons of Gomer: Now follows an account of those that descended from the eldest son of Japheth. Ashkenaz was the eldest son of Gomer, whose posterity settled in Bithynia (where we find the footsteps of his name, in the Sinus Ascanius, and Ascaniis Lacus, and Anmias); and in Tros, and the Lesser Phrygia: in which is a country and a city called Ascania and Ascania-Inselu. Into which country the offspring of Ashkenaz brought colonies from Gomer, or the Greater Phrygia: and extended themselves to the sea. Which being called by the Phenicians, Capellus, he ascribes to the coast Ascania, was pronounced by the Greeks Ασκιας. Which being an odious name in their language, signifying inhospitable, they changed it into the contrary, and called it Εσκιας, the Euxine Sea. See more in the forenamed author (lib. iii. cap. 9). Ludovicus Capellus happened upon the same conjecture. Riphath, or Diphath, as it is written in 1 Chron. i. 7, and the posterity of whom, Capellus thinks, have inhabited Paphlagonia; which is a country near to Phrygia, upon the Euxine Sea: and there are remainders of the name in several places, both ways written, with Resh or with Daleth: as Bochart shows (lib. iii. cap. 10). Mela places the Riphaces in this country, as Geoffrius observes, Annot. in lib. i. de V. R. C.

Tgarmanh. His posterity, it is manifest, settled northwards of Judea, by that place in Ezekiel (xxxviii. 6) where the Greek scholiast saith, some hereby understand the Cappadocians and Galatians. And, indeed, Cappadocia lies near to Gomer or Phrygia, with whom Tgarmanh is wont to be joined; and in respect of Judea, it lies northward; and was more liable to the Phenicians, who the prophet saith came from Tgarmanh (Ezek. xxvii. 14). The Greek interpreters constantly write it Torgama, or Thorgana; from whence the name of the Trogni, or Troceni, may well be thought to be derived: who, Strabo saith (lib. xii.), lived near Pontus and Cappadocia: and it appears by Ptolemy, they possessed some cities in Cappadocia itself. This people are called by stratified Troceni, and in the council of Chaledon, Trocmares, or Torgnades: for their bishop is often mentioned, Επίσκοπος Τροχμανδος. See Bochart in the same book, cap. 11.

Ver. 4. And the sons of Javan: Having told us what sons Gomer had, he informs us who had descended from Javan: who had four sons, that gave names to countries.

Elishah. His first-born inhabited Peloponnesus: in which there was an ample country, called by the ancients Elis: and one part of it called by Homer, Elisium. I omit the other arguments whereby Bochartus proves this to be the part of the earth where Elisibah's posterity settled, not far from their father Javan. Nay, Ludovicus Capellus (p. 105, Chron. Sacra) thinks the Αἰλία, Eileus, and the country Eolia had its name from thence.

Tarsis] (or Tarsis) Neither people Cilicia, where we meet with a like name, nor the coast about Carthage, as some of the ancients thought; but, as Eusebius, and from him Bochart, and lately Bochart, have observed, from him came the Iberi in Spain. επαναστατεύεται εἰς ὅπερ Αἰρέας. Which name of Iberi came, as Bochart thinks, from the Phenicians, who called the bounds and utmost limits of any place, aiber. Iber thus used in the Syriac version of the Psalms and the New Testament. From whence, it is not unlikely, the Spaniards were called by this name of Iberi, because they were thought to possess the utmost limits of the earth westward. However, we may well think Tarshish to be Spain, or that part of it which was most frequented by the Phenicians, viz. according to an usual expression in Scripture (Deut. xxxiii. 34; Job xxii. 9; Hos. xiii. 12), where there are words of the like import with this. That famous man Bochart saith a great deal more, to assert this (lib. iii. cap. 5).

Dodanian.] He is called Rhodamin, in 1 Chron. ii. 7, by whom the Greek interpreters understand the people there: so Bochart conjectures. But the name of that island is much later than Moses's time: and therefore it is better to understand hereby that country now called France; which was peopled by the posterity of this son of Javan: who, when they came to this coast, gave name, as Bochart conjectures, to the great river Rhodaminus; where it is likely they first seated themselves, and called the adjacent coast Rhodanim, which had anciently in it a city of the same name, mentioned by Stephanus; and said to be seated in Massilia „in tractu Massiliensi," where now stands Marseilles. (See Bochart, lib. iii. cap. 6.) These Dodanites are never mentioned in any other places of Scripture, which makes it the more difficult where to find them; but this account seems more probable than any other. Raghromanus, which had anciently in it a city of the same name, mentioned by Stephanus; and said to be seated in Massalia "in tractu Massiliensi," where now stands Marseilles.

of this word. Which the Hebrews use (as Mr. Mede hath observed), to signify "all those countries divided from them by the sea;" or, such as they used not to go to, but by sea. (See book i. disc. 47.) Many places testify this (Isai. xi. 10, 11, x£. 15; Jer. ii. 10, &c.). Now if Moses wrote this book in Egypt, as he thinks it probable, they went from thence to Phrygia, Cappadocia, Paphлагonia, by sea, as well as every other Israelite. Nay, Job, (which they did not use to go by sea, and therefore makes this an objection against Mabia being the father of the Medes: for their country cannot be called an isle. But the far greater part of the regions, peopled by the sons of Japheth, being such as, he confesses, the Hebrews call isles, Moses might well say, the isles of the gentiles were parted among them, though Medin be comprehended, which was not such an isle. But there is no need of all this, if we take the word we translate isle, for a region, country, or province. And so it plainly signifies, Job xxii. 30; Isai. xx. 6, where, in the margin, we translate it country. And then the word Goim, which we render Gentiles, signifies a multitude of people; as it doth often in Scripture: particularly in Gen. e. xxiii. 4, where we translate them, in the last words of this verse; and in the last clause of this chapter: "by these were the [Goim] nations divided in the earth." Which may serve to explain this phrase here; which we may thus interpret, by these (or among these) were divided the regions of the people or nations (descended from Japheth) in their last partition of the several countries they possessed. But Medin, in the latter part of this verse, is probably one of the isles, in the last clause of this chapter.

Divided] It appears by the following words (according to his language, family, and nation), this great division of the earth was made orderly, and not by a confused irregular dispersion, wherein every one went whither he listed, and seated himself where he thought good. Thus, Mr. Mede thinks, is also suggested in the very word we translate divided; which signifies not a scattered, but a distinct partition.

Every one after his tongue, or language.] The same is said (ver. 20, and ver. 31) of the posterity of Cham and Sem. Which signifies they did not all speak the same language, but doth not prove that any one of the forementioned people had a language peculiar to themselves, distinct from all the rest. As, by Ahasueraus is said to have caused letters to be written to a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, according to their language and their writing (Esth. viii. 9), it doth not prove there were so many several sorts of writing, and so many several languages in his empire; but only that to each of them was directed a letter, in that language which they spoke.

After their families, in their nations.] The particle in denotes, as Mr. Mede observes, families to be subordinate to nations, as parts to a whole. Families are parts of a nation, and a nation is an offspring containing many families. So here was a twofold order in this division. First, They were ranged according to their nations; and then every nation was ranked by his families. So that every nation had his lot by himself; and in every nation, the families belonging to it had their portion by themselves. The number of nations descended from Japheth were seven, according to the number of his sons, who were all founders of several nations. But the number of families is not here entirely set down: for Moses names only the families of Gomer and Javan: whose children, perhaps, are rather to be looked upon as founders of nations; and therefore mentioned by Moses, when the posterity of the rest are omitted.

8 And Cush begat Nimrod: he began to be a mighty one in the earth.

Ver. 6. And the sons of Ham. Having given an account of the sons and grandsons of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, he next proceeds to the sons of Ham, the second son of Noah, which were four: and gives an account also of every one of their sons, and of some of their grandsons.

Cush] Gave name to a country very often mentioned in Scripture; which most of the ancients take for Ethiopia, and so we commonly translate the word Cush. But if by Ethiopia they meant that country south of Egypt, and not an eastern country (which may be a question), Jonathan is rather to be followed, who here paraphrases it Arabia. For Cush is the same with Cushan (only this latter is a diminutive), which is made the same with Midian (Habak. iii. 7). And so Cush was called (or rendered in the Ethiopian), for she was a Midianite, (Exod. ii. 16, 21), and therefore was of Arabia, not of Ethiopia: and so we should translate it (Numb. xii. 2), an Arabian woman. And there is a demonstration of it in Ezek. xxix. 10, that Cush cannot be Ethiopian; for, when God saith he will make Egypt desolate, "from the tower of Egypt, the wilderness of the seamen," so we should understand by Cush the country of Ethiopia, it would be as if he had said, "from Ethiopia to Ethiopia." For every one knows Syria was the border of Egypt towards Ethiopia: and therefore here being two opposite borders, it is manifest that Cush, which is the opposite term to Syria, cannot be Ethiopia, but Arabia, which is much more remote from Egypt which is the other, and most remote from Ethiopia. A great number of other arguments, out of the Scriptures, evince this: which Bochart hath collected (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 2), and Philip Beroaldus asserted the same thing before him.

Mizraim.] The father of them who inhabited Egypt, whose metropolis [Alexandria] the Arabians at this day call Meser; and the first month among the Egyptians was called Mesir, and Cuthraus calls the country itself Mestra, as Grotius observes in his Annot. in lib. i. de V. R. C., and Lud. Capellus, in his Chronol. Sacra, p. 109. And this word Mizraim being of the dual number (which shows it to be the name of the country rather than of a person), denotes two Egyptians, as Bochart observes. For so there were, the higher and the lower, in the midst, as the Prophets, in their form. All the nations which are said to be higher were in the higher, where Nile runs in one stream; the lower was that, where it was divided into many: which the Greeks call Delta, from its triangular form.

Phut.] All Africa was divided between Mizraim and Phut, as Bochart observes. For all Egypt, and several other parts of Africa, as far as the lake Tritonides [which divided Africa into two almost equal parts], fell to Mizraim. The rest, beyond that lake, to the Atlantic Ocean, was the portion of Phut. Of which name there are some footsteps, in the city Putea, which Ptolemy (lib. iii. cap. 1) calls Phurti; and the river called Phutt, mentioned by Pliny, as Grotius notes; and a country, which St. Jerome, in his time, says, was called Regio Plentus, which is not far from Syria: to which all Africa is called, which we often meet withal in Scripture: whence the name of Libya. Concerning which, and a great many other proofs that Phut was planted in Africa, see the famous Bochartus (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 33).

Canaan.] The youngest son of Ham, every one knows, gave name to that country, which God gave afterwards to the Israelites. Another, which the Ptolemies, who descended from the Canaanites, called Xra, by a contraction from the word Canaan, as many have observed out of Eusebius (lib. i. Prepar. cap. 10), who quotes Sanchoniathon and Philo-Biblis for it.
9 He was a mighty hunter before the Lord: wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord.

It is so certain that the Phoenicians had their original from the Canaanites, that the LXX. use their names promiscuously. For example, Shual is called (Gen. xvi. 10), the son of a Canaanitish woman; whom in Exod. vi. 15, they call the son of a Phoenician woman. And so in the New Testament, the v. viz, the grandson of Cush, who was the son of Raamah or Rhegma, in the end of this verse. The third was the son of Joktan, the son of Shem (ver. 28). And the fourth was a grandchild of Abraham, by his son Jokshan (xxv. 3). They that descended from the three first of these, were a people given to trade: from the fourth came a people addicted to robbery. The first, the second, and the fourth, were seated near the Persian Sea; the third near the Arabian; whence Pliny saith the Sabeans stretched themselves to both seas (lib. v. cap. 29). For all these four people were comprehended under the name of Sabeans, though very different one from another. But it may be doubted, whether there was any who descended from Jokshan, the grandchild of Abraham, who lived near the Persian Sea. And I shall show upon xxv. 3, that Bochart himself thought otherwise, upon further consideration.

And as for this Seba, he was the father of a people in Arabia called Jemamites, as Alcamus, an Arabian writer, tells us: whose words are, "A certain man called Seba gathered together the tribes of the Jemamites:" i. e. he was the founder of the people called by that name, from a famous queen of that country called Jemama. See Bochartus, lib. iv. cap. 7, where he shows where they were situated: and that they are the Sabeans, who are said by Agatharcides to have been a very tall proper people, mentioned Isa. xlix. 4.

Havilah,] Or Chavilah. There were two Hivilahs also: one the son of Cush here mentioned; and the other son of Joktan (ver. 29). From this Havilah seem to have come the people called Chaulothaei by Eratosthenes: who were seated in Arabia Felix (as Strabo tells us) between the Nabatæi and the Agæi, i.e. the Hagerens. By Pliny they are called Chavelæi (which comes nearest to the Hebrew name), who were seated in that part of the country which lay towards Babylon: as appears by this, that, in the Scripture, the wilderness of Shur (nigh Egypt) and Havilah are opposed, as the most remote opposite bounds of Arabia. Thus the Ishmaelites are said to have dwelt "from Havilah to Shur" (Gen. xxv. 18), that is, before Egypt, e regione Egypti, "over against Egypt," as Bochart translates it. That is, Havilah bounded them on the north-east; and Shur on the south-west; which Shur was near to Egypt. And so Saul is said to have smitten the "Amalekites from Havilah to Shur," &c (I Sam. xiv. 20), where we translate the last words, "over against Egypt."

Sabath,] Or Sabatha, (whom the ancients call Sabatha, or Sabathes) seems to have been settled in that part of Arabia Felix called Leantines, upon the Persian Sea; where there was a city, not far distant from the sea, called by Ptolemy Σαβαθ: from whence they sent colonies over the sea into Persia, as Bochart shows by several arguments (lib. iv. cap. 10). For there is an island on that coast called Sophtha; and a people called Messabata, or Messabathae, upon the confines of Medes; from the Chaldaean word Μέσα (which signifies middle) and Sabatha; as if one would say the Mediterranean Sabatha.

Raanun,] Or as the ancients pronounce his name, Baucunus: the same, as the same Arabians, upon the Persian Sea. Where there is a city mentioned by Ptolemy's table Rægæna; in the Greek text expressly, Ρηγιμα, Rhegma. And so Stephanus mentions both Ρηγιμα πολυς and κωντος Ρηγιμα, about the Persian Gulf.

Sabtechah,] Or Sabtechca, as some read it, was the youngest son of Cush, except Nimrod, who is mentioned by himself. It is hard to find the place of his habitation: but the rest of the sons of Cush being seated about the Persian Sea (except Nimrod, who, as Moses tells us, went to Babylon), Bochartus thinks it reasonable to seek for him in that part of Caramania, where there was a city called Samyadace, and a river Samyadaxus: which he thinks may have come from Sabtechca, by the change of the letter B into M. Which was very frequent in Arabia, and the neighbouring countries. For Merodach is also called Berodach, in the Book of the Kings: and in the Chaldean paraphrase, Basan is called Bathanam and Mathanam; and Abana (the famous river of Damascus) is expressly called Bana; and Mecca and Becca, the same city among the Arabians. In like manner, Sabtecha, or Sabthache, might be changed into Samyadace. Now, into Caramania there was a short cut over the straits of the Persian Gulf out of Arabia. I see nothing anywhere more probable than this conjecture of that very learned man (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 4). And the sons of Raanun; Sheba, and Dedan.] He gives an account of none of Cush's other sons' posterity, but only of this: whose two sons were seated near him and one another. For the younger of them, Dedan, seems to have left his name in a city now called Dedan, hard by Rhegma, upon the same shore eastward. And from this Dedan the country now bearing its name, of which Ezekiel speaks (xxvii. 12), as Bochart shows plainly (lib. iv. cap. 6). And Sheba (or, as others read it, Seba or Saba), his elder brother, was seated in the same country not far from Dedan, where Pompomius mentions a people called Sabari: and Arius speaks of a great mountain not far off, called Saba, from this Saba: whose posterity, youngest kings over the kings before mentioned into Caramania, might possibly give name to a city there, which Ptolemy calls Sabia: and Pliny mentions a river of the same name: and Dionys. Perigeetes speaks of a people called Saba. Of whom the Scripture seems to speak, in those places where Sheba and Seba are joined together (Ps. lxxii. 10): "The kings 11 Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, of Sheba (i.e. of this country) and Sheba shall offer gifts. And sometimes Sheba and Raamah (or R hegma) are joined (Ezek. xxvii. 92); where the prophet speaks of this Sheba, the son, or R hegma; who brought those precious commodities there mentioned out of Arabia; they lying very commodiously for traffic upon the Persian Gulf. And these are the places which were called Nimrod, or that chief of ancient or sundry other nations; who lived upon Tigris and Euphrates, which run into the Persian Sea; and therefore it is reasonable to think that sheba's posteriority lived near the same sea.

Ver. 8. And Cush begat Nimrod.] Besides all the forementioned, he also begat this son; whom Moses distinguishes from the rest, and mentions him alone by himself, because he was the most eminent among his brethren, though born the last; a mighty commander, as Moses here describes him. Thus in the title of Psal. xviii. it is said, David was delivered out of the hand of all his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul: who is particularly mentioned by himself, because he was his chief enemy. Sir W. Raleigh thinks he was begotten by Cush when his other children were become fathers; and so, being younger than his grandsons, he is named after an account is given of every one of them.

Nimrod.] The author of the Chronicon Alexandr. thinks he was the same with Nins: but Vossius rather takes him for him whom the Greek writers call Belus, also mentioned by Xenophon. The name was, so called from the very thing itself, Wh in Hebrew signifying a son (lib. i. de Idolol. cap. 24). The same Chronicon saith, that Nimrod taught the Assyrians to worship the fire: and both Elmacinus and Patricides affirm the same. (See Hotting, Smegna Oriental, lib. i. cap. 8, p. 272.) Which, if it be true, I doubt not was an eminent matter in that divine Majesty, which used to appear in a glorious flame. Ut, a city of Chaldea, seems to have had its name from the fire which there was worshipped: and that Ur also, from whence Abraham came, the Hebrews fancy had the same original; for their fable is, that Abraham was thrown into the fire, because he would not worship it. Much the same thing was done, as St. Jerome tells us in his Questions upon Genesis, IX.

He began to be a mighty one.] He was the first great warrior and conqueror: so Gibbor is to be understood; not for a giant, or man of great stature, but for a potent person: and, as some will have it, a more severe governor than they had been, who only exercised paternal authority. For he was the first that put down the government of eldership, or paternity (as Sir Walter Raleigh speaks), and laid the foundation of sovereign rule.

Ver. 9. He was a mighty hunter.] Or rather, mighty in hunting: for the word izfd does not signify a hunter, but hunting. Which shows by what means he came to be so great a monarch. He hardened himself to it: for that was his office (such was very transcendent), and drew together a great company of robust young men to attend him in this sport: who were hereby also fitted to pursue men, as they had done wild beasts. For this was looked upon, in all ages, as the rudiment of warfare (as Bochart shows out of a great many authors, lib. iv. cap. 12), all the heroes of old, such as Nestor, Theseus, Cæsar, Pollux, Ulysses, Diomedes, Achilles, Endymion, &c., being all bred up to hunting, as Xenophon informs us. And it was not without some such reason that noble families carry in their coats of arms (as ensigns of their valorous achievements) lions, bears, tigers, &c., from their kill.

ving such-like fierce creatures. For it must be further noted, that in this age of Nimrod, the exercise of hunting might well be the more highly esteemed, and win him the hearts of mankind: because he delivered them, by this means, from those wild beasts whereby they were much infected, and very dangerously exposed, while they were but few, and lived scattered abroad and down, in the open air, or in tents but weakly defended. The destroying of wild beasts (and, perhaps, of thieves whom he hunted also) was a great service in those times, and made many join with him in greater designs which he had at last; to subdue men, and make himself master of the people who were his neighbours, in Babylon, Susiana, and Assyria.

Ver. 10. The beginning of his kingdom was Babyl.] (See xi. 5, 8.) Which, according to the gentle writers, was built by Belus (the same with Nimrod, who was called Belus, as I noted before, from Baal, because of his dominion and large empire, over which he was an absolute lord). They say that his son Ninus (or, as Philo-Bybius, his son Babylon) was the builder, may be thus reconciled with the foregoing; that Belus was the original father of the city, and that his son much augmented it. See Voss, lib. i. de Idolol. cap. 24, and lib. vii. cap. 9. There are those that say it was built by Semiramis; but as they have it only from Ctesias, who is not to be relied on against Berosus and Abydenus, who wrote the history of that country out of the ancient records, and say Belus built it so, if it be true, we must understand of her rebuilding it, after it was decayed, or adding greater splendour to it. And this also must be understood not of the wife of Ninus, for it is a question whether he had any wife of that name: or, if he had, she was different from her whom the Greeks so much magnify, who lived almost two thousand years after the son of Belus, as Salmasius observes (Exeget. in Solin. p. 1228) out of Philo-Bybilus.

And Ezech., &c.] Having built Babel, which he made the chief city of his kingdom, he proceeded to build three cities more in the same country. Which they that think he won by conquest, imagine also that he made Babel the bend city, because he won it first; and then the other. And all this, say some, before the dispersion we read of in the next chapter; which others think happened after the dispersion. Ezech seems to have been the city which Ptolemy calls Arecca, and Ammanius, Arecha; which lay in the country of Sasauna upon the river Tigris. Whence the Arececi Caeli in Tibullus, as Salmasius observes in his Exeget. in Solinum, p. 1194. From whence Huetius thinks the country below it was called Iroque; mention of Alfeagnus, and other Arabian writers.

Areca.] It is a hard matter to give any account of this city; but the LXX. calling it Archad, from the Chaldee idiom, which is wont to change the Dagesh, within to the Gematria for Damascus, i.e. Damascus; and, by the same reason, Archad for Archad), the footsteps of this name may be thought to remain in Arzad, a river of Sittacene in Persia. For nothing is more common, than to change ch into g.

Calneh.] It is sometimes called Caino (Isa. x. 9), and Calneh (Gen. xxvii. 23). From whence the country called Chalactania, mentioned by Pliny, before Strabo, Polybius, and Dionys. Periugeretes) may well be thought to have taken its name: whose chief city was called Calneh, or Chalone (which is the same), and afterwards changed by Pachorus, king of Persia, into Ctesiphon.

Ver. 11. Out of that land went forth Asshur.] This translation is not so likely as that of the Margin. He went out into Assyria." For Moses is speaking of what Nimrod the son of Cush did, and not of the sons of Shem, among whom Asshur was one. Nor is it agreeable to the order of history to tell us here what Asshur did, before any mention of his birth, which follows (ver. 22). Besides, it was not peculiar to Asshur, whom the Chaldees with Nimrod, of Shinar: for so did almost all men who were dispersed from thence. Add to this, that Assyria is called "the land of Nimrod," by Micah (v. 6); "They shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and the land of Nimrod with their lances;" or, "in the entrance thereof," as we translate it. Therefore it is very reasonable to take Asshur here, not for the name of a man, but of a place, as it is frequently: and except the word Asshur, as if it were Leassur into Asshur as Beth in 2 Sam. vi. 10, is put for Lebeth; other examples there are of this (2 Sam. x. 2, 1 Chron. xix. 2). By "going forth" into Asshur, Bochart thinks, is meant Nimrod's making war there: for so the Hebrew phrase "go forth," imports, in 2 Sam. xi. 1, Psalm lx. 12, Isa. x. 9, Zech. vii. 3. So also when we speak of Nimrod, which belonged to the children of Shem: but was usurped, he thinks, by the sons of Cush, who had no right to it, but what he got by his sword. If this be true, Mr. Mede's observation which I mentioned upon ver. 27 of the foregoing chapter [That the posterity of Cham never subdued either those of Japheth or Shem], must be understood of such large conquests as they two made over one another, and over him.

And built Nineveh.] Which Nimrod so called from his son Ninus: the very word Nineveh being as much as Ninus's habitation, 14 And the Pathrusim, and Casluhim, (out of whom came Philistim,) and Caphtorim.

CHAPTER X.

15 And Canaan begat Sidon his first born, and Heth, cried they, were the first of all men: and the Ethiopians pretended that they, living more southerly, had a stronger sun; which contributed more efficaciously to natural generation; and that Egypt was a country thrown up by the mud which Niles left, and so got out of the sea. But Moses hath determined this controversy in these words, and by the rest of his history; which shows, that the first men after the flood came from the mountains of Armenia, which is in the north, and descended to the southerly countries, by degrees, through Assyria, Babylon, Syria, and Egypt, into Ethiopia. And their discourse is ridiculous about the original of Egypt, unto which we see nothing added by the Nile, in many ages.

Anamim.] Our Broughten takes these to be the Numidians, among whom he finds Amabis. Others take them for the Amaitie in Ethiopia. But these Amunis being derived from Mizraim, we are rather to seek them about Egypt: and the opinion of Bochartus is probable, that they are the Nomades, who lived about Ammon and Numonimitis; and called Anammi from Anam, which signifies a sheep among the ancient Egyptians, as it doth among the Arabians. For the Nomades fed sheep, as Herodotus tells us; and the Egyptians (whereas they abstained from eating cows or swine); and their garments also, as he tells us, were of sheep-skins.

Lehabim.] These are thought to be the Libyans; but that being a name which belongs to the greatest part of Africa, it cannot be well thought that so great a portion fell to this son of Mizraim, or that so many people were descended from him. The Egyptians, Bochart, with great reason, thinks the Lehabari were not all the Libyans; but those whom Potlemy, Pliny, and others, call Libygeptis; because they lived next to Egypt on the west of Thebaïs, in a sandy, adust soil, burnt by excessive heat; from whence he thinks they had the name of Lehabim. For lehaba signifies both a flame and heat; as in Joel 1. 19, "The flame (lehaba) in the Hebrew, or scorching heat) hath burnt all the trees of the field."

Naphthim.] These seem to be the people of Naphthuham; and what that is we may learn from Plutarch: who, in his book De Iside et Osiride, says, the Egyptians call the country and the mountains that lie upon the sea Naphthuham; which may incline us to think they were descended from him. The Egyptians, Bochart, ingeniously observes, that these people lived upon the shore of the Mediterranean in Marmarica; for the people upon the Red Sea belonged to Arabia, not to Egypt. It is not improbable that from hence came the name of Neptune, who originally was a Libyan god; and known to none but that people.

There was a city called Nepata by Pliny which Grotius thinks may explain this name: but it was in Libya; and Moses is speaking of the sons of Mizraim.

Ver. 11. Pathrusim.] Who were the inhabitants, it is likely, of Patros: which was a part of Egypt; though represented sometimes in Scripture as a country distinct from it: just as Thebaïs is, in some authors, said to be, whereas it was the Upper Egypt. Bochart hath brought a grammatically affected expression to prove this; particularly from Ezekiel xxix. 11, which shows clearly that Patros belongs to Egypt: for the prophet foretelling that God would bring again the captivity of Egypt, he saith he would "cause them to return into the land of Patros, into the land of their habitation, or nativity: that is, into Thebaïs, which Nebuchadrezzar attacked; as grammatically affected expressions move the inhabitants of Thebaïs into captivity. This seems a more probable account of the Pathrusim than theirs.

16 And the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgasite, who take them to be the Pharusi (as Grotius doth) or Phuntusi; who were a people of Ethiopia.

Casluhim or Casluhim.] These were the Colehi, who, though they lived far from Egypt, from whence they are said here to descend, yet there are a great many arguments that they had their original from that country. For several ancient authors say so; as Herodotus, Diodorus, Strabo, and Ammianus: all of great credit. And there are many reasons whereby Herodotus proves it (as Bochart shows in his admirable work, often mentioned, lib. iv. Phaæg, cap. 31), they agreeing in so many things, especially in their manners and language, that one can scarce have any doubt of it. These people were seated at the east end of the Euxine Sea.

Out of whom came Philistim.] They were the offspring of the people of Colechis, as will appear in what follows.

Capthusim.] These were a people near to Colchis, as it is said here to come from Casluhim, in other places are said to have come from Capthus, Jer. xiv. 1. Ams ix. 7. And Moses himself relates how the Avians, nigh to Gaza, a famous city of the Philistim, were driven out by the Philistim (Deut. xxi. 23). And these ancients therefore are in the right, who take the Capthusim for the Cappadocians: yet, not all the inhabitants of that country (part of which was possessed by other people, as was said before), but that part of Cappadocia which was next to Colechis, viz. about Trapezund, where Colechis ended. For there we find the cities called Capthusim; viz. the country calleth, which was burnt by great fire, and would never be inhabited by men, as Strabo (v. 23) saith. Now in Greece (as Bochart ingeniously observes), signifies the same with Capthus in Hebrew, viz. Malum punicum: and therefore, in all likelihood, the same country was called by the Hebrews Capthus, and by the Greeks Sidene.

What invited the Capthusim out of Egypt into this country is hard to tell at this distance of time. But Strabo thinks it was the fame of the gold wherewith this country abounded. And as this drew them thither, so perhaps the coldness of the country, very much different from that wherein they were born, or else their neighbours the Scythians, and Mesech and Tubal (viz. the Moschi and Tribeni), who dwelt near them, and might be troublesome to them, made them think of removing to another place. And in their way through Palestine they fell upon the Avim, whom they dispossessed of their country, and settled there (Deut. ii. 23), by the name of Philistim.

Ver. 15. Canaan] Now follows an account of the posterity of Ham's youngest son.

Sidon] Was his first-born; who was the founder of the famous city called by his name, Sidon: which Troglus saith was so called from plenty of fish on that coast. And so the present name of it, Sadi, signifies fishing or fishery: as the town in Gallæe called Bethsaida, is as much as the place of fishing: for that sea upon which it lies, the Hebrews say, abounded with fish. However, the Sidonians came from this son of Canaan; and some of them (if he did not found it himself), retir'd into the island called the Sidonians, mentioned to him. It was far more ancient and famous than Tyre; for we read of it in the books of Moses, and Joshua, and the Judges; but nothing of Tyre till the days of David. Nor doth Homer mention Tyre: though he speaks of Sidon and the Sidonians in many places.

Heth.] His second son, was the father of the Hittites, or the children of Heth, often mentioned in Scripture; who dwelt about Hebron and Beersheba, in the south of the land of Canaan. They were a
And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goest unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zebaim, even unto Lasha.

And these are the sons of Ham, after their dians; who were very skilful in navigation, and therefore joined by Ezekiel with Zidon, xxvii, 8, were he makes them also a warlike people, with 11.

Zemarites.] They who make these the same with the Samaritans, do not observe that these names are written quite differently in the Hebrew; and that the Samaritans, so much spoken of in Scripture, had their names from Samaron. And therefore Bochart thinks these are the Samaritans mentioned by St. Jerome, who says, that Ptolemy, king of Egypt, gave Edessa in Cæsarea (it should be the city of Eunas, or Emisa which was in that country, but Edessa in Mesopotamia, beyond Euphrates), and so both the Chaldee paraprases have here for Zemarite, Emisaes. But I do not see why we should not rather think this son of Canaan (Zemarites), from whom the Zemarites came, was the founder of the city of Zemar (Josh. viii. 29). This Irish is generally to be attached to the above paragraph.

Hamathite.] These were the posterity of the last son of Canaan; from whom the city and country of Hamath took its name: of which name there were two; one called by the Greeks Antiochia, the other Epiphania: the former called the Great (Amos vi. 2), to distinguish it from this, which St. Jerome says, in his time, was called Epiphania, and by the Arabs (in the Nubian geographer) Hama. This is the city which is meant when we so often read that the bounds of Judea were to the “entrance of Hamath,” northward (Numb. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 8, and other places). For it is certain they did not reach to Antiochia, but came near to Epiphania.

Afterwards in process of time they enlarged their bounds: for they possessed all the country which lies from Idumea and Palestine to the mouth of Orontes: which they held for seven hundred years, or thereabout. Moses, indeed, confines the land of Canaan in narrower bounds toward the north (as hath been said), but we must not here consider. It is only said that the whole land of which God gave to the Israelites for their portion. Now, there being eleven nations who had their original (as appears from this and the foregoing verses) from so many sons of Canaan: we do not find that the first and the last were devoted by God to destruction, as the rest were. For we read nothing of the Sidonians, Araratians, Sidonians, Arabians, of Zemarites, and Hamathites, among those nations upon whom the sentence of excision was pronounced by God, and their country bestowed upon the Israelites. But we read of two others, not here mentioned, who made up the seven nations, whom God ordered to be cut off; viz. the Perizzites, and those who were peculiarly called Canaanites, who sprang from some of the forementioned noble families; but we do not know from which. We shall meet with it in the 15th chapter of this book.

Ver. 19. Here Moses describes the bounds of that country, which was given by God to the Jews.

From Sidon.] i. e. The country of Sidon, which extended itself from the city so called, towards the east, as far as Jordan, or near it. This, therefore, may be looked upon as the northern bounds of the promised land.

As thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza, &c.] These, and all the rest, belong to the southern bounds: for these two were cities near to the Philistines. We often read of Gaza; and Gerar was famous for Abra-families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations. 21 Unto Shem also, the father of all the 1), and for the overthrow of the Cushites (2 Chron. xiv. 13).
Sodom, and Gomorrah, &c.] These four cities are famous for their destruction, by fire and brimstone from heaven.
Even unto Lasha.] Or Lasm, which St. Jerome takes for Cullarhake, as doth Jonathan also: a place famous for hot waters, which run into the Dead Sea. But Bochardus (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 37) doubts of this, because Cullarhake was not in the southern part of Judea, as Lash was; but we may therefore consider, whether it may not be a city of the Arabs called Lusus: which Potlemy places in the middle way, between the Dead Sea and the Red.
Ver. 20. These are the sons of Ham, after their families, &c.] This is sufficiently explained by what was said upon ver. 5, where Moses concludes his account of the sons of Japheth. Only it may be observed, in general, that we may, from this narrative, account for all the nations of the earth, which, from the time of Noah, sprung from the sons of Ham, and their children, had all Africa for their portion (Misciam having Egypt, and Phut the rest); and no small part of Asia, which fell to the share of Cush and Canaan.
Ver. 21. Unto Shem also, the father of all the children of Eber, the brother of Japheth the elder, even to him were children born. 22 The children of Shem; Elam, and As-Chaldea, that is, of the Hebrew nation, whom Moses here represents in the measure of an illustrious original, they sprang; and therefore breaks off the thread of his genealogy, to give a short touch of it. I can give no reason so likely as this, why he calls Shem the father of Eber's children, rather than of any other descended from him. He having told them before, that Ham was the father of Canaan (ix. 32), whom God cursed, he would make us know, that an illustrious branch of the father of this wicked nation was sacrificed, to preserve their name. He now tells them, that this blessed man was the father from whom their nation was descended; that they might comfort themselves in their noble stock, and believe Canaan should be subdued by them.
The brother of Japheth the elder.] Sculliger translates these words, "Shem the elder brother of Japheth: but the he which is prefixed to gadul, i.e. great, is general, that we may refer the word greater or elder, to him who was last spoken of, viz. Japheth: who may be plainly proved to have been the eldest son of Noah, from this observation; that Noah was five hundred years old, before any of his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, were born (v. 32). When he was six hundred years old, he entered into the ark with his family (vii. 11). And when he came out, two years after the flood, Shem begat Arphaxad, being then a hundred years old (xii. 10), and consequently Noah was six hundred and two. From whence it follows, that Shem was born when Noah was five hundred and two years old: and therefore Japheth must be two years older than he; for Noah began to have children when he was five hundred. But God preferred Shem before him; giving hereby an early demonstration (of which there are many instances afterward), that he would not be confined to the order of nature in the disposal of his favours; which he frequently bestowed upon the younger children; as he did upon Jacob, and in aftertimes upon David, who was the youngest, and meanest of all his father's children.
Even to him were children born.] Perhaps he was the last of his brethren that married; and then Moses shows, in the following verses, had five sons: the progeny of two of which are mentioned, but the rest passed over in silence.
Ver. 22. Elam.] Was his first-born; from whom came the Elamites, mentioned Acts ii. 9, whose metropolis was the famous city of Elymais. They lay between the Medes and Mesopotamians (as Bochart shows, lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 2), and were a very warlike and fierce people, as Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel testify. The Susians were a neighbouring people, but different from them: and therefore, when Daniel says Shushan was in the province of Elam, he takes Elam in a large sense: as Phiny and Ptolemy also do, who mention Elamites at the mouth of the river Eulues (Ulia in Daniel), which was below Susiana. The modern Salmas, where Ptolemy says in Susiana, was then the seat of the Elamites, Curzon tells us, of this Josephus may be allowed to say, the Elamites were Paroee ofvirites, "the founders of the Persians;" who were a distinct people from them, though often comprehended under this name of Elam.
Asher.] From whom came the people called first Assyryes, and afterward Assyrians; which was a name as large as their empire, comprehending even Syria itself, which, in several instances, is said to have been united with Assyria. But, in proper speaking, it was only that country, whose head was Nineveh, called sometimes Adiabene, and Aturia or Assyria.
Arphaxad.] Many, following Josephus, make him the father of the Chaldees. But I find no good reason for it; and it seems more probable, than the Chaldaean origin of Abraham's brother's sons (Gen. xxii. 12), which St. Jerome positively affirms. Therefore it is more reasonable to think Arphaxad gave name to that country which Ptolemy calls Arrapachitis, which was a part of Assyria.
Lud.] Seems to have given name to the country of Lydia, near Asia Minor. It is certain, however, that in the Book of Genesis, Lud. which is mentioned as the name of one of the sons of Cush, or Africa, was the person, who, according to Josephus, was crucified. See Bochart, lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 12.
Aram.] From whom sprang the Syrians, whose name anciently was Aramea, the children of Aram. A name not unknown to the ancient Grecians; for Homer mentions the Alph. a word in his second book of Iliads; and so doth Hesiod; and Strabo also saith, that many understood by the Arim or Arim, the Syrians. And the Syrians, at this day, call themselves Arameans. But Syria being so large a name, that ancient authors extend it to all those countries that lay between Tyre and Babylon, we must not take all the people of them to have been the posterity of Aram. For it is evident some of them descended from Canaan, others from Asshur, others from Aram-Apadah. Therefore, those are to be thought have come from him, to whom the name of Aram is prefixed or subjoined, as Aram-Naharajim, and Padan-Aram (i.e. the Mesopotamians), Aram-Soba (the people of Palmyra and the neighbouring cities), Arani-Damasc (situated between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, whose chief city was Damascus), and, perhaps, Aram-Mesha, and Aram-Bethrehob, which were places beyond Jordan, one of which fell to the share of Massach, the other of Assor.
Ver. 23. The children of Aram, &c.] The four persons that follow in this verse are called the sons of Shem (1 Chron. i. 17). Nothing being more ordinary in Scripture, than to call those the sons of any person, who were his grandchildren (xxix. 5, &c.).

CHAPTER X. 53
shur, and Arphaxad, and Lud, and Aram.
23 And the children of Aram; Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Mash.
24 And Arphaxad begat Salah; and Salah begat Eber.

Uz, or Uz, the first-born of Aram, is generally said to have been the builder of Damascus: the valley belonging to which is, by the Arabs, at this day called Gant, and Ganta, which differs from Uz in the letters, but not in the pronunciation: it being connected with the letter ojn by our G, as in the words Gaza and Gomorrannah. Accordingly, the Arabic paraphrast for Uz hath here Agulta. There were two other Uz’s besides this, one the son of Nahor (Abraham’s brother), Gen. xxi. 21, whose country was Ausitis in Arabia Deserta: the other was of the posterity of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 28).

Hol, or Hul, Hebrew, or Cholanna, and Gaza, derives out of Potenomey; that was a city in Syria called Cholanna, which, they think, might be founded by this second son of Aram. But Bochart more probably conjectures that his posterity possessed the country called Cholobete, which was a part of Armenia. For the Armenians, and Arabsians, and Syrians, were much alike, as Sinaitic skulls, in their form of body, speech, and manner of life. And there are divers Sitces, which Potlemy places in this country, that begin with Hol or Chol; as Cholus, Cholata, Cholena: and Cholobete (the name of the country), which in their language is Choloth, signifies as much as the house or seat of Chol.

Gether, it is hard to give any account of the country where this posterity settled, unless they gave the river Getri its name, which the Greeks call Knarpay; which runs between the Carduchi and the Armenians, as Xenophon tells us. This is Bochart’s conjecture, which is a little nearer than that of Grotius (Annot. in lib. i. de V. R. C.), who explains this by the city Ginardus in Potenomey, and the people called by Or Chol Gindarus, the Celotesians. But after all, it may seem as probable that Gadara, the chief city of Perea, which Potlemy places in the Decapolis of Arabia Felix, had its name and original from this Gether.

Mash, or Marsh, who is called Mesech, in 1 Chron. i. 17, seated himself, as Bochart thinks, in Mesopotamia, as Sinaitic skulls, in their form of body, speech, and manners also, from whence there flowed a river which Xenophon calls Masca. The inhabitants of which mountain, Stephanus calls Masieni; and perhaps the Moscheni, whom Pliny speaks of, between Adiabene and Armenia the greater, were descended from this Mash, or Marsh.

Ver. 24. And Arphaxad begat Salah. Having given an account where the posterity of Shem’s youngest son, he now tells us what people descended from his third son.

Salah, in Hebrew Shelech: His father being born but two years after the flood (xi. 10), seems to have given this name to his son, to preserve the memory of that dreadful punishment; that his posterity might not be like by their sins. For Salo signifies the letting forth of waters (Job v. 10). He is thought to have been the father of the Susiani: the chief city of their country, next to Susa, being called Sela, as we find in Ammian. Marcellinus: either because he was the founder of it, or in memory of him.

And Salah begat Eber. The father of those from whom the Hebrew nation (as was said before, ver. 21), Abraham being descended from him in the sixth generation. All other derivations of the name of Hebrew have great objections lying against them; but this hath none that I can see, and is most agreeable to the grammar of that language, in which all such names ending in jod (as יָּבְּר doth) are noted to come either from a place, or country, or people, or a name, or to come from a deity. It is most reasonable to deduce it from the name of this people, Heber. And it is authorized by that speech of Balaam (Num. xxiv. 24). Where, as by Assur is meant the Assyrians, so by Eber, in all reason, we are to understand the Hebrews.

Ver. 25. Peleg, either he, or some of his posterity in memory of him, it is not unlikely, gave name to a land so happy it has been called Plataea, not far from the place where the river Chaburus runs into it: upon which Charran stood, built by Charan, the brother of Abraham.

For in his days was the earth divided. The great dispersion, which we read of in the following chapter, fell out just when he was born; which made his father call his name by this name. This division of the world seems to be the same as that of the little poets, the Golden Age (as Bochart observes, lib. i. Phaleg, cap. 9), because the earth not being divided, they enjoyed all things in common. And Noah (whom they called Saturn) governing them, not as kings do their subjects, but as parents their children, not so much with fear and dread, as with love and reverence to his fatherly authority; it made the world so happy, it has been called Plataea, of which see in the first book of the History.

Joktan or Jektan, the brother of Peleg, had a numerous offspring of thirteen sons; all seated in the inmost parts of Arabia Felix. So the Arabsians, it is certain, derive their original; who in this may as well be credited as the Europeans, who derive themselves from Japetus or Japheth, and the Africans from Cham. Accordingly, the Arabians (as SaNotice observes, lib. i. Phaleg, cap. 9), because the earth not being divided, they enjoyed all things in common. And Noah (whom they called Saturn) governing them, not as kings do their subjects, but as parents their children, not so much with fear and dread, as with love and reverence to his fatherly authority; it made the world so happy, it has been called Plataea, of which see in the first book of the History.

Ver. 36. Almodad. The eldest son of Joktan seems to have given name to the people whom Potlemy calls the originals of the river Euphrates, which runs into the Persian Gulf. The Greeks, who knew little of this people, who lived a great way from the sea, might easily mispronounce their name, calling them Allummoaes, instead of Almodaei.

Sheleph, or Saleph, was it likely, the father of the Sulapani. For such a people there were, mentioned by Potlemy, who calls them Etesiogia, who were remote from the rest, about the neck of Arabia, not far from the spring of the river Betus.

Hazarmaveth. Though the Arabs write this name with the very same letters, yet it sounds among them thus, Hadramuth, or Cadramuth, which the Greeks pronounce divers ways, because of the ambiguous sound of the two letters, tsaiu and saih, for sometimes he is called Asarmuth, sometimes (without an A) Sarmoth, and Armoth, as Bochartus hath observed; who thinks the country called Charatamitis or Aramatis, Chataramotis or Aramotitis, to have been peopled by the children of this Hadramuth, as the Arabians pronounce this name, Hawhs, Hawz, or the name of a city or place, and Armsaith, or of a people or nation. (Exercit. in Solin. p. 459.) And the same people, he observes (p. 490), are called by Artemidorus, Armantzira, whose country was that part of Arabia which abounded with frankincense, myrrh, cassia, and cinnamon, as Theophrastus tells us. And Strabo calls them (as he there notes) Xaraqazair, and Uranias in Stephanus, Xaraqwaizair; so differently was this hard word pronounced: who were so famous, that Eustathius Antioch., Eusebius, and others, make this Hazoraveth the father of the Arabians, and Epiphanius derives their language from him; which they (as was said before) derive from Jektan himself; looking upon the dialect of Chadra- and Hadoram, Bocharus, lib. ii. Phaleg, cap. 16, where he observes, that Hazoraveth in Hebrew signifies the entrance of death, and Hadravum in Arabic the region of death. Because the air of that country was very thick and foggy (and consequently unwholesome), as Arrianus relates, who saith, that the frankincense and myrrh were therefore gathered only by the king's slaves, and by condemned persons.

Jerub, or Jeruch. From whom came the people called Jeruzaecli, who lived near the Red Sea; called by Agatharides, and others, Azaziao, Alilai: which is the very same in Arabic with the other in Hebrew. For Ililai is the moon in that language, as Jeruch is in Hebrew. And the Nubians geographer mentions, that a people about Mecha, who, at this day, are called Bene-ililai, the children of Jeruch, as the Hebrews would have expressed it. It seems they are come more towards the east, when anciently they dwelt in the south. Ptolemy mentions also an island, upon the coast of Alilai, which he calls Uracanco, but it doth not signify the island of Chadra- and Hadoram, because it is altogether different from the old words to come from their tongue), but of the Jeruzaecli.

Ver. 27. Hadoram, He seems to have fixed his seat in the utmost corner of Arabia, towards the east, where there was a people whom Pliny calls Drimati, a name easily made from Hadoramus. And the extreme promontory of that country is called by the Greeks (Gor decorations) by translating the Hebrew R from Hadramouth. I can find nothing more likely than this conjecture of that great Bochartus, who hath outdone all that went before him in this argument (lib. ii. Phaleg, cap. 20).

Elai. Abraham Zachut, as he also observes, says, the Jews (who in his time dwelt there) called the chief city of Aljeman by the name, that is very proper, Jeruzalem, is the south part of Arabia Felix: as the very name of Jeman imports, which signifies both the right hand and the south.

Diklah. Both in the Chaldee and Syriac languages Dikla signifies a palm, or a grave of palms, which led Bochart to conclude, that the Mizrei, a people of Arabia Felix, whose country abounds with such trees, were the people of this Diklah, and Strabo mention them. And this is far more probable than the conjecture of Ludovicus Capellus, that the country of Dangala, in Ethiopia, near Egypt, might have its name from this man: for that is too remote from the rest of this man's posterity: and so is Doravadd mentioned, as he observes, by Herodotus (Chronolog. Scaen. p. 105).

Ver. 28. And Obal, Which, in the Arabic pronunciation, is Abual, as cacoeb, a star in Hebrew, is in Arabic caucuc, &c. The posterity of this Abual, or Obal, Bochart thinks, was settled over the straits of the Sinus Arabice, and came into Abia Felix, into Arabia Troglydites, where we meet with this name, in the Sinus Abalites (which others call Aulites, and in a great trading town called by Arrianus Aexxuqptis, and in a people who lived in that Sinus, called by Ptolemy, Aexxuartis, and Aebaxiuris: I believe it should be Aebaxiuris, from this Obal.

Arainad, Which the Arabians pronounce Abinal, i.e. the father of Malai, or the Malite: a people in Arabia next to the Mizrei before mentioned. Theophrastus saith, Mali is the metropolis of a country in Arabia the Spyce: from whence the people called Malite, whom Ptolemy calls Manise, by a usual change of the letter L into N, as Nabonius is the same with Labonius, &c. And it is probable that Mali is the contraction of Abimali: nothing being more common than in compound names to omit the first part. As Sittim (Numb. xxv. 1) for Abel-Sittim (xxx. 19), Hermon very often for Baal-Hermon (Judg. iii. 3), Nimrim for Beth-Nimrim, and Salen for Jerusalem.

Sheba. From whom came the Sabeans, who sometimes comprehend a great many people, but here are to be strictly taken for those upon the Red Sea, between the Mizrei and the Catabanes: whose metropolis, which stood upon a high mountain full of trees, is called by ancient authors Saba and Sabali, Sabbo and Sasab, as Salmassius shows out of Stephanus, Agatharides, and others; who say that this city was Ecoehad. Which the Arabians pronounce Aphur, signifying abundance: gold being found there in such plenty, that they exchanged it for brass and iron, giving a double or triple proportion of gold for them. Bochart thinks he gave the name of Gopher, to an island in the Red Sea, mentioned by EupomONUS in Eusebius, and observes that there were two Ophirs, one belonging to India, whither Solomon's ships went once in three years (which he takes for Taprobana, now Zelien, and the other belonging to Arabia, where the posterity of this Ophi here mentioned, was settled. Bochart thinks he gave the name of Gopher to the Sabeans, their brethren; which Stephan and Ptolemy call Cassanitis. The same in sense with Ophi, for Chosan is a treasure, which the Arabians write Chazan, from which comes the word Gaza, for abundance of riches.

Havilah or Chawilah. See ver. 7, where we had this name before, among the sons of Japheth: from the Havilah here spoken of is very different: giving name, it is probable, to the country which the Nubians geographer calls Chaulan: and says it 30 And their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east.
31 These are the sons of Shem, after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after their nations.

was a part of Arabia Felix, nigh also to the Sabæans; which he accurately describes. See Phæleg. li. cap. 28.

Jobab.] The father of the Jobabites, near to the Sachalites, as Ptolemy expressly says, if instead of Jobarite in him, Jobar it be. And when Arabia Felix, at the eastward of Arabia, is thus understood, the passage being given with great reason. And thinks also the reason of this name to be plain: for Jebab in Arabic signifies a desert: and there are many such in the country of the Jobabites, above the Sinus of Sachalites.

Ver. 30. And their dwelling was from Mesha, &c.] This conclusion confirms what hath been said, that all the thirteen sons of Joktan were seated in Arabia Felix, except Obal, who went, it is likely, after Moses's time, over into Abalities; the passage being short across that strait before mentioned (ver. 25), which was not above four or five miles broad. For Arabia Felix lies between the Red Sea and the Persia Gulf. Now Mesa, or Musa, or Mesa, was formerly pawned in the Red Sea, which the Egyptians and Ethiopians frequented in their way to the country of the Sapharites in the east; from whom they brought myrrh, frankincense, and such-like things. Ptolemy's Tables plainly show this, that from Musa the Saparites lay directly eastward; and Saphar was the metropolis of the country, at the foot of the mountains Chima, who were ancients, it is likely, was called Saphar, from the city at the bottom of it. And thus we are to understand Moses when he says here, that Sephar was a mountain of the east; not eastward from Judea, but from Mesha, which was in the west. See Bochart (lib. ii. Phæleg. cap. 30), where he observes, that the Arabic paraphrase (of the Paris edition) takes Mesha to be Meecha, and instead of "from Mesha to Sephar," says "from Meecha to Medina." Which is nearer truth than their opinion, who place the children of Joktan about Coptes, upon the coast of India. But he shows that some of the children of Cush settled between Meecha and Medina: and it sufficiently appears that Joktan's children dwelt in the utmost part of Arabia Felix, and in the genuine Arabia.

Ver. 31. This is explained, ver. 5.

Ver. 32. By these were the nations divided—after the flood.] They and their descendants shared the whole earth among them, as it is said expressly (ix. 19), "Of them was the whole earth overspread. But, according to the foregoing account, we find only three parts of the earth, Europe, Asia, and Africa, possessed by the three sons of Noah and their children. Which has made some so bold as to say, there were other people in the world, who were not discovered by the flood. And one of their reasons why it was not peopled from any of the other three parts of the earth is, that we can give no account how lions, bears, wolves, foxes, and such-like creatures, should get thither: for none, sure, would carry them by shipping, though men themselves might, by that means, pass over into those regions. But this difficulty is not so great as they make it. For it is manifest, that, though the continent of America was found full of such beasts, when the Spaniards first came thither, yet none of the islands, though very large, which lay remote from the land, had any lions, tigers, or such-like creatures in them. Which is a proof positive demonstration, that these creatures were not originally from that part of the earth; for then the islands would have been furnished with them as well as the continent; just as they are with all sorts of vegetables: and consequently, the continent itself was stored with these creatures from some other part of the earth. Which might be done by some neck of land not yet discovered; which joints some part of Europe, or Asia, to the continent of America. Or, if there be no such neck of land now extant, yet there may have been such a bridge (as we may call it) between the northern part of Asia, or Europe, and some northern part of America; or between the south-east part of China, or the Philippine islands, and the southern continent of that other part of this world, though now broken off (as many suppose England to have been from France) by the violence of the sea, or by earthquakes: which have made great alterations in the earth. And truly, he that observes (as that great man the Lord Chief Justice Hales speaks, in his book of the Origin of Mankind, § ii. ch. 7) the infinite number of islands, lying between the continent of America, and Nova Guinea, the most contiguous to each other; hath probable reasons to believe, that these were all formerly one continent, joining China and Nova Guinea together, though now, by the irruption of the sea, crumbled into many small islands.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. And the whole earth] i. e. The inhabitants of the earth: as (1 Kings x. 24) "all the earth" is explained (2 Chron. xiii. 22). "all the kings of the earth," &c. Of one language.] In the Hebrew, of one lip; which is one instrument of speech comprehending the rest. Their mouth formed the same words. So it follows:

One speech.] Or word, as the Hebrew hath it. Some distinguish these two so subtly, as to say, they had not only the same language, but the same manner of pronunciation; which is often very different in the same language. The Hebrew translation has acknowledge there was but one language anciently (see Josephus, and out of him Eusebius, lib. ix. Prep. Evang. cap. 14, 15), which, in all likelihood, was the same that had been from the beginning.
make brick, and burn them thoroughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar.

which Adam himself spake. For Methuselah, the grandfather of Noah, lived some time with him, and spake, we may well suppose, the same language that he did. And we cannot but think the same of Noah, who propagated it among his posterity till this time. But whether this was the Hebrew or no, we cannot be certain. The Chaldean paraphrases, and the Hebrew writers, generally say it was; and most Christian writers have been of their opinion: insomuch that R. Gedaliah, upon these words, saith, "the wise men among the Chaldeans have not that was the first tongue; and all the world confesses that from Adam to the flood they spake the holy language." Which it is not to be thought we have now entire and pure; but that a considerable part of it still remains in the Bible. As may be proved by no contemptible arguments; particularly this, that Shem, the son of Noah, was for some time contemporaneous with Adam, who descended from him; and in whose family continued the same language, which they both spake, unto Moses's days.

They that have fancied there were more languages than one, at this time, grounded their mistake upon those words (Gen. x. 5, 20, 31), where the sons of Noah are said to have had the earth divided among them, going to their houses, and conceived that he speaks of this very division, of which he is going to give an account; and briefly mentioned there (ver. 25). For the thirteen sons of Joktan, immediately after mentioned (who had their share in the division), were not in being when their uncle Peleg was born; as the most learned primate Usher hath demonstrated. This was a true tradition, as Kimchi and Kimchi; Bochart, and many others, describe the walls of Babylon as made of such materials. What hekmar is (which was the cement to join the bricks together), doth not so plainly appear. We translate it slime; following herein a great many of the Hebrews; particularly Kimchi, who says it is mortar, made of sand and lime. But there is much reason to think the bricks of which he speaks were laid upon the water, and so Strabo and Justin affirm, and so it was very fit for this purpose; and Herodotus says expressly, that the walls of Babylon were cemented with it, and so do many others, both Greek and Roman authors, mentioned by Bochartus, (lib. i. Phalæg. cap. 13). And it is very observable, that Arrianus saith (lib. vii.), "The temple of Belus, in the midst of the city of Babylon, a very large structure, was made of brick, cemented with asphaltus."

Ver. 2. As they journeyed from the east.] He doth not speak of all the posterity of Noah, who, after the flood, planted in the east; much less Noah himself; but of a great colony of them, who, when the east was much peopled, chose to go westward. By the east, most understand Armenia, where they suppose the ark rested, and Noah with his sons planted. But this之则 were thirty or forty years after the deluge, which is much too soon. Armenia lay north of Shinar, or Assyria, and not east. Which Bochart solves in this manner: Assyria being divided into two parts, one on this side, the other on the further side of Tigris, they called all that part beyond Tigris the east country, though a great part of it towards Armenia was easterly; and that part on this side they called west, though some of it lay to the south (lib. i. Phalæg. cap. 7). But there is no need of the help of this solution; the mountains of Ararat running a long way eastward; from which, when Noah and his sons descended, they settled, it is likely, in countries which were very much eastward of Assyria. They continued to dwell in the mountainous countries of the east, where the ark rested, till they grew very numerous and wanted room; and then descended into the plain, and some of them went westwardly into the land of Shinar, that pleasant plain (as Mr. Mede fancier) where God, at the beginning, had placed the first father of mankind, Adam.

Shinar.] By this name we are to understand, not only that part of Assyria where Babylon stood, but all that country which bordered upon Tigris upon the mountains of Armenia; from whence Noah and his sons are supposed to have descended when the earth was dry, and not to have gone far thence, at first. Adam was an. multitude, and then some of them came into this country, which Noah had inhabited before the flood. Thus Bochart, in the place before named. But there is no certainty the ark rested in Armenia; it might be further eastward; upon some say it was on a long ridge of mountains called Ararat: from whence they descended when the earth was dry, and dwelt in the lower grounds, which were warmer and more fruitful than the mountains.

But that from the east mankind were propagated, is apparent from the increase of arts and sciences; which, as Dr. Jackson observes (book i. ch. 15), were in some measure perfected there (in times as ancient as any profane history can point us unto), and thence derived, as from a centre, to more remote parts of the world. The ripeness of literature, civil discipline, and arts, among the eastern people, before they did so much as bud forth in Greece or Italy (I may add Egypt either), is a demonstration, that these were the true stock of the human race, which branches transplanted from thence. Nay, the state and grandeur of those eastern countries, before Greece or Italy, or any other western people, grew into the fashion of a kingdom, shows that the eastern people were the heirs of the world, and other nations but as colonies from them.

Ver. 3. They said one to another, i.e. consulted together.

Go to.] And stirred up one another to lay all their hands to this work.

Let us make brick.] In that low and fat soil there was no stone, as intimated in the next words, "and they had brick for stone." Nobody doubts but this was a true tradition, as Herodotus, and Justin, and many others, describe the walls of Babylon as made of such materials. What chomar is (which was the cement to join the bricks together), doth not so plainly appear. We translate it slime; following herein a great many of the Hebrews; particularly Kimchi, who says it is mortar, made of sand and lime. But there is much reason to think the bricks of which he speaks were laid upon the water, and so Strabo and Justin affirm, and so it was very fit for this purpose; and Herodotus says expressly, that the walls of Babylon were cemented with it, and so do many others, both Greek and Roman authors, mentioned by Bochartus, (lib. i. Phalæg. cap. 13). And it is very observable, that Arrianus saith (lib. vii.), The temple of Belus, in the midst of the city of Babylon, a very large structure, was made of brick, cemented with asphaltus.

Ver. 4. And they said, Go to, let us build a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we

5 And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men built.

6 And the Lord said, Behold, the people is the Acropolis (as the Greeks speak), a strong place in the highest part of the city; such as we call a citadel. For the Scripture by a tower, means some fortress to keep out an enemy, which was not wont to be built in the midst of the city, that it might command every part of it.

So fancy the temple of Belus, before mentioned, was afterward built where this tower stood; and was nothing else but the tower perfected for another use. Or, rather, a temple was built round about the tower, which stood in the midst of it, as Herodotus describes it (lib. i.), for μείγεν δε των τιεων παρετερευσε στεροεπικρατεικος, and, "in the midst of the temple was a strong tower," &c.

Whose top may reach unto heaven;] i. e. To the clouds. As much as to say, an exceeding high tower. For the same is said of the walls of the cities of Canaan, (Deut. i. 28, ix. 1,) and therefore can mean no more here. And is a usual phrase in Scripture; as when the Psalms say, they that sail upon the sea are sometime lifted up to heaven (evil. 25), which is a language that other authors speak; for Homer mentions a fire tree which was σαπουνικυτακαι ἐκείνη τοις παρετερευσε στεροεπικρατεικος, &c, "in the midst of the temple was a strong tower," &c.

Ver. 5. And the Lord came down to see, &c.] This is an accommodation to our conceptions, and means no more, but that by the effects he made it appear, that he observed their motions and knew their intentions.

Which the children of men built.] It is generally agreed that children of men in Scripture is opposed to children of God; as bad men and infidels are to the good and the faithful. Which gives us to understand, that these people had no mind to submit unto it; and therefore built this fortress to defend themselves from their resolution of not yielding to his design. Thus the most learned Usher (ad A. M. 1757). But what they dreaded they brought upon themselves by their own vain attempt to avoid it; and now there is no memory preserved of the names of those that conspired in this attempt. Thus what Solomon saith, Let not the wise man say in his heart, I have understanding, and I know all things; as (for x. 5), "The fear of the wicked shall come upon him." But this evil by God's providence was attended with a great good; for by this dispersion the whole earth was peopled, and the foundation laid of several great nations and kingdoms.

Dr. Tenison, now bishop of Lincoln, in his book of Idolatry (which is not inconsistent with these), that this tower was consecrated by the builders of it to the sun, as the cause of drying up the waters of the deluge, (or rather, as the most extraordinary and imposing resemblance of the Shechinah, as I noted on ch. iv.), and that it was intended as an altar whereon to sacrifice to it. But it is propounded only as a conjecture; which those Jews seem also to have had in their minds, who, by the word Sem (name), understand God: as if their meaning were, "let us make us a god," and raise him a temple. And perhaps future times did convert it to that use. Lest we be scattered abroad, &c.] Here they speak as if they feared a dispersion; but it is hard to tell from what cause, unless it were this, that Noah having projected a division of the earth among his posterity (for it was a deliberate business, as I noted upon x. 5), these people had no mind to submit unto it; and therefore built this fortress to defend themselves from their resolution of not yielding to his design. Thus the most learned Usher (ad A. M. 1757). But what they dreaded they brought upon themselves by their own vain attempt to avoid it: and now there is no memory preserved of the names of those that conspired in this attempt. Thus what Solomon saith, Let not the wise man say in his heart, I have understanding, and I know all things; as (for x. 5), "The fear of the wicked shall come upon him." But this evil by God's providence was attended with a great good; for by this dispersion the whole earth was peopled, and the foundation laid of several great nations and kingdoms.
other bad people were too much disposed to follow, and that they who retained the true religion (from whom Abraham descended) were not of the number, it is credible that they escaped the punishment here mentioned (in the next verses), retaining still their ancient seat, and the ancient language also; which continued in the family of Heber, and was called He-

Ver. 6.] This verse only expresses a resolution to spoil their project, and the necessity of so doing.

Ver. 7. Let us] The rabbins fancy this is spoken to the angels. But it is beyond the angelical power to alter men’s minds so in a moment, that they shall not be able to understand what they did before. Therefore God spoke to himself: and this phrase suggests to us more persons than one in the godhead. In short, none but He, who taught men at first to speak, could, in an instant, make that variety of speech which is described in the next words. Novatianus therefore anciently took it, that this was spoken by God to his Son.

Confound their language.] The word confound is to be marked; for God did not make every one speak a new different language, but they had such a con-

And yet it is not to be thought, there were as many several dialects as there were men, so that none of them understood another; for this would not merely have dispersed mankind, but destroyed them. It being impossible to live without society, or to have society without understanding one another, the common drift of the several dialects must have been, to prevent the confusion by their not being able to have such familiarity as they had before with every body; but only with those who understood their particular speech.

Into how many languages they were divided none can determine. The Hebrews fancy into seventy, which opinion hath much prevailed, being grounded upon the foregoing chapter; where the descendants from the sons of Noah were just so many. The Greek fathers made them seventy-two, because the Greek version adds two more (Elissa among the sons of Japheth, and Cainan among the sons of Shem), and the Latin fathers follow them. But this is a very weak foundation; it being apparent that many of the sons of Canaan used the very same language in their country, and so did also the sons of Mede, and the sons of Japheth, and in other places, so many were confounded in the use of the same speech, that scarce thirty remains of the seventy to be distinct, as Bochart hath observed. See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr, cap. 9, sect. iii.

10 ¶ These are the generations of Shem: Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood:

11 And Shem lived after he begat Arphaxad five hundred years, and begat sons and daughters.

12 And Arphaxad lived five and thirty years, and begat Salah:

13 And Arphaxad lived after he begat Salah four hundred and three years, and begat sons and daughters.

14 And Salah lived thirty years, and begat Eber:

plantation more easterly, who kept, as I said, the primitive language.

Scatter them abroad, &c.] This dispersion was so sudden, that each family and each nation dwelt by itself; which could not well be done, as Mr. Mede observes, but by directing an orderly division; either by casting of lots, or choosing according to their birthright, after portions of the earth were set out according to the number of their nations and families. For otherwise, some would not have been content to go so far north as Magog did; and others suffered to enjoy more pleasant countries.

Ver. 10. These are the generations of Shem:] It appears from the foregoing chapter, that these here mentioned were not all the persons who descended from him; but these were the ancestors of Abram, whom Moses derives by these from Shem.

Ver. 11. As Melchisedek, five hundred years,] So that, as he had seen Methuselah and Lamech before the flood, he might also see, not only Abram, but his son Isaac, who by this account was one-and-twenty years old when Shem died.

Ver. 14. Begat Eber:] Who was the father of those from whom came the Hebrew nation; Abram being descended from him in the sixth generation. And that nation being called Eber (Numb. xxv. 24), and "the children of Eber" (Gen. x. 21), it is not reasonable, as I observed before, to seek for any other derivation of the name of Hebrews.

Ver. 16. Peleg, or Phaleg:] It is not unlikely that either he, or some of his posterity in memory of him, gave name to a town upon Euphrates called Phaleg; not far from the place where Chaborus runs into it, upon which Harach (or Charrah) stood, built by Haran, Abram’s brother.

Ver. 18. Reu:] (or Ragau, as some pronounce the Hebrew word) gave name to a field near Assyria (Judith i. 5), or, as Tobit saith, in Media; where Strabo mentions a city called Ragas, and so doth Stephanus, Ράγας πόλις ἐν Μηθὺ. In the hundred and thirtieth year of his life, if we may believe Elmacinus (p. 29), Nimrod began to reign in Babylon; and in his days also, he says, the Egyptian kingdom began. Which need not seem strange, though scarce two hundred years were passed since the flood, when we consider the vast increase of people in these ages, from a few planters, within such a compass of time; and likewise the extraordinary fruitfulness which God after the flood bestowed upon them for the peopling of the earth. For he says twice to Noah and his sons, immediately after they came out of the ark, "Increase and multiply (xii. 7), and replenish the earth." From this antiquity of the Egyptian kingdom, it is, that the later Pharaohs called themselves "the sons of ancient kings" (Isa. xix. 11).

In Reu’s time also, both the Egyptians and Babylonians now began to make images and worship them, if Patridges may be credited. See Hotting, Smegma Orient. cap. 8, n. 16.

Ver. 20. Begat Serug:] From whom (Bochartus thinks) some of his descendants might call the city Sarug: which the Arabian geographer says was near to Charh. He began to celebrate every year the memory of famous men, after they were dead, and commanded them to be honoured as benefactors, if we may believe Stilbas, in the word Σερυς, and Damascus, and a long roll of other authors mentioned by Jacobus Geusius, (par. 1. cap. 2, De Victoribus Humannis).

Ver. 22. Begat Nahor:] The same writers say, that idolatry increasing much in his days, there was a great earthquake (the first that had been observed) which overthrew their temples, and broke their images in Arabia.

Ver. 24. Terah:] Whom they make to have been an idolatrous priest; but to have repented and been converted to the worship of the true God. See ver. 31.

Ver. 26. And Terah lived seventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran.] i. e. He was seventy years old before he had any children, and then had three sons one after another; who are not set down in the order wherein they were born. For Abram’s being first named doth not prove him to have been the eldest son of Terah, no more than Shem’s being first named among Noah’s three sons, proves him to have been the first born (ix. 18). For there are good reasons to prove that Abram was born sixty years after Haran, who was the eldest son; having two daughters married to his two brothers, Nahor and Abram; who seems to be the youngest, though named first, both
CHAPTER XII.

28 And Haran died before his father Terah in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees.

29 And Abram and Nahor took them wives: the name of Abram's wife was Sarai; and the name of Nahor's wife, Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of Milcah, and the father of Iscah.

30 But Sarai was barren; she had no child.

And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter in law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there.

here and in the next verse, because of his preemi-

See ver. 32.

Ver. 28. Haran died before his father, &c.] In his own country (as it here follows), out of which he did not go, as the Chaldeans must do, for they were not permitted to sojourn there.

In Ur of the Chaldees.] That part of Mesopotamia which was next to Assyria, is called the land of the Chaldees. For Ur, as Abram himself observes, was in Mesopotamia; lying in the way from Tigris to Nisi-

And therefore St. Stephen makes Mesopotamia and the land of the Chaldees the very same (Acts vii. 2, 4). Eupolemus, indeed, as Bochart notes, places this city, as Ur; to which place, see the note (ver. 31), in Babylon; but Ammianus speaks of an Ur in Mesopotamia, situated as before mentioned; which we have reason to think was the place from whence Abraham came, because from thence to Canaan the way lay straight through Charran (or Haran), but it did not so do if he came from Babylon. And no good account can be given why he should go about through Mesopotamia and Charran, when there was a shorter way through Arabia, if he came from Babylon.

Ver. 29. The father of Iscah, i. e. Of Sarai, whom Abram married; she being his eldest brother's daughter, sister to Lot. For Haran had three children, Lot (ver. 27), and Milcah, whom Nahor married, and Sarah, whose name is called Iscah (as it is Haran, dying, the two remaining brethren married his two daughters. For if we should understand anybody else by Iscah but Sarah, there is no account whence she descended; which Moses sure would not have omitted, because it very much concerned his nation to know from whom they came, both by the father's and the mother's side: It is no wonder she should have two names, one before they came out of Chaldea, and another after.

Ver. 31. Went forth—from Ur of the Chaldees.] See what was said ver. 26, unto which I have nothing to add but this, that this country was so famous for superstitution, that the Chaldeans, in Daniel's time, were reckoned as a distinct sort of diviners from other nations, astrologers, and soothsayers, or sorcerers (Dun. ii. 2, 10, iv. 7, v. 11). And it is likely, from some sort of men, Terah and his family learned the worship of idols (Josh. xxiv. 2). But though he had been an idolater, yet it may be probably concluded from his leaving Ur of the Chaldees, with an intention to go to Canaan (as it is here said), that now he was become a worshipper of the true God. For what should he move him to it, but obedience to the Divine direction which Abram received (as we read in the next chapter), to which he would not have agreed, if he had not believed in God; as Lot, it is plain, did, whom he took along with him! That word is much to be remarked, which makes him the principal agent in their removal; Abram himself being governed by his motion: for Moses says, "He took Abram, and Lot, the son of Haran," &c. And though Nahor did not now go along with his father to Haran (being left behind, perhaps, to look after some concerns), yet afterwards he followed him, with all his family; as appears from chap. xxvii. 43, and the following chapter. And he also forsook idolatry; for Rebekah and Sarah's grandfather, and the father of Esau and Jacob, was a worshipper of the true God (though with a mixture of some superstition), for he makes mention of Jehovah upon several occasions (Gen. xxiv. 31, 50, 51).

And they came unto Haran.] It is possible that Terah going thither was not his design, and staying in this place called the city Xap^at, Charran, after the name of his son Haran (or Charan), who died a little before (ver. 28). For both the Greek and Roman writers call a city, famous for the death of Crassus, by the name of Charrar; situate on a river of the same name. It is likely from Abram's brother were derived both the name of the country, of which the Arabians by this day call Charan, or Charran.

And dwelt there.] It is plain he intended to go to Canaan, and not to settle here; but being arrested with the sickness of which he died, could go no further.

Ver. 32. And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years.] Moses doth not sum up the years of his man's life mentioned in this chapter (as he doth in chap. v.), but only of Terah's. Which he doth on purpose that we may know when this new period of time began (of Abram's leaving his own country, and thereby becoming the father of the faithful), which we are not to count from the time when Terah began to have children (ver. 26), but from the time of his being seventy-five years old; that is, threescore years and ten years old; that is, three score years after his brother Haran, as I said on ver. 26.

CHAPTER XII.

1 God calleth Abram, and blesseth him with a promise of Christ. 4 He departeth with Lot from Haran. 6 He journeyeth through Canaan, 7 which is promised him in a vision. 10 He is driven by a famine into Egypt. 11 Fear maketh him feign his wife to be his sister. 14 Pharaoh, having taken her from him, by plagues is compelled to restore her.

I Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee:

Many ancient authors speak of Abram, as Josephus observes, and out of him Eusebius, who names others also (lib. ix. Prepar. Evang. cap. 16, 17, &c.). All that I shall note is, that one great design of Moses being to lead the Jews to understand the genealogy 2 And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: 3 And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.

of this noble ancestor of theirs, he hastens to it; relating other matters briefly, but spending many pages about him. For he composes, for instance, the history of the world from the creation to the present age, including five thousand six hundred and fifty-six years, in the compass of six chapters; but bestows on the history of Abram nineteen chapters, though it contains no longer space of time than a hundred and seventy-five years.

Ver. 1. Note the Lord had said unto Abram.] While he was in Chaldea, he heard the voice of his Maker certain he called him while his father was alive (xi. 31). We are not told how he spoke to him; for here is no mention, as Maimonides observes (par. ii. cap. 41), of his speaking in a dream, or a vision, or by the hand of an angel; but only simply and absolutely that "the Lord said to him." By a voice, when he was in Ur, he speaks to Abraham (Deuteronomy 4.32), to St. Stephen saith expressly, "the Lord of glory appeared to him, before he dwelt in Charran" (Acts vii. 2).

Get thee out of thy country, &c.] Which began a good while ago to be infected with idolatry (see xi. 18, 22), some of Shem's posterity forgetting the Creator of all, and worshipping the sun as the great God, and the stars as lesser gods. So Maimonides, in his More Nevoch, (par. iii. cap. 29), where he saith the Zabii relate in one of their books (which he there names), that Abram contradicting their worship, the king of the country imprisoned him, and afterwards banished him into the utmost parts of the east, and confiscated all his estate. A tale invented to take away from him the honour of his voice, leaving his country, and to discredit this sacred history, which tells us he directed his course quite another way, towards the west. Abarbinel, and others, will not have this call of God to Abram to have been when he was in Ur, but after they came to Haran; to which he fancies Terah came, because of some words (Gen. b. 12, 13) that he had in Ur; but this is invented to contradict St. Stephen (Acts vii. 2), with whom Aben Ezra agrees, who expounds these words of his calling out of Ur. For it is hard to find any other reason why he designed to go to Canaan (xi. 31), the place whither he went after Terah was dead.

Unto a land that I will show thee.] He had the Divine direction, it seems, all along, to conduct him in his journey. But it argued, as the apostle observes, a great faith in God, that he would follow him, not knowing the country to which he would lead him.

Ver. 2. And I will make of thee a great nation.] First by multiplying his posterity, and then by making them a select, peculiar people; whom he distinguished, by his favours, from all other nations. So it follows: I will bless thee.] Bestow many benefits, both temporal and spiritual, upon them.

And make thy name great.] Make him famous throughout the world; as he is to this day, not only among the Jews, but among Christians and Mahomedans. So much did all mankind admire Abram, even they that are not of his seed.

Thou shalt be a blessing.] Others shall be the better for thee; as Lot was, and the king of Sodom, &c. Or, as the Hebrews understand it, thou shalt be so prosperous, that when men would wish well to others, they shall use thy name, and say, "The Lord bless thee as he did Abram." See notes on "and make thy name great." Ver. 3. Note the highest token of a particular friendship which he here contracts with Abram (who is called the friend of God) in promising to espouse his interest so far as to have the same friends and enemies that he had. Which is the form wherein kings and princes make the strictest leagues one with another.

And in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.] Which was most eminently fulfilled in Christ. And indeed the faithful followers of Christ, of all ages and countries, are here included. All the faithful of all ages and countries, in particular, will be blessed; all the nations and races will have him (in the place beforenamed), that the Zababeus loaded Abram with all manner of curses and reproaches (when he was sent out of their country), which he bearing patiently, God turned upon themselves.

And in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.] Which was most eminently fulfilled in Christ. And indeed the faithful followers of Christ, of all ages and countries, are here included. All the faithful of all ages and countries, in particular, will be blessed; all the nations and races will have him (in the place beforenamed), that the Zababeus loaded Abram with all manner of curses and reproaches (when he was sent out of their country), which he bearing patiently, God turned upon themselves.

Ver. 4. So Abram departed, &c.] Having stayed some time in Haran, where his father fell sick and died, he prosecuted his journey from thence to Canaan, along by the way of Charran, till he arrived in the land of promise; and his eldest son, or rather the son of his espoused wife, was then dead. So St. Stephen tells us expressly (Acts vii. 4), "From thence i.e. from Charran; when his father was dead, he removed him into this land." &c. It was a wonderful effect of Abram's faith (I observed before) to move him to leave his own native country and go to Haran: but it was still a greater, after he had travelled a long way in that direction, to give up all, and turn back. This was a new proof of his faith. Though his wife and his house had gone before him, so that他 was alone, he yet trusted in the Lord, and went hence to Canaan; a country of which he had no knowledge, nor had sent anybody before him to discover it: taking his journey through the dangerous and barren deserts of Palmyra; and having nothing to support him, but only the promise of God; which made him climb over the high mountains, either of Lebanon, Hermon, or Taurus; for in that part of the country he entered, as Sir W. Raleigh hath observed. See ver. 5.

And Lot went with him.] He might conclude, perhaps, that Abram, being called in a special manner out of Chaldea, was thereby distinguished from the rest of Shem's posterity; and that he joining with him in obeying the same call, might claim the privilege of fulfilling the promise of the Messiah, no less than Abram. See xi. ult.

Ver. 5. And the souls that they had gotten (Hebrew, had made) in Haran.] i.e. All the slaves born in their house, or bought with their money. The Chaldee paraphrase interprets this of the proselytes they had made for such only would Abram carry with him. And some of the Hebrew doctors are so nice, as to say, that Abram instructed the men, and Sarai the women, in the true religion; concerning which he wrote a book (if we may believe Maimonides, De had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came.

6 And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. And the Canaanite was then in the land.

7 And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and Idolol. cap. 1), and left it to his son Isaac. We read also in Pirkic Eliezer, cap. 25, that he took a house, which fronted Charran, where, according to the ancient piety, he kept great hospitality: and inviting those that went in or came out of the town to refresh themselves if they pleased, set meat and drink before them; saying, "There is but one God in the world.

And into the land of Canaan they came: but the care told before (xi. 31), that Terah went forth to go to this country, but could not reach it, as Abram did: who entered into it, at the north part of it, as appears from the following part of the story; where we read he went to Sichem, &c., and ver. 9, went on "still towards the south."

And the Canaanite was then in the land.) Or, as Mr. Mede, following the LXX, will have it, the oak of Moreh: understanding by oak, not only one single oak, but a holt or grove of oaks. See xiii. 18. Where I suppose he intended to have fixed his dwelling; not the temper of the people, who inhabited that country, made it inconvenient.

And the Canaanite was then in the land.) It was very pertinent to Moses's design, speaking of Abram's passage through this country, to tell who was at that time possessed of it. But it is dubious whether he meant by the Canaanite a particular people descended from Canaan, as he doth xxi. 21, or, in general, all the nations which the Israelites afterwards destroyed. It seems to me the first of these is meant, and that by land he means only that part of that country where Sichem lay, which was then possessed by this particular people; for, in the next place that Abram went to, it is said, "The Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land" (xiv. 7), i.e. in that part of the country: where we do not read what entertained Abram means, but we make it an argument of Abram's great faith, that he would adventure among such a rough and fierce people, who had no kindness for the posterity of Shem upon an old score: and, if the ancient tradition in Epiphanius be true, upon a fresh account: for he saith (Heres. xvi. n. 84), that this country called Canaan did really belong to the children of Shem, by virtue of the division made among the sons of Noah, which children of Canaan had dispossessed them. So that these words, "the Canaanite was then in the land," signify, they had already invaded this country, before Abram came thither. To whom God promising to give it, be only restored the posterity of Shem (from whom Abram descended) unto that which the children of Ham had wrongfully setted.

By which all it is easy to see how frivolous their reasons are, who, from this place, conclude Moses did not write this book: because these words seem to signify the writer of them lived after the Canaanites were thrown out of this land: which was after Moses's death.

The men had not a greater inclination to cavil, than to find out the truth, they would rather have said the meaning is, The Canaanite was possessed of this part of the country in Abram's time, though thrown out of it by Jacob's sons (Gen. xxxiv.), before there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him.

And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Beth-el, and pitched his tent, having Beth-el on the west, and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord.

And Abram journeyed, going on still toward the south.

the times of Moses. Which is another way of explaining these words: against which I see no objection but this, that their prince is called a Hivite (xxxiv. 2). To which there is an answer (ver. 30), which shows the people were partly Canaanites.

Ver. 7. And the Lord appeared unto Abram.) As he had done before (ver. 1), but now, it is likely, in a more glorious manner: to establish him in faith and obedience.

And said, Unto thy seed.) There was a voice came from the Sheechinah, or Divine glory, which now appeared to him: and told him this was the country he intended to bestow upon his posterity. It is very remarkable, that he no sooner entered Canaan, but God renewed his promise to him, made before he came out of his own country.

And it is further observable (as we shall see in the following story), that Abram's obedience was constantly rewarded in kind, according to the quality of the service he performed: though, in quantity, the reward far exceeded the service. Thus, having left his own country and father's house (which was the first trial of his obedience), God promises to give him the whole land of Canaan, and to make his posterity a mighty nation. See xvii. 6, xxii. 16.

And there builded he an altar, &c.) This was so glorious an appearance, that it moved him to offer up a solemn sacrifice to God, for which he built an altar here in Sichem.

And being the first that he built in this country, it made this become the first place that was established for public worship, after the Israelites conquered the land of Canaan. For here was the sanctuary of God in Joshua's time, near this very grove where Abram first pitched his tent, and built an altar (Josh. xxiv. 1, 25, 26). It continued famous and in alternating hands from Joshua, xvi. 11.

Ver. 8. And he removed from thence, &c.) Though the Lord here appeared to him, yet he did not think fit to trust himself among the Canaanites (who were the chief of the wicked nations that possessed this land), or he thought fit to see the rest of the country, which God promised to give him: and therefore came hither, which was about twenty miles further southward. Now

And there he builded he an altar.) Upon the mountain; where they anciently chose to sacrifice, rather than in other places. And, it is likely, God again appeared to him here to encourage and strengthen him against all his fears: which made him build a new altar and offer sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, to implore his continued favour.

And it is observable, that the promise which God made in the former place (ver. 7), he renewed again in this, and more at large, after he came out of Egypt (xiii. 3, 4, 11-16).

On the east of Beth-el.] So it was called in after-times.

Ver. 9. And Abram journeyed, &c.) He did not think fit to fix yet in the forenamed place; but made a further progress into the southern parts of the country.

Yet after he had been in Egypt (the story of which follows), he returned to this place.
And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land.

And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon:

Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive.

Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee.

And it came to pass, that, when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman that she was very fair.

The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house.

And he entreated Abram well for her sake: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he asses, and menservants, and maidservants, and she asses, and camels.

And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai Abram's wife.

And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife? I might have taken her to me wife: now therefore behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way.

And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him: and they sent him away, and his wife, and all that he had.

CHAPTER XIII.

CHAP. XIII.

1 Abram and Lot return out of Egypt. 7 By disagreement they part anawder. 10 Lot goeth to wicked Sodom. 14 God reneweth the promise to Abram. 18 He removeth to Hebron, and there buildeth an altar.

1 And Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the south.

2 And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold.

3 And he went on his journeys from the south.

Ver. 2. Very rich, &c.] His riches were increased, since he went into Egypt, by the bounty of Pharaoh (xii. 16), and (if we could believe Josephus, lib. i. Antiq. cap. 2,) by the rewards he had for teaching

Ver. 10. And he had sheep, &c.] By the gift of the king; besides those he had of his own before.

Ver. 17. And the Lord plagued Pharaoh, &c.] Some of the Hebrews think they had grievous aelves in the secret parts; which made both him and his servants incapable to enjoy either her, or any one else.

His house] His courtiers partake of the punishment, because they were partners in the intended sin.

Ver. 18. Why didst thou not tell me, &c.] Some think he speaks thus subtly to Abram, to see what he would say; not knowing yet that she was his wife, Or, that his priests and wise men had consulted about the cause of their plagues. But the simplest account is, that Sarai, being interrogated about it, confessed the whole truth. Whereupon he expostulated thus with Abram; who being silent, he took it for granted, that indeed she was his wife.

Ver. 19. He disclaimeth all intention of abusing another man's wife (so virtuous they were in those days), but would have made her his (as he saith in the foregoing words, "I might have taken her to me wife"); that is, a secondary wife, as the manner was in those days; for it is not likely he had no wife at all before.

Ver. 20. Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him, &c.] God's strict orders none should hurt him, or any thing belonging to him, but conduct him safely, whither he had a mind to go. And accordingly, the next words tell us they did.
even to Beth-el, unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Beth-el and Hai;
4 Unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the first: and there Abram called on the name of the Lord.
5 ¶ And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents.
6 And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together.
7 And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land.
8 And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren.

them several pieces of learning, which he brought out of Chaldea. The author of Schalsch. Hakka, quotes Eusebius's Prepar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 4, to prove this. And, indeed, I find Eusebius quoting Josephus in the fourteenth chapter of his book; who says he taught arithmetic and astrology, of which the Egyptians were ignorant before: and in the seventeenth chapter, Eupolemus, who says that Abram was familiarly conversant with the Egyptian priests at Heliopolis (when he went thither by reason of the famine in Canaan), and taught them many things; particularly the celestial sciences, which he calls astronomical, different from the stars.

Ver. 3. To Beth-el, &c.] Which was the second place wherein he dwelt, after his first entrance into Canaan (xii. 8).

Ver. 4. Unto the place of the altar, &c.] This seems to intimate that the altar itself was either fallen or thrown down. Some think demolished by Abram himself, when he left the place; others by the Canaanites when he was gone.

Abram called on the name of the Lord.] Commended himself, and all he had, to God's protection; who had promised to bestow this country upon him. Perhaps he built the altar again, and offered sacrifice thereon.

Ver. 5. ¶ God had blessed him likewise, as a faithful companion of Abram in his travels; and partaker also of his faith.

Ver. 6. ¶ There was not sufficient pasturage for them both, in that part of the country.

Ver. 7. ¶ And there was a strife, &c.] Wealth commonly breeds contentions. Yet here was no difference between the masters, but between their servants; each endeavouring to get the best pastures, and the best watering places for their flocks.

And the Canaanite and the Perizzite, &c.] This part of the country was inhabited by the people peculiarly called Canaanites, and by the Perizzites (a very rugged and barbarous nation, see xv. 20), among whom contention would have been dangerous, at least scandalous.

Ver. 8. Abram said unto Lot.} The best, the wisest, and men of the greatest experience in the world, are most inclined to peace, and most yielding in order to it.

Let there be no strife, &c.] There had been none yet; but their servants' quarrel might have proved theirs at last.

And between my herdmen, &c.] And here signifies er; as xix. 13, Exod. xii. 5.

Ver. 1—9

9 Is not the whole land before thee? separate thou, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left.

10 And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar.

11 Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves the one from the other.

12 Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.

13 But the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly.

14 ¶ And the Lord said unto Abram, after

For we be brethren.] Near kinsmen, whom the Hebrews call brethren.

Ver. 9. Is not the whole land before thee?] There is room enough, though not here, yet in other parts of the country: nor can they remain together, take thy choice which way thou wilt go, &c. A wonderful confederacy in Abram, to let the younger, and least in estate, please himself. And he did not desire Lot to leave the country, but only to settle himself in what part of it he liked best; that he might be near to help him, as he did afterwards.

Ver. 10. Beheld all the plain of Jordan, &c.] A fruitful and fruitful land, watered by the streams of Jordan; which in many windings and turnings run through it, and at some times overflowed it; which made the ground very rich. And therefore Moses compares this land to the garden of Eden, (as most understand those words, "the garden of the Lord") which was well watered by a river running through it; and to the land of Egypt, which is fattened by the overflowing of the Nile, as this was by the overflowing of Jordan.

As thou comest unto Zoar.] These words are not to be referred to "the land of Egypt," immediately foregoing (from which Zoar was at a great distance), but to those words in the beginning, "a plain well watered everywhere," even to the utmost skirts of it, which was Zoar.

Ver. 11. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan.] He was invited by the richness of the soil, without regard to the manners of the people; which proved afterwards a great affliction to him.

And Lot journeyed east.] For the "plain of Jordan" lay east, from Bethel, where they now were.

Ver. 12. And Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, &c.] In that part of the country where the people peculiarly called Canaanites (ver. 7, and xii. 6) were seated; otherwise, if "the land of Canaan" be taken largely, the "plain of Jordan" was also a part of it.

Ver. 13. The men of Sodom were wicked, &c.] Their sins were great, hence for Solomon's Edict, having been brought (as it were) "before the Lord," and sentenced at his tribunal to the judgment which shortly after befell them.

Ver. 14. And the Lord said unto Abram, &c.] It is likely the Lord appeared again to him (as he had done formerly, xii. 7), after Lot was separated from him; both to comfort him in his absence, by renewing his promise in larger words, and to assure that Lot was separated from him. Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward:

15 For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever.

16 And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the him that his posterity, not Lot's, should inherit this country.

Lift up now thine eyes, &c.] He dwelt now, it is likely, upon the mountain, which was on the east of Beth-el (where he pitched his tent before he went into Egypt, xii. 8), and returned to it when he came from thence (ver. 3, 4, of this chapter), which gave him the advantage of a fair and long prospect of the country every way.

Ver. 15. For all the land which thou seest, &c.] That whole country, some parts of which he saw a great way, in every quarter of it, and all the rest contiguous to them, were hereby assured to him.

For ever.] It doth not signify strictly time without end; but a very long period. The Jews, indeed, say that this word signifies, when it is written full, as they speak, that is, with ςυ, denotes eternity; though, without ςυ, they confess it signifies only a long time: but this small observation is quite overthrown by many examples to the contrary. For (Exod. xv. 18) where the Lord is said to reign for ever, this word οἰκίζεσθαι is without a ςυ, and yet denotes eternity. And (Deut. xv. 17) where it is said, "he shall be thy servant for ever," it is written with a ςυ, and yet denotes only a term of fifty years at the most.

Ver. 16. I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, &c.] More than could be contained in that land.

Ver. 17.] He would have him, for his satisfaction, go and view it all more nearly in every part of it. Or, he gives him leave (if he desired to understand more fully both the quality and quantity of the inheritance he bestowed on him) to go and survey it: promising he would protect and preserve him in his perambulation. Nay, some look upon this as giving him a warrant to take possession of the country, though he should not yet enjoy it.

Ver. 15. Then Abram removed his tent.] To a place about twenty-four miles from Beth-el, where he was before.

And dwelt in the plain] Here the word we had before (xii. 6), is in the plural number; and is taken by many for oaks, i.e. for an oaken grove: so the Arabic interpreter. The LXX. translate it εὐπλοῦς, "by the oaks," in the singular number; for dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered.

17 Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee.

18 Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord.

there seems to have been one oak more eminent than the rest: under which Abram pitched his tent, and built an altar unto the Lord.

This is confirmed by xviii. 1, compared with ver. 8. And indeed the ancients very much reverenced an oak, and therefore planted this tree very frequently. Jacob buried the idolatrous trumpery of his father's household there (xxxv. 4), which was by Shechem, where the place of public worship seems to have been fixed in Joshua's time (Josh. xxiv. 1, 26). The angel of the Lord also appeared to Gideon under an oak (Judg. vi. 11, 19, 25, ix. 6). And of all other trees, an oak was held most sacred by the heathen; particularly by the Druids. (See Pliny, lib. xvi. cap. 44. Max. Tyrannus, Dissert. 44.) And Pan-sanias, in his account of Arcadia, says, the ancients made the images of their gods of oak, being the most durable wood.

This oak, some fancy, was in being in the time of Constantine, and there was great resort to it. (See Sozomen, lib. ii. cap. 4.) Here Abram dwelt a long time, and many great things passed here, before he removed to any other place.

Mamre.] Was the name of a man among the Amorites, as appears from the next chapter, ver. 13.

Which is in Hebron.] Or, rather, by or near Hebron (for so the particle beheth is often used), which was a very ancient city, built seven years before Zoar; i.e. the famous city of Tanis in Egypt (Numb. xiii. 22). It was called Arba, or Kirjath-Arba at the first (xxxii. 2), but in Moses's time, Hebron. There are those, indeed, who say it was not called Hebron till the time of Joshua, who gave it to Caleb for his portion (Josh. xv. 13, 15): and thence conclude this passage was not wrote by Moses, but put in by some other hand, after his time. But I see not the least proof of this assertion, that Caleb was the first who gave it this name. His grandson, mentioned 1 Chron. ii. 42, 43, may rather be thought to have taken his name from this place, than to have given a name to it. Besides, there have been two occasions of giving one and the same name; as appears by what is said of Beersheba (xxvi. 31, xxvi. 33). And therefore this city might have the name of Hebron in Moses's time; and it might be confirmed in Joshua's.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 The battle of four kings against five. 11 Lot is taken prisoner. 12 Abram rescue him. 18 Melchizedek blesseth Abram. 30 Abram giveth him title. 22 The rest of the spoil, his partners having had their portions, he restor'd to the king of Sodom.

1 And it came to pass in the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, the children of Shem, and gotten possession of a country belonging to them; which they now endeavored to recover (as they had attempted before, ver. 4). For Elam of which Chedorlaomer was king, descended from Shem, (Gen. x. 22.)

Amraphel king of Shinar.] i.e. King of Babylon, as it is commonly understood. But it cannot well of nations:

Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and Tidal king of nations;

2 That these made war with Bera king of Sodom, and with Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar.

3 All these were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the salt sea.

4 Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled.

5 And in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the kings that were with him, and smote the Rephaims in Ashteroth Karnaim, and the Zuzims in Ham, and the Emims in Shaveh Kiriathaim.

6 And the Horites in their mount Seir, unto El-paran, which is by the wilderness.

7 And they returned, and came to En-mishpat, which is Kadesh, and smote all the country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazoezon-tamar.

8 And there went out the king of Sodom, and the king of Gomorrah, and the king of Admah, and the king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela:

he thought that so potent a king as he is supposed to have been in those days, should need any associates in a war against such petty princes as those mentioned ver. 2. Or, that the king of Elam (whose quarrel this was, as appears from ver. 4) should not be able of himself to grapple with them; or, that the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c. durst have adventured, with a handful of people, in comparison, to resist a great prince, under whose subjection they were, therefore, we must either take Amraphel to have been some small prince in the country of Shinar, i. e. Assyria; or, if he were king of Babylon, that monarchy was not very great in the days of Abram. And we must also look upon the rest as names of some particular places (like Sodom and Gomorrah) over which Arioch and Chedorlaomer that reigned; who were such kings as those in Canaan, when Joshua conquered it; or else, commanders of colonies, which they had led out of Assyria and Persia, and settling thereabouts, endeavoured to enlarge their plantations; as the manner was in those and in succeeding times; when the captains of a transport made of them a small body of men, were called princes or kings.

Arioch king of Ellasar.] There was a city (mentioned by Stephanus, de Urbibus) called Ellas, in Celo-Syria, on the borders of Arabia; where Arioch perhaps commanded.

Chedorlaomer king of Elam,) Concerning this country see x. 22, where Chedorlaomer was either governor of these little principities, or a commander of some troop of that nation.

Tidal king of nations.] Some take gojim in this place, which we translate nations, for a country or city. But it is more agreeable to the common use of the word in Scripture, to take it to signify a people, who either wanted a fixed habitation, or were gathered out of sundry regions.

Thus, part of Galilee being inhabited by a mixed people of divers countries, was thence called "Galilee of the nations," or gentiles, (Matt. iv. 15.) There were also, as Sir W. Raleigh observes, several petty countries which adjoined to Phenicia (viz. Palmyra, Batanea, Apamea, Laodicea, &c. which lay towards Mesopotamia, and India, both east and west) over which we may suppose Tidal reigned. Eupolocmus, an ancient Greek writer, relating this story, calls them Armenians, who made this inroad upon the Phenicians, as Eusebius tells us out of Alexander Polyhistor, lib. ix. Prepar. Evangel. cap. 17.

Ver. 2.] They were lords of the country called Pentapolis, or five cities; which were so small, that there was no need to bring a great king from beyond Tigris, with such a mighty monarch as he of Babylon is thought now to have been, and several other nations between these kings and Euphrates, to subdue their petty province. It had been madness also for these kings to resist such powerful armies as the eastern kings are commonly supposed to have brought against them. And therefore I think it reasonable, by the kings in the first verse to understand some such petty princes as those mentioned in the second. Ver. 3.] The five cities stood in this godly valley, which now is the Salt Sea or Lake; since the overthrow of these cities by fire and brimstone from heaven. Some will not have Siddim a proper name, but translate it ploughed lands; in which this valley was very rich.

Ver. 4.] This shows he was the principal in this war: and if he had been king of all that country called Elam, we cannot think he would have passed through so great a part of the world as Assyria, Mesopotamia, and part of Arabia, to conquer five towns; all whose riches could not counterbalance the charge, though he had sent only one of his lieutenants, with a small force, to bring them under.

Ver. 5. Smote the Rephaims] In their way to Sodom they subdued these warrior-like people, who, it is likely, opposed their passage into Pentapolis. And these Rephaims, it appears by xv. 20, were a part of Canaan's posterity, situate (as one may gather from Josh. xii. 4, xiii. 12) on the side Jordan, in Bashan, or Gilead. They were of a gigantic stature; and therefore the LXX. here and in other places, instead of Rehphaim, have giants.

Ashtaroth Karnaim.] It is plain from the foregoing place, and from Deut. i. 4, that Ashtaroth was a place in Bashan. Whether so called because the goddess Astarie, i. e. Diana or Juno, was here worshipped, nobody can resolve. The fact that it is called Karnaim, which in Hebrew signifies two-towered, denotes the new moon. But this word may as well denote that Ashtaroth was a city in the form of a half-moon.

And the Zuzims] Another warrior-like people thereabouts; who, some think, are the same with the Zamzummims (Gen. xxi. 32). The Emims] It appears from Deut. ii. 9, 10, &c., that these were also a gigantic people, and near neighbours to the Horites, mentioned in the next verse. For the Emims possessed Ar and the field of Kirjathjearim; and the Horites possessed Mount Seir; till the former were driven out by the Moabites, and the latter by the children of Esau; and then the country of the Emims was called Moab, and the country of the Horites was called Edom.

Ver. 7. And they returned.] From the conquest of the foregoing people.

And came to En-mishpat.] Fell upon this country, which was called afterward by this name, because God here judged the Israelites for their murmuring and contention with Moses. From whence also it was called Kadesh, because here the Lord was sanctified among them (Numb. xx. 13).

All the country of the Amalekites.] The country which was afterwards possessed by the Amalekites, who were not yet in being; for they were the descendants of Esau, and Moses shows (Gen. xxxvi. 16). Hazoezon-tamar, which is the same with Engaddi, near the Dead Sea (2 Chron. xx. 9).
9 With Chedorlaomer the king of Elam, and with Tidal king of nations, and Amraphel king of Shinar, and Arioch king of Ellasar; four kings with five.

10 And the vale of Siddim was full of slime-pits; and the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fled, and fell there; and they that remained fled to the mountain.

11 And they took all the goods of Sodom, and of Gomorrah, and all their victuals, and went their way.

And the kings—fled. Were routed, as we now speak. Of the word slime, see xi. 3. And fell there. I. e. A great slaughter was made of their armies; for they themselves escaped it apparently as part of the story. Some will have it, that many of them fell into those slime-pits, in which they hoped to have seen their enemies plunged. But the simplest sense is, many of them were slain, and the rest, as it follows, escaped to the mountain; but made such ill use of their preservation from being killed with their fellows, that they only lived to suffer a greater vengeance.

Ver. 11. And they took all the goods, &c.] This is a further proof that Chedorlaomer, and the rest of his confederates in this war, were but petty princes (like the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c.), for having broken the armies of the five kings, they rested contented, and marched away with the prisoners andbooty, but took not one of their cities: which, if they had been such great kings as is imagined, they would have certainly sacked, and perhaps burnt, if they had not thought fit to keep them. But we read (ver. 17) the king of Sodom still reigned after this victory, and went out of his city to meet Abram.

Ver. 12. And they took Lot, &c.] Who is here called "the king's brother," and ver. 14 and 16, "Abram's brother." This was the foundation of Abram's quarrel with the four kings: whose war was just against the king of Sodom and his confederates: but they unjustly seized upon Lot and his goods, who was but a sojourner in that country, and had no hand in their revolt.

Who dwelt in Sodom.] In the country of Sodom, where he hired some ground for his cattle; but it is not likely he yet dwelt in the city (for then he had not been taken captive), but afterwards for more security betook himself thither.

Ver. 13. Told Abram the Hebrew.] So called from his ancestor Heber, as was before observed. To which may be added, that if he had been called by this name, there is no reason why he should be called by the name of Eliab, or Eliezer (which the LXX. took to be the reason, when they translated it ἐξαράξας, it would not have descended to all his posterity, who did not come from beyond the river. So little a thing as that would not have given a name to a whole and eminent nation; who are usually denominanted from some eminent person among them.

And these were confederate with Abram.] The three forenamed families were near neighbours to Abram; who, it is likely, farmed (as we now speak) some ground of them; and so entered into a league of mutual defence, having the same interest. I should think also, that having the priest of the Most High God not far from them (ver. 18), they were good, 12 And they took Lot, Abram's brother's son, whodwelt in Sodom, and his goods, and departed.

13 And there came one that had escaped, and told Abram the Hebrew; for he dwelt in the plain of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol, and brother of Aner: and these were confederate with Abram.

14 And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan.

15 And he divided himself against them, he and his servants, by night, and smote them, and pious people (rather than conclude, as I find some do, that they were utter strangers to the true religion), which made Abram more forward to embrace, if not to court their friendship. For the sins of the Amorites being not yet full (xv. 16), there might be some remainders of true piety among them: and it is no argument that because these three families were of that nation, they were wicked idolaters.

Ver. 14. Arouse his trained servants.] Drew forth a select number of his servants, whom he had instructed to handle arms, in case of any assault by robbers, or injurious neighbours. We read before, (xii. 5) of the servants they brought with them from Haran; and now they were more increased, as their cattle were (xii. 16, xiii. 2, 6) so that he might well make a little army out of them.

And pursued them unto Dan.] As far as that place, where one of the heads or springs of Jordan breaks forth called Dan, as Josephus relates, where he speaks of this very history (ib. i. Antiq. cap. 10). This plain and short account of this word Dan, overthrows the argument which cavillers draw from hence to prove that Moses did not write the book.

Ver. 15. And he divided himself against them, he and his servants, by night.] The Vulgar Latin here reads, "His companions being divided, he fell upon them by night;" minding rather the sense than the words. For here is no mention of any but Abram and his servants: though it appears by the last verse of the following chapter, that his confederates before mentioned (ver. 13), Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre, joined with him in this expedition. Which they managed with great judgment (for stratagems in war were never wanting from the beginning), Abram and his servants making one troop or battalion (as they now speak), and the confederates making three more. Who, dividing themselves, fell upon the four kings, in the four quarters of their camp, that they might the more distract them, and make them apprehend their forces to be more numerous than indeed they were. They were put also into the greater confusion, because this assault was made in the night: when, perhaps, they were buried both in wine and in sleep.

Unto Hobah.] Which lay in the vale between Libanus and Jordan, over against the city of Amos (i. 5), the valley of Aven, and Beth-Eden, or the seat of pleasure. In this vale was Damascus seated.

Ver. 16. He brought back all the goods, &c.] All the prey, whether in money, cattle, or other things, which the four kings had carried away.

The women also, and the people.] It seems they had carried away also the people of Pentapolis, who did not flee to the mountains or fenced cities; and women, in those days, were a special part of their booty.

Ver. 17. Went out to meet him.] To congratulate his victory; and to desire his people might be restored to him.

The valley of Shaveh.] This seems to have been pursued them unto Hobah, which is on the left hand of Damascus. 16 And he brought back all the goods, and also brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women also, and the people. 17 ¶ And the king of Sodom went out to meet him after his return from the slaughter of a pleasant place, wherein the king (that is Melchizedek, I guess by what follows) took delight: whence it was called the King’s Dale: in which the King of Sodom met Abram; and Melchizedek entertained him with bread and wine. Ver. 18. And Melchizedek] The Jews generally say this was Shem, the son of Noah. But we have reason to look upon this opinion as proceeding from their pride and vanity: which could not endure to think the father of their nation had any superior in another nation, especially among the Canaanites. And therefore they will have Abram to have been blessed by his great ancestor, Shem; to whom also he paid tithes: which is a fancy so plainly confuted by the apostle to the Hebrews, that it is strange any Christian should follow it. For he saith expressly, that Shem paidAbram tithes. But we shall not say that Levi (vii. 6), “his descent, or pedigree, was not counted from them;” which is not true of Shem. Nor could Shem he said to be without father or mother; whose genealogy is evident from Adam. Nor was Shem’s priesthood, if he had any, of a different order from Levi’s; who was in his loins, as well as in the loins of Abram. And therefore it could not be said that Levi paid him tithes in the loins of Abram, but it would be as true that he received tithes in the loins of Shem: for, according to this interpretation, he was in the loins both of him that received tithes, and of him that paid them; and so the whole argumentation of the apostle falls to the ground. But setting aside these and other Christian reasons (which are strongly urged by Bochartus, lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 1), there is no cause, that we can discern, why Moses should call Shem (whom he so often mentions) by any other name than his own; nor is it likely that Shem reigned in the land of Canaan; which now was in the possession of his brother’s son; nor could Abram be said to possess that land, whilst his noble ancestor, Shem, had been a king there. Nor is this an ancient opinion among the Jews, at least not constantly believed: for Josephus says expressly, that Melchizedek was Χαρακτικος δυνατος, “a potentate of the Canaanites” (lib. vii. de Bello Jud. cap. 18). And yet it was so common, that it went to the Samaritans, as Epiphanius tells us, Hæres, iv. n. 6 (though not to the Arabians, who say he was the son of Peleg. See Hotting. Suenega Orient. 356, 369, 306), and many Christians have embraced it, merely (as far as I can discern) because they would not acknowledge any good man to have been then among the Canaanites. Some heretics held him to be μητρος των δυναμων, as Epiphanius tells us in the place forementioned. (N. Heb. 1.) Which was the opinion of Hierocles, a great scholar and famous physician in Egypt (Hæres. lviii. n. 3). And some of the church took him to have been the Son of God himself, who then appeared to Abram, ετελθας απο καιρον, “in the form of a man.” (Hæres. lv. n. 7.) But the plain truth is, he was a king and priest (for those two offices anciently were in that country inseparable) in that estate he was, and not as yet wholly degenerated, and fallen from the true religion.

King of Salem] It is a great error to think that this Salem was the same place as Jerusalem. For it is plain, as Bochart observes (lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 4), that Salem was in the way which led from the valley of Damascus unto Sodom; which we learn from this place of Scripture. And so St. Jerome says, that he learned from the Jews in his time, that it was seated on this side of Jordan: and it retained its name in our Saviour’s days, as appears by the story of John’s baptizing near Salem (John iii. 23). Several of the fathers are of the same mind, quoted by Mr. Selden in his Review of the History of Titbes, p. 452.

Brought forth bread and wine] This he did as a king, not as a priest; for it was not an act of religion, but of hospitality. Thus heathens themselves understood this history, as we find by Eupolemus (quoted by Eusebius, lib. ix. cap. 17), who saith he received Abram as they were wont to do strangers, in a city called Argarizin, which he interprets the Mount of Most High (Isa. 28. 25; Jer. 31. 33). And that language, it is certain, signifies, or whether it be misprinted for Harodon; but I think the plain sense is, that he treated Abram and his followers, by causing provisions to be brought forth for their refreshment after the fight. For bread and wine comprehend all sorts of provision for their repast: as to eat bread with another, in this book, is to serve them with meat, as where we read, Matt. 26. 29. And that language, it is certain, understood it; who saith expressly, he brought them forth to Abram, and offered them to him, and not to God (lib. adv. Judaeos, cap. 2). And Epiphanius observes, that the word in the Greek is not σπειραεσιν; but ειθατο; not he offered, but brought out. So it seems his copy had it.

Ver. 19. And he blessed him.] This he did as a priest (which office is just before mentioned), as he did the other as a king.

Blessed be Abram] He prayed God to confirm the blessing which he had pronounced upon him.

Possessor of heaven and earth.] Rather Creator, as the LXX. and Vulgar Latin translate it. (See Spencer, Hæres. iv. n. 18.) And that language, it is certain, understood it; who saith expressly, he brought them forth to Abram, and offered them to him, and not to God (lib. adv. Judaeos, cap. 2). And this and the next verse, wherein he gives glory to the most high God for Abram’s victory, it is apparent that he was a worshipper of the one only true God, and maker and governor of all things. To whom he also ministered in the office of a priest, who blessed men in his name.

Ver. 20. And he gave him] i. e. Abram gave to Melchizedek, as the apostle explains it (Heb. vii. 2). But the words are so doubtful as they lie here, that Eupolemus (in the place above mentioned) thought Melchizedek had bestowed gifts upon Abram.

Titbes of all.] He doth not say of what all; but that which he does not say, were to us to think he means tithes of all the spoil, which he had taken from Chedorlaomer, &c. For he had nothing else there to tithe, unless it were the remainder of the provision he had carried along with him in this expedition; all the rest of his own estate being many miles off, at Mambre. And thus Josephus interprets it, δοκεων εις την ναον. “As if he would have given it as an offering.” And thus the apostle himself seems to explain it (Heb. vii. 4). For having said (ver. 2) he gave him the “tent part of all;” when he comes to argue from this, he calls it “the tenth part of the spoils” (verse 4). And, indeed, it was a very ancient cus-
Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth:

20 And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all.

21 And the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself.

22 And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth,

23 That I will not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich:

24 Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eschol, and Mamre; let them take their portion.

while ago, to bless him, and had now renewed his promise by Melchizedek. And he would not have it thought that love of spoil had carried him to the war; but only love of justice. In short, here is a most noble example (as Maimonides observes, par. iii. More Nevuch. cap. 50) of contentedness with what he had, of despising riches, and seeking praise rather from virtue.

And the portion of the men which went with me,] He could not bind his confederates by his own act, but left them to deal with their countrymen as they pleased: in either keeping their share of the spoil, or parting with it, as he had done. The Jews truly observe, that they who stayed with the stuff and carriages, had their portion equal with those that fought: as we read in the story of David (1 Sam. xxx. 25). But it is not certain that this custom was as old as Abram's time; which they would gather from this place. For here they take the young men for those who fought and pursued the enemy; and Aner, Eschol, and Mamre, stayed to guard the carriage. But I see no ground for this, it being most probable, as I observed before, that they attacked the enemy as well as Abram's servants; and thereby acquired a title to part of the spoil. But whether we consider this way, or the other, Abram could not give away their right, when he generously parted with his own.

CHAPTER XV.

1 God encourageth Abram. 2 Abram complaineth for want of an heir. 4 God promiseth him a son, and a multiplying of his seed. 6 Abram is justified by faith. 7 Canaan is promised again, and confirmed by a sign, 12 and a vision.

1 After these things the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward.

2 And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus?

But these words may be understood of his having these things represented to him by the Divine Majesty, when he was perfectly awake, and used all his senses.

Fear not, } Abram.] He heard these words, while he was in the ecstasy (according to Maimonides's explanation), encouraging his hope in God, that he and Lot should be safe from any new invasion by these or any other enemies. For, perhaps, there were some rumours abroad of the Assyrians recruiting their forces, with an intention to renew the war. I am thy shield, I will protect and defend thee.

And thy exceeding great reward.] Will give thee far more than thou hast lately denied to take for my sake.

Ver. 2. What wilt thou give me, &c.] What good
CHAPTER XV.

3 And Abram said, Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir.

4 And, behold, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, This shall not be thine heir; but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir.

5 And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be.

will all the riches in the world do me, if I have not a child to inherit my estate?

To go childless.] Is to die (to go out of the world, as Luke xii. 22, "...the Son of man goeth," i.e. must die shortly. He doth not slight God's promise made in the foregoing verse; but only desires him to be so gracious as to give him a child for his reward.

And the steward of my house, &c.] He that takes care of all I have (and therefore deserves best of me), is not only - a kind of steward, but a substitute for me.

Eliezer of Damascus.] Some think this signifies no more, but that he was born of a Syrian woman.

Ver. 3. And Abram said, &c.] He repeats the same again, out of a great concern to have God's promise fulfilled: which he did not disbelieve, but earnestly longed for, more than for all the riches in the world.

One born in my house is mine heir.] It is likely, that Eliezer was one of their souls (i.e. servants) gotten in Haran (xii. 5), and had been such a wise and faithful manager of all things committed to his care, that Abram intended, before the promise made to him, to have left him his heir: thinking he should have no child of his own, Sarah being barren, as we read, xi. 30.

Ver. 4.] A new assurance is given him, from the Shechinnah, or Divine Majesty, that he should have an heir begetten by himself.

Ver. 5. And he brought him forth abroad, &c.] Maimonides thinks (More Nev. par. ii. cap. 46) that all this which follows doth not belong in a vision: but others will have, that he was really conducted out of his tent into the open air, and looked upon the stars.

The former opinion is more probable, because the sun was not yet gone down (ver. 12), and therefore the stars were not to be seen with the eye, but were represented only in a vision.

So shall thy seed be.] Nehem. ix. 23. He not only promises him an heir; but that this heir should have a numerous posterity. Which, as before (xiii. 16), he compared to the dust of the earth, so here he compares to the stars of heaven. Showing (say some of the Jews) by the former their humiliation; and by this their exaltation and advancement: and indeed, in this chapter, he speaks of both.

Ver. 6. He brought him forth abroad.] Was fully persuaded that God both could and would perform his promise, though it seemed to be very difficult, if not impossible, according to the ordinary course of nature: he and Sarah both being very old.

And he counted it to him for righteousness.] The Lord esteemed it a most noble act, and high expression of a pious econtention in him; that act of Phinehas was, in aftertimes, Ps. civ. 31, and thereupon graciously owned him for a righteous person; though he was not free from all sin whatsoever; but was guilty of some that were not consistent with perfect righteousness.

It is here to be considered, that Abram believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness.

6 And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness.

7 And he said unto him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.

8 And he said, Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?

9 And he said unto him, Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon.

10 And he took unto him all these, and did this promise before (xii. 1, 2, 3, 1), but now his faith was the more remarkable; because, notwithstanding some time had passed since the first making of the promise, and the then wavering faith, that God would perform his promise of a son, but when he had given him an assurance of it, and saw him perform it, he continued strongly in his faith, and trusted in God, without a doubt of it, so far as to bring all these sacrifices before him.

Ver. 7. I am the Lord that brought thee, &c.] He reminds him of what he had already done for him; that he might confirm him in the belief of what he promised farther to do.

Ver. 8. Whereby shall I know, &c.] This is not spoken doubtingly; for the strength of his faith is highly commended, but he desires to have it more and more strengthened and confirmed: as some good men did in aftertimes, when they were put through very difficult services. So Gideon, Judg. vi. 37, &c.

Ver. 9. Take we an heifer, &c.] i.e. Offer unto me (so it should be rendered, as Mr. Mede observes, book ii. p. 472) the following creatures: which are of four sorts. From whence the Hebrew doctors would persuade us, the rise and the fall of the four monarchies are signified in these words; but it is a better observation, that God hereby fore-signified that their sins should be expiated by sacrifices. For these were the creatures, and these alone, which were appointed to be offered in sacrifice to God, by the law of Moses. And it justifies their opinion, who think there in clean and clean beasts, with respect to sacrifice, before the law, though not with the law.

Yet here is something singular, that God required Abram to offer an heifer of three years old, with a goat and a ram of the same age; whereas afterwards, under the law, they were commonly of one year old. I know not the reason of this difference; but certain it is, that a ram of three years old is in its full strength, and the vigour of its age, as Bechari observes. Whence it is that Lucian introduces Ganymede professing to offer unto Jupiter (if he would dismiss him), τοις τριών τινι γιγαντίαις, &c., a ram of three years old, a big one, the leader of the flock, Hieroc. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 46.

A young pigeon.] The Hebrew word gozal, signifies the young ones of ring-doves, wood-pigeons, or any other of that kind, as he also observes.

Ver. 10. And he took unto him.] Now we must suppose he was come out of his ecstasy; and really performed all that follows, until he fell into it more profoundly than before.

Divided them in the midst.] There is no footstep of this rite anywhere in the Scripture, save only in the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxxiv. 18, 19). But this place shows it to have been very ancient: and St. Cyril, in his tenth book against Julian, derives this custom from the ancient Chaldeans. As others derive the very word birth, [πόθεν] which signifies a covenant, from the word used both here and in Jeremy, vied them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another: but the birds divided he not.

11 And when the fowls came down upon the carcasses, Abram drove them away.

 ministers, which is the very same by a transposition of letters, and signifies to divide, or cut asunder. Because covenants were made by dividing a beast, and by the parties covenanting passing between the parts of the beast so divided: signifying that so should they be cut asunder who broke the covenant. Thus Mr. Mede, in the place forementioned, truly explains this rite, which was as much as if they had said, "Thus let me be divided and cut in pieces, if I violate the oath I have now made in the presence of my God." We find in Zenoebus, that the people called Molotii retained something of this custom; for they confirmed their oaths when they made their covenants, κατακόπτεται εἰς τὰ μικρὰ τοὺς διότις, "by cutting oxen into little bits."

Laid each piece one against another:] So that there was a space left between them; through which the parties covenanting might pass. This seems to be meant by Homer, when he says (Ilid. a. v. 461), that after the priest had prayed to Apollo, the sacrifice was slain and layed, and then they cut it up.

"making duplicates, which were exactly answerable one to the other."

But the birds divided he not.] Thus it was prescribed afterwards (Levit. i. 17), because they were but an appendage to the sacrifice, and their blood was not sprinkled upon the altar. It is likely, notwithstanding, that the birds were laid one against the other, as the pieces of the beasts were. And there being a prophecy of the state of Abram's family in future times (ver. 13, 14), some fancy that the division of these beasts represented the dispersion of his posterity into divers countries.

Ver. 11. And when the fowls came down, &c.] The birds of prey. For the Hebrew word שׁד חמי signifies avis rapax et carnivora, "ravenous birds, that feed on flesh." Whence Bochart thinks an eagle is called in Greek Bucceus, because that bird is a ravenous prey (Hierozoic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 12). And by these fowls some think the Egyptians are represented, who fell upon the Israelites, as rapacious birds do upon dead carcasses, and endeavoured to hinder their offering sacrifices unto God.

Abram drove them away.] He sat by the pieces of flesh (as the LXX. translate it) to watch, lest vultures, or such-like creatures, should snatch them away. For he looking upon them as things hallowed, watched to see what God intended in them.

Ver. 12. A deep sleep, &c.] Some would have it, that he being tired with the great labour of fetching the sacrifices, cutting them up and watching them, naturally fell into a sleep. But Maimouides, more reasonably, looks upon this as the continuation of what was begun before in a vision: which at last was converted into a profound sleep, wherein things were represented to him in a dream. And therefore their wise men say, this was a prophetic sleep.

More Nevocch. par. ii. cap. 45.

And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him.

13 And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land

Daniel in some of his visions, while he was awake (Dan. x. 8), as the same Maimonides observes in the 41st chapter of that book.

This horror of great darkness, many think, signified the dismal condition of Abram's posterity in Egypt: which God now represented to him. And this horror coming upon him, at the going down of the sun, was, they think, a further signification of it. For we say a man's sun is set when he falls into great calamities. And it signified, some imagined, these calamities should come upon them a great while hence.

Ver. 13. And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, i.e. Sojourn partly in Canaan and partly in Egypt. There are those, indeed, who fancy Canaan cannot be said to be a land that was not theirs, God having bestowed it upon Abram. But God himself teaches us otherwise (Exod. vi. 4), where he calls it, "the land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were strangers;" because the name was, "that present possessed of it, though they had a good title to it.

And they shall afflict them four hundred years:] These four hundred years are not to be referred only to what immediately goes before [they shall afflict them], but to all the rest, their sojourning in a strange land, and their being in servitude. These three things were to come to pass within that space: so that it is as if he had said, "Thy seed shall not possess this land till four hundred years hence." During which time they shall be sojourners in this land and in Egypt; that is, some part of it, and also be no better than slaves, nay, endure sore affliction.

It must here be noted, that from the birth of Isaac, which was three years began, to their deliverance out of the Egyptian bondage, was just four hundred and five years: but the five odd years are not mentioned; it being the manner of all writers to take no notice of broken numbers (as they call them) when they name a round sum. Thus the Greek interpreters of the Bible are commonly called the LXX., though there were seventy-two of them. And the Roman writers call those Centumviri, who were in all a hundred and five. And Moses in another place (Num. xi. 21), saith, "the Israelites were six hundred thousand;" not reckoning the three thousand five hundred and fifty above that number, as appears from Numb. i. 46, and ii. 32.

If it seems a difficulty, that their sojourning is said in Exod. xii. 40, to have been four hundred and thirty years, it is removed by considering, that in those years is comprehended the time of Abram's sojourning also, as well as his seed. And it was just twenty-five years from his coming into Canaan to the birth of Isaac, which, added to four hundred and five years before mentioned, make up the number of four hundred and thirty years. And this is so exactly true, that if we divide the sum of four hundred and thirty into equal parts, it is computed by the best of the ancient as well as later writers, that the Hebrew nation sojourned just two hundred and fifteen years in that is not their's, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; 14 And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance. 15 And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. 16 But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full. 17 And it came to pass, that when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces. 18 In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates: 19 The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, Canaan (reckoning that short time Abram was in Egypt, chap. xii.), and as many after they went into Egypt. See Usser. Chronol. Sacra, cap. 10. Ver. 14. Will I judge? i. e. Punish them. Ver. 15. Go to thy fathers? i. e. Die, and depart to the other world. In peace.] And see none of the forenamed calamities. Ver. 16.] Abram now lived among the Amorites (xiv. 13). But under their name are comprehended all the other nations of Canaan. Who were very wicked; but God forbore them till their wickedness had overflowed the whole country, and that to the greatest height. Their most heinous idolatries were abominable idolatries, cruelty, beastly filthiness to a prodigious excess (Levit. xviii. 22, 23, &c.). See Theodoret upon Psalm cv. 14, and Fagius on Levit. v. 1. But in Abram’s time their iniquity was not full: i. e. there were several good men still remaining among them, as Manre, Eschol, and Aner seem to have been, who were confederate with Abram; and Melchizedek certainly was, who, being priest of the most high God, had some people sure worshipped together with him: and therefore God stayed till there was a universal corruption, and they were all ripe for destruction. For we read of none but Rahab, whose faith saved her and her family, when the time of their destruction came. Ver. 17. Behold a smoking furnace.] If the great horror (ver. 12) represented the extreme misery of the children of Israel in Egypt, then this seems to signify God’s vengeance upon the Egyptians, for oppressing them in the furnaces wherein they wrought (Exod. ii. 25). A burning lamp, or a lamp of fire] i. e. The Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, appeared in great splendour (so Maimonides rightly explains it, par. i. More Nevoch. cap. 21), like to a flaming fire. So it appeared to Moses, when God came to deliver them from the Egyptian bondage (Exod. iii. 2, 6, &c.). Passed between those pieces.] In token, as it follows (ver. 18), that he entered into a covenant with Abram and with his posterity: for passing between the pieces he consumed them (as St. Chrysostom rightly understands it), and thereby testified his acceptance of the sacrifices which Abram offered. I noted before that there is no such rite we read of anywhere in Scripture, but in Jeronmah, of making a covenant in this manner. But there are those who think they find this custom in other nations: for if Deyta Cre- tensis do not lie, after the manner of the Cretans (as Bechtor speaks), both the Greeks and Trojans, from the time of Homer, did make covenants in this fashion. Certain it is, the Bozotian and Macedonians passed, on some occasions, through the parts of a beast dissected; but it was for illustration, not for covenanting, as the same Bechtor observes (par. i. Hierozob. lib. ii. cap. 16). Ver. 18. Unto thy seed have I given this land, &c.] Here is the utmost extent of the donation made to Abram; which began to be fulfilled in David (2 Sam. Vol. I. 10).
CHAPTER XVI.

1 Now Sarai Abram's wife bare him no children: and she had an handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hagar.

2 And Sarai said unto Abram, Behold now, the Lord hath restrained me from bearing: I pray thee, go in unto my maid; it may be that I may obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai.

3 And Sarai Abram's wife took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife.

4 ¶ And he went in unto Hagar, and she conceived: and when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes.

5 And Sarai said unto Abram, My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid unto thy bosom; and when she saw that she had conceived I was despised in her eyes: the Lord judge between me and thee.

6 But Abram said unto Sarai, Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee. And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face.

7 ¶ And the angel of the Lord found her by a fountain of water in the wilderness, by the fountain in the way to Shur.

Hagar began to take upon her as if she had been mistress of the house; at least much more favoured by God, who had made her fruitful; which was accounted a great blessing and honour in those days, especially in a family that had no heir.

Ver. 5. My wrong be upon thee.] Thou art the cause of this injury (or these affronts) which I suffer by being too indulgent to my maid, and not repressing her insolence. Or, it is incumbent on thee to see me redressed of the wrong that is done me. See Lud. de Dian. The Lord judge between me and thee.] Sometimes this phrase signifies an appeal to God, as the avenger of wrongs; but here it seems only to denote her committing the equity of her cause to the judgment of God.

Ver. 6. Behold, thy maid is in thy hand.] Is subject unto thee. Do with her as it pleaseth thee.] Use her as thy maid, and not as my wife. When Sarai dealt hardly with her.] Beat her, perhaps, or imposed on her too much, or too servile, labour. She fled from her face.] Ran away, to avoid her cruel usage.

Ver. 7. And the angel of the Lord, &c.] This is the first time that we read of the appearance of an angel. By whom, Maimonides will scarce allow us to understand more than a messenger (More Nevoch, par. ii. cap. 42). But some Christians go so far into the other extreme, as to understand hereby, the Eternal ΛΟΥΣΙΩ, or Son of God. It seems to me more reasonable to think, that though the Sheechinah, or Divine Majesty, did not appear to her, as it had often done to Abram; yet one of the heavenly ministers, who were attendants upon it, and made a part of its glory, was sent to stop her proceedings. And a great favour it was, that the Lord would despatch such a messenger after her, who was sufficient to do the business.

In the way to Shur.] She was flying into Egypt, her own country (upon which the wilderness of Shur bordered), and only rested a while at this fountain to refresh herself.
CHAPTER XVII.

8 And he said, Hagar, Sarai’s maid, whence camest thou? and wither wilt thou go? And she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sarai.

9 And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands.

10 And the angel of the Lord said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude.

11 And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael; because the Lord hath heard thy affliction.

12 And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man’s hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren.

13 And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me: for she said, Have I also here looked after him that seeth me?

14 Wherefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi; behold, it is between Kadesh and Bered.

15 ¶ And Hagar bare Abram a son: and Abram called his son’s name, which Hagar bare, Ishmael.

16 And Abram was fourscore and six years old, when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abram.

Ver. 8.] He takes notice of her being Sarai’s maid, rather than Abram’s wife, to put her in mind of her duty, and that she could not honestly leave her mistress without her consent; for so it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 9. It is the same word here translated submit, with that (ver. 6) where it is rendered dealt hardly; signifying that she should be patient, and endure the hardness of which she complained (or suffered herself to be afflicted.)

Ver. 10. I will make thee partaker of the promise I have made to Abram (xv. 5). The angel delivers this message to her in the name of God, who sent him.

Ver. 11. Behold, thou art with child, &c. Do not doubt of what I say, for thou art with child of a son, who shall be the father of a great people. This promise was renewed by Abram in his next chapter (xviii. 20), and we find it performed (xxv. 12).

Shall call his name Ishmael. Some of the Jews take notice of the honour which was here done him, in calling him by his name before he was born; there being but six, they say, who were thus distinguished from others; the two first were the sons of Abram (Ishmael and Isaac), and the last was the Messias. His hand shall be against every man, &c. ™ He shall be very warlike; and both infest all his neighbours, and be infested by them.

He shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren. Be a nation by himself, not at all like his brethren, whether descended from Isaac, or from the rest of Abram’s sons by Keturah; who, though annoyed by him, shall not be able to dispossess him. This is such an exact description of the posterity of Ishmael throughout all generations, that none but a prophetical spirit could have made it, as Doctor Jackson truly observes (book i. on the Creed, chap. 29). Wildness being so incorporated into their nature, that no change of times hath made them grow tame.

Ver. 13. A wild man; ™ The Hebrew word phrase, here joined with man, signifies a wild ass; and so is well to be affliated by her.

This shall stand against every man, &c. ™ He shall be very warlike; and both infest all his neighbours, and be infested by them.

Ver. 14. Beer-lahai-roi. Some would have this refer both to Hagar and to God, in this manner: “The well of her that liveth, and of him that seeth (i.e. who preserves me in life).” So it was an acknowledgment that she owed her life and safety to God.

Ver. 15. Abram called his son’s name, &c. ™ Hagar having told him at her return the foregoing story, he gave his son this name, in obedience to the angel’s command (ver. 11).

Ver. 16. Fourscore and six years old. He was seventy-five years old, when he came into Canaan (xii. 4), and had been ten years there when he took Hagar to wife (ver. 3 of this chapter), and therefore was then eighty-five years old; and consequently eighty-six the next year, when Ishmael was born.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 God reneweth the covenant. 5 Abram his name is changed in token of a greater blessing. 10 Circumcision is instituted. 15 Sarai her name is changed, and she blessed. 17 Isaac is promised. 23 Abraham and Ishmael are circumcised.

1 And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. When Abram was ninety years old and nine, ™ Thirteen years after Ishmael’s birth. ™ The Lord appeared to Abram. ™ In a visible majesty, to satisfy him that the promise made (xv. 4, 5) should not be fulfilled in Ishmael.

I am the Almighty God; ™ Or, All-Sufficient. This is the first time we meet with this name; which was most fitly used here, when he speaks of a thing very
And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly.

And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying,

As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations.

Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations hast thou been made.

And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee.

And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee.

And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God.

And God said unto Abraham, Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee in their generations.

This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between me and you and thy seed after thee; Every man child among you shall be circumcised.

And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you.

was at present a stranger, and to put his seed in possession of it.

An everlasting possession: If they did not forfeit it by their disobedience to him.

Now follows Abraham's part of this covenant, which was mutual between God and him.

Which the next verse explains, by the sign or token of the covenant.

As the paschal lamb is called the passover of the Lord (Exod. xii. 11); that is, the memorial of the angel's passing them by, when he killed the Egyptian children (xiii. 9). But circumcision was such a sign, that they entered thereby into a covenant with God and be his children. For it was not a mere mark whereby they should be known to be Abraham's seed, and distinguished from other nations: but they were made by this the children of the covenant, and entitled to the blessings of it: though, if there had been no more in it but this, that they who were of the same faith, as Maimonides speaks, should have one certain character, whereby they should be known and joined one to another, without the mixture of any other people, it had been a very wise appointment. And this mark was very fitly chosen, because it was such a token as no man would have set upon himself and upon his children, unless it were for faith and religion's sake. For it is not a brand upon the arm, or an inunction in the thigh, but a thing very hard, and in which the greatest tender part, with nobody would have undertaken but on the forenamed account (par. iii. More Nev. cap. 49).

It may be proper here to add, that covenants were anciently made in those eastern countries, by dipping their weapons in blood (as Xenophon tells us), and by picking the flesh, and sucking each other's blood, as we read in Tacitus; who observes (lib. ii. Annal.), that when kings made a league, they took each other by the hand, and, their thumbs being hard tied together, they pricked them, when the blood was forced to the extreme parts, and each party licked it; which, he saith, was accounted Arcanum fedes, quasi mutuo cruore sacratum; "a mysterious covenant, being made sacred by their mutual blood." How old this custom had been, we do not know; but it is evident God's covenant with Abraham was solemnized on Abraham's part by his own and his son Isaac's blood, and so continued through all generations, by cutting off the foreskin of their flesh (as it follows in the next verse): whereby, as they were made the children of God, so God in conclusion sent his own Son, who, by this very ceremony of circumcision, was consecrated to be their God and their Redeemer.

Ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; I. e. The foreskin of your flesh; for that 12 And he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you, every man child in your generations, he that is born in the house, or member, which is the instrument of generation, is peculiarly called by the name of flesh, in many places (Lev. xv. 2; Ezek. xvi. 26). In which part of the body, rather than in any other part, Gentiles appear to have marked of his covenant to be made; that they might be denoted to be a holy seed, consecrated to him from the beginning. The pagans made marks in several parts of their bodies (some in one, some in another), whereby they were consecrated to their gods; but the character which God would have imprinted upon his people, was in one peculiar part and no other (from which they never varied), viz. in that part which served for the propagation of mankind. Of which some have given natural, others moral reasons; but the most plain and obvious is, that it might be an apt token of the Divine covenant made with Abraham and his posterity, that God would multiply their seed, and make them as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore. Which was chosen, rather than any other, to make them sensible that this was a Divine sacrament; for nothing but God's institution could at first engage men to lay that part bare, which nature hath covered.

It is of late, indeed, made a question by some learned men, whether this was the original of circumcision, that is, that it was derived from the Egyptians, and not the Egyptians from the Jews. Certain it is, that not only the Egyptians, but several other nations, did very anciently use circumcision. Now it is improbable, say they, that the Egyptians (who seem to have had it the most early of all nations who sprang not from Abraham) would borrow Abraham's time (which does not at all consist with any good authors, though such as Celsius were so bold as to affirm it, as we find in Orig. lib. v.), such arguments as these will not persuade us to believe, that it came from the Egyptians, or any other nation; but they had it, if not from the Hebrews, yet from the posterity of Ishmael, or other people descended from Abraham's son, who, the people of a few generations, after the most beloved of God, it is not credible that God would set the mark of Ham's race upon him and his posterity; much less make it the token of his covenant with them. (See J. Ludolphus, lib. iii. Comment. in Histor. Ethip. cap. i. n. 5.) The only authority upon whom the bowers of this novelty rely, is Herodotus, who speaks as follows:—the people of Coelhis, and the Egyptians, were the only nations that were circumcised, δόκειος ψωφικός, 'from the beginning;' the Syrians and Phoenicians who live in Palestine, acknowledging they had this rite from them. Which is just such a tale as he tells in the second chapter of that book, that the Egyptians were the first inhabitants of the earth, unless, perhaps, the Philistines. To which opinion proceeded from their own vain conceit, which made them loth to confess they received circumcision from any other people. Though I think there is a convincing argument of it in Moses himself, who tells us, in chapter x. 14, that the Philistim came from the Caschlichim, i.e. the people of Coelhis, as that people came originally from Egypt. (So Herodotus himself, Diadochus, and abundance of other credible authors, testify.) This, it appears by what I noted there, was before the time of Moses, nay, before Abraham; for the Philistim had a king among them in his days, as we read in this book (xx. and xxi.). Now these Philistim were an uncircumcised people, and therefore the people of Coelhis, no doubt, were so also, when they went out of their country, and drove the Avim out of Palestine. And, consequently, the Egyptians had no such rite among them, when the Caschlichim came from Egypt, but put a gross cheat upon Herodotus, when they made him believe they had been circumcised, σποδότη ιπποτοχός, 'from the beginning.' And in like manner they imposed upon him, who told him the inhabitants of Palestine (whom he calls Syrians and Phoenicians) confessed they received circumcision from the Egyptians: for there were no inhabitants of Palestine circumcised but the Jews, and surely as they never varied, viz. in that part which served for the propagation of mankind. Of which some have given natural, others moral reasons; but the most plain and obvious is, that it might be an apt token of the Divine covenant made with Abraham and his posterity, that God would multiply their seed, and make them as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore. Which was chosen, rather than any other, to make them sensible that this was a Divine sacrament; for nothing but God's institution could at first engage men to lay that part bare, which nature hath covered.

Certain it is, that not only the Egyptians, but several other nations, did very anciently use circumcision. Now it is improbable, say they, that the Egyptians (who seem to have had it the most early of all nations who sprang not from Abraham) would borrow Abraham's time (which does not at all consist with any good authors, though such as Celsius were so bold as to affirm it, as we find in Orig. lib. v.), such arguments as these will not persuade us to believe, that it came from the Egyptians, or any other nation; but they had it, if not from the Hebrews, yet from the posterity of Ishmael, or other people descended from Abraham's son, who, the people of a few generations, after the most beloved of God, it is not credible that God would set the mark of Ham's race upon him and his posterity; much less make it the token of his covenant with them. (See J. Ludolphus, lib. iii. Comment. in Histor. Ethip. cap. i. n. 5.) The only authority upon whom the bowers of this novelty rely, is Herodotus, who speaks as follows:—the people of Coelhis, and the Egyptians, were the only nations that were circumcised, δόκειος ψωφικός, 'from the beginning;' the Syrians and Phoenicians who live in Palestine, acknowledging they had this rite from them. Which is just such a tale as he tells in the second chapter of that book, that the Egyptians were the first inhabitants of the earth, unless, perhaps, the Philistines. To which opinion proceeded from their own vain conceit, which made them loth to confess they received circumcision from any other people. Though I think there is a convincing argument of it in Moses himself, who tells us, in chapter x. 14, that the Philistim came from the Caschlichim, i.e. the people of Coelhis, as that people came originally from Egypt. (So Herodotus himself, Diadochus, and abundance of other credible authors, testify.) This, it appears by what I noted there, was before the time of Moses, nay, before Abraham; for the Philistim had a king among them in his days, as we read in this book (xx. and xxi.). Now these Philistim were an uncircumcised people, and therefore the people of Coelhis, no doubt, were so also, when they went out of their country, and drove the Avim out of Palestine. And, consequently, the Egyptians had no such rite among them, when the Caschlichim came from Egypt, but put a gross cheat upon Herodotus, when they made him believe they had been circumcised, σποδότη ιπποτοχός, 'from the beginning.' And in like manner they imposed upon him, who told him the inhabitants of Palestine (whom he calls Syrians and Phoenicians) confessed they received circumcision from the Egyptians: for there were no inhabitants of Palestine circumcised but the Jews, and surely as they never varied, viz. in that part which served for the propagation of mankind. Of which some have given natural, others moral reasons; but the most plain and obvious is, that it might be an apt token of the Divine covenant made with Abraham and his posterity, that God would multiply their seed, and make them as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore. Which was chosen, rather than any other, to make them sensible that this was a Divine sacrament; for nothing but God's institution could at first engage men to lay that part bare, which nature hath covered.

It is of late, indeed, made a question by some learned men, whether this was the original of circumcision, that is, that it was derived from the Egyptians, and not the Egyptians from the Jews. Certain it is, that not only the Egyptians, but several other nations, did very anciently use circumcision. Now it is improbable, say they, that the Egyptians (who seem to have had it the most early of all nations who sprang not from Abraham) would borrow Abraham's time (which does not at all consist with any good authors, though such as Celsius were so bold as to affirm it, as we find in Orig. lib. v.), such arguments as these will not persuade us to believe, that it came from the Egyptians, or any other nation; but they had it, if not from the Hebrews, yet from the posterity of Ishmael, or other people descended from Abraham's son, who, the people of a few generations, after the most beloved of God, it is not credible that God would set the mark of Ham's race upon him and his posterity; much less make it the token of his covenant with them. (See J. Ludolphus, lib. iii. Comment. in Histor. Ethip. cap. i. n. 5.) The only authority upon whom the bowers of this novelty rely, is Herodotus, who speaks as follows:—the people of Coelhis, and the Egyptians, were the only nations that were circumcised, δόκειος ψωφικός, 'from the beginning;' the Syrians and Phoenicians who live in Palestine, acknowledging they had this rite from them.
is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised: and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant.

14 And the uncircumcised man child whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant.

15 ¶ And God said unto Abraham, As for Sarai thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah shall her name be.

16 And I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of peoples shall be of her.

17 Then Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?

18 And Abraham said unto God, O that Ishmael might live before thee!

19 And God said, Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac: and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him.

20 And as for Ishmael, I have heard thee: Behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation.

21 But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at this set time in the next year.

22 And he left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham.

23 ¶ And Abraham took Ishmael his son, and all that were born in his house, and all that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house; and circumcised the flesh of their foreskin in the selfsame day, as God had said unto him.

24 And Abraham went was ninety years old and nine, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin.

25 And Ishmael his son was thirteen years old, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin.

By stoning him: and so were incestuous persons, blasphemers, idolaters, and others, to be judiciously cut off by the rulers.

Ver. 15. The same letter is added to her name, that was to Abraham's, and for the same reason; for in the next verse it is said, "she shall be a mother of nations."

Ver. 16. Here now the promised seed is determined to spring from Sarah. See xvi. 2.

Ver. 17. Abraham fell upon his face. Worshipped God with the humblest reverence.

And laughed. Not doubting of the premise (for the apostle tells us quite contrary, Rom. iv. 19), but out of the exceeding great joy wherein he was transported; and the admiration wherewith he was surprised. Which produced the following questions: Shall a child be born unto him that is a hundred years old? &c. As if he had said, Strange! that I and Sarah, at this age, should have a child! What joyful news is this! Accordingly, the Chaldee translates the word laughed, he rejoiced.

Ver. 18. In his posterity; as appears by God's answer to this question, verse 20.

Ver. 19. He had this name from Abraham's, not from Sarah's father: for that was after this; and proceeded not from the same cause with Abraham's.

Ver. 20. He shall have a numerous posterity. See Dr. Jackson's first book on the Creed, chap. 26, where shows how the Hagarans grew a mighty nation: and at last (when they were called Saracens) became the conquerors of all these parts of the world.

Ver. 21. The great blessings I have promised in the covenant I have made with thee, shall come to thy posterity by Isaac, not by Ishmael: particularly the Messiah.

Ver. 22. That visible majesty wherein he appeared to him (ver. 1), called often, in aftertimes, "the glory of the Lord," went up to heaven from whence it came.

Ver. 23. From hence it was, that the Saracens, descended from him, did not circumcise their children till they were thirteen years old. So it was in the days of Josephus (lib. i. Antiq. cap. 13). And the Saracens in Spain and Africa observed the same custom.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. The Lord appeared unto him] The glory of the Lord, or the Divine Majesty, which the Jews call the Shechimah, as it had done lately (xvii. 1). And as the Lord then appeared to establish his covenant with him by circumcision, so some of the Jews imagine he again appeared to visit, comfort, and heal him, now that he was very sore of his circumcision: or rather, I should think, to testify, by his illustrious manifestation of his glory (ver. 2), his high approbation of Abraham's ready obedience to so harsh a command. So the Jews themselves esteem it, and therefore think that, by receiving it, Abraham fulfilled that precept which goes just before it (xvii. 1), "be thou perfect." Which may have some truth in it, if rightly understood: for his faith and obedience grew more perfect by submitting to this command; and was completed, when he sacrificed his son.

However this be, I think it is plain from verse 10, that this appearance of the Divine Majesty was not long after the former.

In the plains[Orr. The oaks of Mamre, mentioned before (xiii. 18). This place continued famous till the time of Constantine; both Jews, Gentiles, and Christians, meeting here once a year, not only for traffic, but for religion: Christians here calling upon God; and there being an altar here also, on which the gentiles sacrificed, and invoked the angels. Of which superstition Constantine being informed by his mother, he caused that altar to be demolished, and a church to be built in its place. (See Sezemen, lib. ii. cap. 4, Euseb. in vita Constant. lib. iii. cap. 53.)

And he sat in the tent door] To observe what strangers passed that way.

In the heat of the day] In the afternoon, when travellers sought for places of refreshment.

Ver. 2. And he lift up his eyes and looked] Having fallen down on his face (I suppose), and worshipped the Divine Majesty, as he did xvii. 17, he beheld when he rose up again.

And, lo, three men stood by him] Three angels in the shape of men (for so the apostle to the Hebrews calls them, xiii. 2, and so Moses himself calls two of them, xix. 1), who were part of the heavenly retinue, as I may call it, waiting upon the Divine Majesty, mentioned in the verse foregoing. There is a maxim of the Jews, that no angel performs two ministries (that is, is sent on two messages) nor are two angels sent upon one embassy (as Maimonides speaks, More Nevoeh. par. ii. cap. 6), and therefore they think these three angels were despatched for different purposes; one of them, and the principal, to bring a confirmation of the birth of Isaac, another to bring Lot out of Sodom, and a third to overthrow the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. And therefore when one of these angels had delivered that message to Abraham, there were but two that went to Sodom (xix. 1), and Lot speaks to one of them as taking a particular care of him (ver. 19, &c.); and then it is said, "The Lord rained fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven" (ver. 24); that is, that angel of the Lord, who was set by the Lord of heaven and earth over that work. Some of them, indeed, assign another work for one of them (as we find in that title of the Talmud called Bava-Metzia, cap. 7), but they agree in the main notion, that they had different offices with which they were intrusted. But some Christians, and those of great authority, have made a question whether they were all created angels; one of them, at least, seeming to be the Lord of all. Nay, St. Cyril, in his first book against Julian, thinks there was a representation of the blessed, undivided Trinity; for Abraham speaks to them (ver. 4), εις ευαίσθησιν αι γραφάς, "as if the three were but one." But St. Hilary's opinion (and Eusebius's, lib. v. Demonstr. cap. 9) is more likely; that the Son of God only appeared with two angels attending on him: which many think is evident from ver. 22, and 25, of this chapter. Yet I think another account may be given of these verses; and if we should make that an argument that one of them was the uncreated Lord, another of them must be so also: for he is called likewise by the name of Jehovah, Gen. xix. 24. See St. Austin, lib. ii. de Trin. cap. 11, and ib. lib. ii. cap. 11, where he confutes the forenamed opinion.

He ran to meet them] Was forward to invite them to refresh themselves with him: for he took them to be considerable persons, as appears by what follows.

Bowed himself toward the ground] After the manner of the eastern people; in token of the respect and honour he had for them. For this was a civil 26 In the selfsame day was Abraham circumcised, and Ishmael his son.

27 And all the men of his house, born in the

Ver. 26.] The Jews will have this to be the same with the great day of expiation instituted in Moses's time: so that God every year remembered, say they, the covenant of circumcision. But this is an ungrounded fancy.

Ver. 27.] Maimonides understands by the men of his house, those whom Abraham had converted from idolatry, and made proselytes to the true religion. So do others among the Jews (see his treatise of the Worship of the Planets, cap. i. § 9). But it is more proper to understand by the men of his house, all his family in general: who were either (as it follows) born in his house (and therefore it is likely they were brought up in the true religion, and so easily persuaded to receive the mark of circumcision, or bought with his money; who submitted to Abraham's arguments, not to his authority; for religion is to be chosen, not compelled.
favour in thy sight, pass not away. I pray thee, not from thy servant:
4 Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree:
5 And I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts, after that ye shall pass on: for therefore are ye come to your servant. And they said, So do, as thou hast said.
6 And Abraham hardened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth.
7 And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he hasted to dress it.

action (not religious) it is manifest by this: that he did not know them to be angels; but only persons of nobility (as we now speak), their aspect and habit, I suppose, being extraordinary.

Ver. 3.] One of them appeared more honourable and superior to the other two; and therefore he makes his address to him, as the chief: praying him, if he thought him worthy of such a favour, to honour him with their company.

Ver. 4. [Bend your facts.] i. e. To wash your feet. For this was performed by servants, and not by the guessesthemselves.

And rest yourselves under the tree.] In an arbour under a great tree; where they were wont to eat, for coolness sake. See Dr. Hammond upon Psalm cxviii. 3. St. Jerome sometimes calls this tree an oak: sometimes a turpentine tree (as J. Filesacus observes, Demonstr. Evang, cap. 13), unless we will say, that he thought Abraham dwelt under the one, and entertained them under the other. And so Eusebius (lib. v. Demonstr. Evang. cap. 9) expressly relates it, that God appeared to him under the oak where he dwelt; and that he entertained the angels under a turpentine tree, which was had in great honour in his time.

Ver. 5. I will fetch a morsel of bread.] Or rather a loaf of bread; as De Dieu shows the word imports: under which is comprehended, all necessary provision at a meal.

Comfort ye your hearts.] Refresh yourselves.

For therefore are ye come to your servant.] Divine Right, thee hast invited them to come this way, at this time of day, that I may have an opportunity to entertain you hospitably.

Ver. 6. Make cakes upon the hearth.] Many interpret it, upon the coals or hot embers, according to what we read 1 Kings xix. 6. But Bochartus thinks the word there signifies, as it doth here, upon hot stones; others will have it, that they were laid upon the hearth, and notough hot embers (par. 1 Hierozol. lib. ii. cap. 34), and so they prepare them at this day, as Leon. Rawulf tells us in his Travels, par. ii. cap. 9, where he saith, That as he went through a country that lies between Mesopotamia and Media, a woman presently made them cakes, about a finger thick, and of the bigness of a trencher: which she first laid upon hot stones, and turned them often; and then threw ashes and embers over them: which, he says, were very savoury.

Ver. 7.] Which was a noble entertainment in those countries.

Ver. 8. And he took butter,] Though we read of cheese in Homer, Euripides, Theocritus, and others; yet they never mention butter: nor hath Aristotle a word of it (as Bochart observes, Hierozol. par. 1.

8 And he took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat.

9 ¶ And they said unto him, Where is Sarah thy wife? And he said, Behold, in the tent.
10 And he said, I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; and, lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son. And Sarah heard it in the tent door, which was behind him.
11 Now Abraham and Sarah were old and well stricken in age; and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women.
12 Therefore Sarah laughed within herself, saying, After I am waxed old shall I have pleasure, my lord being old also?

lib. ii. cap. 41), though he hath sundry observations about cheese: for butter was not a thing then known among the Eastern people; and, as in other places, it was an ancient food among the eastern people. And he stood by them.] Waited upon them, and ministered to them. For he did not stand unmovable; but as servants do that attend upon the table: who, as there is occasion, bring or take away, &c. (See P. Pagius on Deut. i. 38.)

Ver. 9. And they said unto him, Where is Sarah thy wife?] One of them (the rest signifying some way their consent) asked him for his wife: not being ignorant, but to introduce the following discourse.

In the tent.] In her apartment; for women had their apartments by themselves.

Ver. 10. And he said.] The principal of the three angels: or rather, the Lord himself, as it is explained ver. 15. For, as Theodoric Hackspan judiciously observes, this appearance of the Divine Majesty was different from the foregoing: not being immediate by himself alone, like that xvii. 1, nor merely mediate by an angel, like that xvi. 7, 10, 11, 12, &c.; but mixed, the Lord himself (ver. 1) being conjoined with the angels, whom he employed in this instance.

I will certainly return unto thee.] To fulfil the promise which I made thee (xvii. 19).

According to the time of life:] Nine months hence; which is the time of perfecting the life of a child in the womb. This appears to be the sense, from ver. 14, where he calls it the time appointed, or a set time.

In the tent door.] The angels sat with their backs to Sarah's tent: unto the door of which she was come to listen, having heard that they asked for her.

Behind him.] This shows the truth of what Hackspan notes, that this was a mixed apparition: for this word him plainly relates to the angel, whose words were in truth the Lord's, who was there present. For, as he observes in another place (Disput. ii. de Nominibus Divinis, n. 15), the Scripture relates these matters so, that sometimes it mentions the principal cause whose words are related; sometimes only the secondary cause; in which latter case, it must be understood, that when the words exceed the dignity of the minister, the Lord himself spake them. For the sacred matter of the mind more by whose authority any thing is spoken, than by whose ministry: so that it is not much material from whose mouth any message comes: but what is said must be attended. This will be made plain, when I come to Gen. xxii. 11, 12, &c.

Ver. 11.] She was no longer capable of conception, according to the ordinary course of nature.

Ver. 12. Laughed within herself:] Not as Abraham, a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?

19 For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.

20 And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous;

21 I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know.

22 And the men turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before the Lord.

To do justice and judgment.] Includes in them all those virtues which were opposite to the sins of Sodom.

Ver. 20. Because the cry.] Of their sins: which are said to cry: first, to show the enormous greatness and impudence of them: for "grandis absque dubio clamor est, qui a terrâ ascendit ad coelum," as Salvian speaks. And, secondly, to show that the goodness of God could no longer bear with them; their sins were so great, that by the compelling of the Lord it might be necessary to punish them: for "Deus eos non necrit perdere, sed ipsi extorterit, ut perierint." They not only called, but cried to him for vengeance, as he also speaks (lib. i. de Gubern. Dei, p. 19, 20, edit. Baluzii; and lib. iv. p. 75, lib. v. p. 113).

Of Sodom and Gomorrah] As they were the principal and greatest cities, so they were the most wicked; and led the rest into all manner of impiety; who, therefore, also perished with them.

Very grievous.] Not to be tolerated any longer. There are prodigions stories related of the wickedness both of their judges and of the people, in the Gemara Sanhedrim, cap. x. which are there alleged as an explication of this verse.

Ver. 21. I will go down now, &c.] He uses the language of a good judge (ver. 25), who never passes sentence, much less executes it, till he hath examined the cause.

Whether they have done altogether, &c.] Whether they are come to the highest pitch of wickedness; or (as De Dieu) whether they are so resolved to go on in sin, that there is is no hope of them.

If not, I will know.] That so I may use means for their reformation.

Ver. 22. The men.] The three men mentioned ver. 2. It is commonly said that only two of them went away from Abraham, and that the third remained and held discourse with him. But I see no reason for this; they that came in and ate with him, and rose up from the table (ver. 16), who no doubt were all three, being the persons that are here said now to have turned their faces from thence; i. e. from the place where they had been entertained by Abraham: or where he parted with them.

Went toward Sodom.] As they intended (ver. 16) But Abram stood yet before the Lord.] Not before any of those three, but before the Divine Majesty: who appeared to him (ver. 1), and had spoken to him (ver. 13), and discoursed with him (ver. 17, 20), in whose presence he still continued. Some by stood understand he prayed: but that follows in the next verse.

But Abram drew near.] Approached towards the Divine Majesty, to make his addresses by prayer and supplication to him. Perhaps the Divine Majesty 23 And Abraham drew near, and said, Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked?
24 Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein?
25 That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee: Shalt not the Judge of all the earth do right?
26 And the Lord said, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes.
27 And Abraham answered and said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord: Peradventure the Lord will forsake the city for the sakes of the righteous that are therein.
28 Peradventure there shall lack five of the fifty righteous: wilt thou destroy all the city remained in the place where it first appeared (ver. 1), and Abraham, by conducting the three men some part of their way, being gone farther from it, now came nearer to it. Though the phrase does not necessarily import it; to draw nigh to God, in the holy language, signifying no more but to worship him.

Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? As much as to say, I know thou wilt not. For such questions strongly deny; as in ver. 17.

Ver. 24. Fifty righteous within the city?] Of Sodom, which was the chief, and comprehended the rest of the country of Pentapolis; which one would guess, by Gen. xiv. 17, depended upon Sodom as the metropolis. So what is said here of it, I take to refer to the whole region.

Wilt thou—no spare the place for the fifty, &c.? He desires two things of God. 1. That he would not destroy the righteous with the wicked. 2. That he would spare the wicked for the sake of the righteous; if any considerable number of them were found among the wicked.

Ver. 25. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?] This refers (as we translate it) only to the first part of his request, "not to destroy the righteous with the wicked, which was contrary to common justice, much more to that exact justice which is administered by the Supreme Lord of the world: from whom there lies no appeal. But, according to the Vulgar translation (which is this, "Thou who judgest all the earth, wilt not means execute this judgment"), it refers to the other part also: that God would not be so severe as to destroy a whole country, whilst there were many good men still remaining in it; and so the word right, includes in it clemency. And, indeed, this passage seems to relate to both parts of his request; and is to be interpreted thus: Shall not the Supreme Judge show mercy, as well as do justice?

Ver. 26.] This shows the foregoing interpretation to be right: God promising most graciously to be merciful to all, for the sake of a few, in comparison with the multitude of offenders.

Ver. 27. Which am but dust and ashes.] Very mean and vile.

Ver. 28.] A great argument of Abraham's modesty; who durst not presume to ask too much at once; but by degrees proceeds, in the following verses, to petition for greater abatements: and that with fear and trembling, lest the Lord should be angry with his impertinency.

Ver. 32.] A wonderful representation of the tender mercy of the Most High; who condescended so low as to grant a reprieve to the whole country, for the sake of so small a number, if they could have been found in it. And his mercy was still greater, even beyond Abraham's desire; for he spared one of the five cities, for the sake of three or four persons, as we read xix. 29, 31.

We do not find that Abraham makes express mention of Lot in any of the foregoing petitions; but it is plain from xix. 29, that he was in his thoughts; which God knew: and he is comprehended in those words (ver. 23 of this chap.), "Wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked?"

Ver. 33. The Lord went his way.] The Divine Majesty, or the glory of the Lord disappeared (and ascended perhaps towards heaven), after this communication with Abraham was finished.

Abraham returned unto his place.] In the plain of Mamre (ver. 1).

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. Two angels.] There were three at the first (xviii. 2), but the chief of them was gone; having for lack of five? And he said, If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it.

29 And he spake unto him yet again, and said, Peradventure there shall be forty found there. And he said, I will not do it for forty's sake.
30 And he said unto him, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak: Peradventure there shall be thirty found there. And he said, I will not do it, if I find thirty there.
31 And he said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord: Peradventure there shall be twenty found there. And he said, I will not destroy it for twenty's sake.
32 And he said, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once: Peradventure ten shall be found there. And he said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake.
33 And the Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham: and Abraham returned unto his place.
CHAPTER XIX.

2 And he said, Behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray you, into your servant's house, and tarry all night, and wash your feet, and ye shall rise up early, and go on your ways. And they said, Nay; but we will abide in the street all night.

3 And he pressed upon them greatly; and they turned in unto him, and entered into his house; and he made them a feast, and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat.

4 But before they lay down, the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compassed the house round, both old and young, all the people from every quarter:

5 And they called unto Lot, and said unto him, Where are the men that came in to thee this night? bring them out unto us, that we may know them.

6 And Lot went out at the door unto them, and shut the door after him, heat of the day; and were now come to the gates of Sodom.

Lot sat in the gate of Sodom.] The Hebrew doctors will have it, that he was made a judge in this city; and the prime judge of all: for they adventure to name five (in Bereschith Rabba), and say Lot was the president of the court, which sat in the gate of the city. But this is only a fancy of theirs: he rather sat in the gate of this city, as Abraham did at his tent door (to judge he strangers to his house (according to the hospitality of those days), which was the greater charity, because he knew the city to be so wicked, that (if we may believe the Hebrew doctors) they not only denied them all assistance, but abused them, and were cruel to them (see Gemara Sanhedrim, cap. 11, and Pirke Eliezer, cap. 15), for which last, they quote those words of Ezekiel (xxii. 29), "they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully." Which are spoken of Israel, whom (xvi. 19) he had compared with Sodom: one of whose sins, he says, was, want of compassion to "the poor and needy."

Rose up to meet them, &c.] Just as Abraham did; whose civility he imitates, as well as his charity. For the bowing himself so lowly was a token of the greater and greater esteem he had of him: who had the appearance of great and noble persons. And therefore he calls them lords in the next verse.

Ver. 2. Turn in, and tarry all night, &c.] It is late, and the night draws on; take up your lodging with me, and refresh yourselves; and go away as early as you please.

And they said, Nay, &c.] It was as great a civility in strangers, not to be forward to accept, as it was in him to invite: and therefore they refuse him at first, to try his kindness: but intending, no doubt, to embrace his offer, if he pressed them further. So the following words are to be understood.

We will abide in the street all night.] Unless you persist in your invitation. In those hot countries, it was as agreeable as an oasis; especially in summer. And in a city, they were safe from being infested by wild beasts, or robbers.

Concerning washing the feet, see xviii. 4.

Ver. 3. He pressed upon them greatly.] Would not be denied, but was so earnest that they yielded. It is the same word with that ver. 9.

Before unleavened bread.] Which would be soonest ready, that so they might, in good time, repose themselves.

Ver. 4. Before they lay down.] To take their rest.

7 And said, I pray you, brethren, do not so wickedly.

8 Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes; only let these men do nothing; for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof.

9 And they said, Stand back. And they said again, This one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge: now will we deal worse with thee than with them. And they pressed sore upon him, even Lot, and came near to break the door.

10 But the men put forth their hand, and pulled Lot into the house to them, and shut to the door.

11 And they smote the men that were at the door of the house with blindness, both small and great: so that they weakened themselves to find the door.

Both old and young.] A manifest token of an universal deprivation of manners, and dissolution of government.

From every quarter.] Or, as some understand it, from the most extreme parts of the city: as in Psalm xix. 4. One, it seems, told another, what goodly persons were come to their city: and all ran to the house where they heard they were, with the same wicked inclinations. This is a proof there were not ten righteous persons in Sodom.

Ver. 5. That we may know them.] A modest word for a lewd fact. Some, indeed, will have it understood simply, of their examining what they were, whence they came, and what their business was. Which might perhaps be their pretense; but Lot's answer to them (ver. 7, 8) interprets their meaning to be filth.

Ver. 6. Went out at the door.] To try if he could persuade them to depart. From whence, perhaps, the Jews gathered he was a man of authority among them.

Ver. 7. Do not so wickedly.] As to break the rights of hospitality, and violate the laws of nature.

Ver. 8. Behold now, I have two daughters, &c.] This must be understood to have been spoken in a perturbation and perplexity of mind; and out of a vehement desire to preserve the men whom he had entertained: which made him say, he had rather they should abuse his own daughters than those strangers. For therefore came they under—my roof.] He pleads the laws of hospitality, which obliged him to protect them; though he himself suffered by it.

Ver. 9. Stand back.] Give way to us.

This one fellow, &c.] Here is one, and he but a sojourner; who takes upon him to be a censor morum, and control the whole city. This shows he was no judge.

Now will we deal worse with thee, &c.] Abuse them more than them. For it is the same word with ver. 7, 9, doing wickedly.

Ver. 11. Smote the men—with blindness.] Not with a total blindness (for then they would not have sought for the door of Lot's house, but rather have groped for the way home), but such a dimness that they could not see anything distinctly, or in its right place; but there seemed to be a door, Suppose, where there was none: or, there was such a confusion in their brain, that all things were turned tops-yielder (as we speak) in their imagination; and appeared quite otherwise than they were.
for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed.

18 And Lot said unto them, Oh, not so, my Lord:

19 Behold now, thy servant hath found grace in thy sight, and thou hast magnified thy mercy, which thou hast shewed unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die:

20 Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: Oh, let me escape thither, (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live.

21 And he said unto him, See, I have accepted thee concerning this thing also, that I will not overthrow this city, for the which thou hast spoken.

22 Haste thee, escape thither; for I cannot do any thing till thou be come hither. Therefore the name of the city was called Zoar.

23 ¶ The sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar.

24 Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven;
CHAPTER XIX.

upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven;

25 And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground.

26 ¶ But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.

27 ¶ And Abraham gat up early in the morning to the place where he stood before the Lord:

28 And he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and, lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace.

grammarians speak; of which Cocceius (upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrim, cap. 47) gives these instances, Gen. ii. 90; 1 Sam. xli. 12; Zech. i. 10.

And there are others, which come nearer to these words, Exod. xxiv. "And he (i.e. the Lord, ver. 3) said unto Moses, Come up unto the Lord." Hos. i. 7, "I will save them by the Lord their God." Zech. x. 12, "I will strengthen them in the Lord," &c.

The council of Sirmium, indeed, anathematizes those who thus interpret these words, and do not say, "the Son rained from the Father" (Socrat. lib. ii. cap. 30). Yet St. Chrysostom did not fear to say this is an idiom of the Scripture language, which intended only to shew, τὰ τέλος τῆς τιμίων ἐπίγγειας, "that the Lord brought this punishment upon them." Others also have observed, that the Scripture phrase being very frequently used elsewhere (as the meaning of the verse), may be meant, the angel of the Lord.

For wheresoever mention is made of the Lord, it is to be understood of him, γις, προ, "and his house of judgment" (as the Jewish doctors speak); i.e., of the angels which attend his Divine Majesty. And thus I find Aretins (or Andreae Casserianus), in his Commentaries, that the angel of the Lord is the same as that which appears as the Son of God in these words.

For he there compares that captain who was over the hostus (Rev. ix. 11), to the angel that was sent to cut off the army of Sennacherib, and to this angel, ὁ τὸν Σαλμάσιον τὸν διάτομον δελόβοις ἐκπόνησα, "who had the charge of executing the fiery destruction upon Sodom committed to him." For all angels, saith he, are not ministering spirits, εἰς βασιλέως σώφρων, "for men's preservation," but some serve, εἰς τημίων, "for punishment." And that they can bring fire from heaven, and raise storms and tempests, appears by the story of Job.

Out of heaven:] From the Lord whose seat is in heaven. The like expression we have, Rev. xx. 9, 10; Rev. xxi. 11, 12; Rev. xxii. 33.

Brimstone and fire:] A most hideous shower, or rather storm, of nitre, sulphur, or bitumen, mingled with fire, fell upon this country from above; and, as the tradition was among the heathen, accompanied with a dreadful earthquake: which made an irruption of those bituminous waters, whereby this country was turned into the lake called Asphaltites, or the Salt, or Dead Sea. So Strabo, lib. xvi. in his description of that lake. And, indeed, it doth not seem improbable, that the earth quaked while the heavens did so terribly frown, and the Almighty's voice thundered from the clouds, as Doctor Jackson speaks, book on the Creed, chap. 15. For the word στροφή (which St. Peter uses, 2 Pet. ii. 6) may be thought to import some such subversion. But it was his ignorance of the sacred tradition in the Scriptures, which made Strabo wholly ascribe the desolation of that country to the earth; and not at all to the heavens. Whereas Tacitus, who was better informed, says the inundation of 2 P. f. C. (that is, its tidal) arose, "were burnt by the stroke of thunderbolts from heaven:" and, a little after, igne ecclesiæ flagrante, "were set on fire and consumed by lightning" (lib. v. Histor.). With which fell such abundance of bituminous stuff, that the valley, which had only some pits of bitumen in it before (xiv. 3, 10), became a lake of it.

Ver. 25. And he overthrew those cities, &c.] Super impium populum gehennam misit e caelo, as Salvian glosses (lib. i. et lib. iv. de Geburn. Dei), "he sent hell from heaven upon an impious people," Of whose destruction there remains an everlasting monument in the Salt Sea: into which that plain country is turned. The quality of which, and of the soil about it, is so contrary to the nature of all other seas, or inland lakes, that no philosopher can give an account of it, like that which Moses hath given us: as the same Doctor Jackson truly observes. He will that Tacitus in the place forementioned, or Pliny, or Diodorus, may be satisfied of this. The country where these cities stood, being become a pan, or receptacle (as the Jews understand), of such a strange moisture, that it may be called liquid pitch, rather than water: for it is so stiff that no wind will move it: nor will a camel sink, if thrown into it; nor any fish, or bird, that uses the water, live in it: and therefore called the Dead Sea, and Salt Sea, as Salmansay think (Exerè. Flumin. p. 577, 614), because no creature can live there. And because the new seas that come from it blast all that grows of itself, or is sown in the earth about it. Nor do the rivers that run into it, at all alter it; but it infects all their waters, with the loathsome qualities of those dregs of God's wrath (to use Doctor Jackson's words once more) which first settled in it, at this overthrow: just like bad humours, when they settle in any part of our bodies, plant, as it were, a new nature in it, and turn all nourishment into their substance.

Ver. 26. His wife looked back.] She not only lagged behind, as we speak, but turned about, and stood still awhile, bewailing perhaps the loss of all there: or, as some of the Jews fancy, to see what would become of her kindred, and whether they would follow her or no.

Became a pillar of salt.] Or, as some understand it, an everlasting monument: whence, perhaps, the Jews have given her the name of Adith (as they call her in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 25), because she remained a perpetual testimony of God's just displeasure. For she standing still too long, some of that dreadful shower, before mentioned, overtook her; and falling upon her, wrapped her body in a sheet of nitro-sulphurous matter: which congealed into a crust as hard as stone; and made her appear like a pillar of salt, her body being as it were candied in it. Kimech calls it a heap of salt; which the Hebrews say continued for many ages. Their conjecture is not improbable, who think the body of Nephtali was hence derived: who, the poets feign, was turned into a stone, upon her excessive grief for the death of her children.

Ver. 27. Where he prayed, say the Jews, or commanded with God (xviii. 23, 33).

Ver. 28. Some think, the Hebrew word signifies, like the smoke of a limekiln; or, of a boiling caldron. After the words of the prophet, the yeare's heat (as it were) remained; and made that country look dimly, which before was like "the garden of God" (xiii. 10), but now became a stinking puddle of filthy water, καθ' άπειρον δύναμιν, as Diodorus speaks, "noisome beyond expression."
And it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt.

And Lot went up out of Zoar, and dwelt in the mountain, and he and his two daughters with him; for he feared to dwell in Zoar: and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters.

And the firstborn said unto the younger, Our father is old, and there is not a man in the earth to come in unto us after the manner of all the earth: come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father.

But his fear of his father was strong: therefore, he did not do that which his father commanded him to do. And these things did they say to their father, and he would not believe them.

And his two daughters were goodly to look upon; but he would not know any woman, nor would he come in unto them.

And it came to pass after this, that the Older arose, and said to his father Lot: Today a daughter-in-law hath prepared enough meat for us, let us make her drink wine, and let us lie with her, that we may preserve seed of our father.

And Lot said to his father: Behold, this city is near, and it is宽容 to us to dwell there: let this woman come and lie with us that we may preserve seed of our father.

And the father said to his daughter: Have ye forgotten that I have no son? and why will ye bring reproach upon me?

And they made their father drink wine that night: and the firstborn went in, and lay with his father: and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose.

And it came to pass on the morrow, that the firstborn said unto the younger, Behold, I lay yesternight with my father: let us make him drink wine this night also; and go thou in, and lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father.

And they made their father drink wine that night also: and the younger arose, and lay with him: and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose.

Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father.
CHAPTER XX.

1 Abraham sojourneth at Gerar, 2 denieth his wife, and loseth her. 3 Abimelech is reproved for her in a dream. 9 He rebuketh Abraham, 14 restoreth Sarah, 16 and reprovest her. 17 He is healed by Abraham's prayer.

1 And Abraham journeyed from thence toward the south country, and dwelled between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar.

2 And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, She is my sister: and Abimelech king of Gerar sent, and took Sarah.

3 But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, and said to him, Behold, thou art a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a man's wife.

4 But Abimelech had not come near her:

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. Journeied from thence] i.e. From Mamre, where he had dwelt a while; and in that country many remarkable passages had happened (xiii. 18, xviii. 1). Toward the south country] Toward Egypt: for some fancy the very stench of the lake of Sodom was offensive to him in Mamre.

Sojourned in Gerar.] The metropolis of Palestine; and, as some compute it, not more than six miles from Mamre.

Ver. 2. Abraham said of Sarah, &c.] Just as he had done in Egypt (xii. 13), when there was a greater reason for it, she being then thirty years younger than now, when she was no less than ninety years old. But it seems her beauty remained at this age, being healthful, and having borne and suckled no child, so that she was still in those days living so long, that they were as fresh at ninety as they are now at forty or fifty. When many that are of excellent constitutions, and naturally handsome, continue very lovely.

Abimelech] The name of all the kings of Palestine, as Pharaoh was of the kings of Egypt. It is not improbable, as the author of Tzemah David conjectures, that the succeeding kings took the name of him who was the first king of the country. Ad A. M. 3600.

Sent, and took Sarah.] By violence, some think; but I see no ground for it. He desired to have her, and might think Abraham would look upon it as a great honour to have his sister become wife to a king: and Abraham, it is likely, showed no unwillingness, nor being in a condition to deny him.

Ver. 3. But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night.] Two differences are observed by Maimonides, between this manifestation, which God made of his mind to Abimelech, and that which he made to the prophets. For it is only said here, "God came to Abimelech," and that he came "in a dream by night." The very same is said of Laban, the Syrian, who doth not seem to have been so good a man as Abimelech (xxxi. 31). But of Jacob it is said, "God spake unto Israel," and he spake to him in the visions of the night (not in a dream), and said, "Jacob, Jacob," and he said, Lord, wilt thou slay also a righteous nation?

5 Said he not unto me, She is my sister? and she, even she herself said, He is my brother: in the integrity of my heart and innocency of my hands have I done this.

6 And God said unto him in a dream, Yea, I know that thou didst this in the integrity of thy heart; for I also withheld thee from sinning against me: therefore suffered I thee not to touch her.

CHAPTER XX.

XVIII. 1. [See More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 41.] God was not a stranger to other nations, when he was peculiarly kind to Abraham: but spake to them in dreams, and sometimes in visions, as appears in Eliphaz and Elihu, Job iv. 13, xxxii. 14, 15, &c.

Thou art but a dead man,] viz. If thou dost not restore Abraham his wife (ver. 7).

She is a man's wife.] Or, married to a husband (as we translate it in the margin) so completely, that he hath enjoyed her as his wife. For from this place the Jewish doctors prove, that the marriage contract was not perfected in these days till the parties had lain together: after which, if any other person lay with the woman, he was to be put to death as an adulterer; but not if he lay with her after the contract, before it was consummated by actual enjoyment. (See Mr. Selden, de Jure N. et G. lib. v. cap. 1, p. 551.)

Ver. 4. Abimelech had not come near her:] To use her as his wife.

Will thou slay also a righteous nation?] He was afraid (as became a good man, and a good king) lest his people should suffer upon his account, who, in this particular, had no guilt upon them.

Ver. 5. Said he not unto me, &c.] The fault is in them, not in me: for I had both their words for it, that he was her brother, and he said nothing of her being his wife.

In the integrity of my heart.] Not with any intention to defile her; but to make her my wife.

And innocency of my hands.] I did not take her by violence from Abraham; but he and she consented to it.

Ver. 6. God said unto him in a dream.] The same expression is still retained, which we had (ver. 3) to show that this was a lower degree of Divine manifestation than was in Abraham's family.

I know that thou didst this in the integrity, &c.] I.e. That thou didst not design any evil.

For I also, &c.] Or, rather, "and I also withheld thee." I dealt well with thee, because of thy integrity. Some think he was withheld by a disease in the secret parts (ver. 17).

From sinning against me.] From committing adultery.
7 Now therefore restore the man his wife; for he is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live: and if thou restore her not, know thou that thou shalt surely die, thou, and all that are thine.

8 Therefore Abimelech rose early in the morning, and called all his servants, and told all these things in their ears: and the men were sore afraid. 9 And Abimelech called Abraham, and said unto him, What hast thou done unto us? and what have I offended thee, that thou hast brought on me and on my kingdom a great sin? thou hast done deeds unto me that ought not to be done. 10 And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What seest thou, that thou hast done this thing? 11 And Abraham said, Because I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife’s sake. 12 And yet indeed she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife. 13 And it came to pass, when God caused me to wander from my father’s house, that I said unto her, This is thy kindness which thou shalt shew unto me; at every place whither we shall come, say of me, He is my brother. 14 And Abimelech took sheep, and oxen, and menservants, and maidservants, and gave them unto Abraham, and restored him Sarah his wife. 15 And Abimelech said, Behold, my land is before thee: dwell where it pleaseth thee. 16 And unto Sarah he said, Behold, I have given thee Sarah thy wife; and she shall bear thee a son, and I will bless thee with a great blessing in her behalf, because of the multitude of nations and kings that shall come out of thee. 17 And I will make thy name great, that thou mayest be able to found nations; from thee shall kings be brought forth. 18 And I will give all these things unto thy seed; for mine is the God of thy father, and I am the God of Abraham, and I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee the land whereon thou art a stranger, all the days of the earth. 19 And God appeared unto Abraham, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land. 20 And he built an altar there, and called unto the name of the Lord, who appeared unto him. 21 And he removed thence unto a mountain opposite to Bethel, and said, Unto my father’s house, I will go up. 22 And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him, saying, Abraham, Abraham. And he said, Here am I. 23 And he said, I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And he said, Fear not, Abraham; I will maintain with thee and thy seed after thee a great covenant, because of my goodly blessings which I gave unto thy father. 24 And unto thy seed I will give this land, where thou art a stranger, all the days of the earth. 25 And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make thee more numerous than the stars of heaven, and more abundant than the sand which is upon the sea. And thy seed shall inherit the land of Canaan, where thou art a stranger. 26 And I will bless thee; and I will render thee fruitful, and multiply thee so that thou shalt be a multitude of people. 27 And will make thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; that thou mayest be a blessing. 28 And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed. 29 And Abraham rose early in the morn-given thy brother a thousand pieces of silver: behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee, and with all other: thus she was reproved. 17 ¶ So Abraham prayed unto God, and God the gift before mentioned, and be translated this; or to Abraham, and be translated he, as it is by us. If they refer to the former, then the sense is, I have given him that sum of money to buy thee a veil, that all who converse with thee here, or in any other country (where thou shalt come), may know thee to be a married woman.” For a veil was worn in token of subjection to the power of the husband: and that thereby their chastity might be preserved safe from the snares of others. As G. Vorstius observes upon Pirke Eliezer, cap. 32. Or, as others interpret it, “this money will be a covering to thine eyes (that is, a defence to thy modesty); it being a testimony that Abimelech paid dear for taking thee into his house.” If they refer to Abraham, then the meaning is, “Thou needest no other defence of thy modesty and chastity than he, nor hast any reason to say hereafter he is thy brother; for he is so dear to God that God will defend him, and he will defend thee, without such shifts as this thou hast used: nay, not only thee, but all that are with thee; and that even against strangers.” I omit other interpretations, and refer the reader to L. de Dieu. Thus she was reproved.] Or, instructed (as some translate it) not to dissemble her condition; or this was the reproof which he gave her, for saying Abraham was her brother. Ver. 17. So Abraham prayed unto God, &c.] Beseemed God to restore them all to their health, now that his wife was restored to him (ver. 14). Ver. 18. For the Lord had fast closed up, &c.] By such swellings (some understand it) in the secret parts, that the men could neither enjoy their wives, nor the women who were with child be delivered.

CHAPTER XXI.

1 Isaac is born. 4 He is circumcised. 6 Sarah’s joy. 9 Hagar and Ishmael are cast forth. 15 Hagar in distress. 17 The angel comforteth her. 23 Abimelech’s covenant with Abraham at Beer-sheba.

1 And the Lord visited Sarah as he had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as he had spoken. 2 For Sarah conceived, and bare Abraham a son in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken to him. 3 And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Isaac. 4 And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac being eight days old, as God had commanded him.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. The Lord visited Sarah, &c.] Bostowed upon her the blessing he had promised her; i.e. made her conceive. For so the word visiteth signifies, either in a bad sense to inflict punishment (Exod. xxi. 5), or in a good sense to confer blessings; as here, and Exod. iii. 16, and many other places. And the Lord did unto Sarah as he had spoken.] Performed his promise by making her bring forth a child: for so it is explained in the next verse, “Sarah conceived, and bare Abraham a son.” Ver. 2. Sarah conceived, &c.] God not only made her womb fruitful, but brought the fruit of it to perfection, and then brought it into the world. At the set time] (xviii. 14.) It is not said where Isaac was born: for we are not told here, whether Abraham departed from Gerar into any other part of this country, as Abimelech kindly offered and gave him liberty to do (xx. 15). But it appearing by the latter end of this chapter, that he continued a long time in Abimelech’s country, though not at Gerar, it is probable Isaac was born at Beer-sheba (ver. 31). Ver. 6. God hath made me to laugh.] I.e. To rejoice exceedingly. So that all that hear will laugh with me.] All my friends and neighbours will congratulate my happiness and rejoice with me. Ver. 7. Given children suck?] It is usual to put the plural number for the singular, as was observed before (xix. 29). Or, she hoped, perhaps, to have more children after this. And her giving him suck was a certain proof, that she had brought him forth of her own womb: and that he was not a supposititious child, as Menochius well observes. Others note, that the greatest persons in those ancient days suckled their own children: which Favorinus, a Greek philosopher, pressed as a duty upon a noble woman by many strong arguments: which are recorded by A. Gellius, who was present at his discourse (lib. xii. Not. Attic. cap. 1). At the age of five years old, as St. Jerome reports the opinion of some of the Hebrews. Made a great feast the same day.] Rather now than at his nativity, because there was greater hope of life, when he was grown so strong as to be taken from his mother’s breast. Ver. 9. Sarah saw the son of Hagar, &c. sucking.] He laughed and jeered, perhaps, at the great bustle which was made at Isaac’s weaning: looking upon himself as the first-born, and by the right of that to have the privilege of fulfilling the promise of the Messiah. This gives a good account of Sarah’s earnestness for the expulsion, not only of him, but of his mother also, who, it is likely, flattered and bare him up in those pretensions. Many think he did more than mock him, because St. Paul calls it per
GENESIS.

And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is.

18 Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand; for I will make him a great nation.

19 And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink.

20 And God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness, and became an archer.

21 And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran: goods: of which servants were a part. Doctor Jackson (book i. on the Creed, cap. 25) thinks that Abraham would scarce have suffered them to go into a wilderness so poorly provided, when he had store of all things, unless he had been directed by some secret instinct, presaging the rude and shocking kind of life which he wasygamy to Hagar. Yet, it is probable, he was as kind to him as he was to the sons he had by Keturah, and sent him some tokens of his love afterwards. (See xxxv. 6.)

Ver. 15. She cast the child under one of the shrubs. He being faint, and ready to die with thirst. A presage (sauith the great man before named) that his posterity should be pinched with the like penury: scantiness of water (which was their best drink) straitening their territories in Arabia, as Strabo observs, lib. xvi. And after they had enlarged their bounds, even in Mesopotamia itself, they were still confined to the dry and barren places of it.

Ver. 16. Her strength carried her further than he could go: but her affection still kept her within sight of the place where he was. His name was Ishmael, because he was descended from Abraham.

Ver. 17. And God heard the voice of the lad. Who cried, it seems, as well as his mother: and it moved the Divine pity to send an angel to their relief.

Fear not.] Do not think I come to terrify thee: or, do not fear the death of thy child.

Ver. 18. Lift up the lad, &c.] It seems he was so faint that he was not able to stand without support; it.

Ver. 19. Opened her eyes.] Made her see what she did not observe before, by reason of her tears, or the great disturbance of her mind.

Ver. 20. God was with the lad.] Preserved and prospered him: so that he grew to be a man. Became an archer.] A skilful hunter and warrior also, with bow and arrows. Am. Marcellinus, lib. xiv, tells us, that these barbarians, who were of the posterity of Ishmael, never set their hands to the plough, but got their living, for the most part, by their bow. For such as they were themselves, such was their food (victus universus caro ferina, &c.), they all lived upon wild flesh, or venison, and such wild fowl as the wilderness afforded, with herbs and milk. Dr. Jackson observes, that he compares them to kites, ready to spy a prey, but so wild withal that they would not stay by it (as crows or other ravenous birds do by carrion), but presently fled with what they caught into their nests.

Ver. 21. Paran.] Which was near to Arabia: in Egyptian, which she had born unto Abraham, mockings.

10 Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac.

11 And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son.

12 And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called.

13 And also of the son of the bondwoman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed.

14 And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba.

section (Gal. iv. 29), which St. Jerome takes for hearing Isaac: who, perhaps, resentment his flouts, might say something that provoked Ishmael to strike him. And it is very probable his mother encouraged him to this, or maintained him in his insolence, which was the reason Sarah pressed to have them both turned out of doors.

Some think he jested upon his name, and made it a matter of merriment. For so the word is used, xix. 14.

Ver. 10. Cast out, &c.] Let them not dwell here any longer, nor continue a part of thy family.

Shall not be heir, &c.] She judged, by what she had seen of his fierce and violent spirit, that it would not be safe for her son to let Ishmael have any share in his father's inheritance: for she was afraid he would make himself master of all.

Ver. 11.] His wife is not here mentioned, because his principal concern was for his son; but it appears, by the next verse, he had some consideration of her also.

Ver. 12. God said unto Abraham, &c.] By this he was satisfied that Sarah's motion proceeded not merely from her anger; but from a Divine incitation.

For in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Here the blessing promised to Abraham's seed (xvii. 7, 8), is limited to the posterity of Isaac; and the meaning of the phrase is, they that descend from Isaac, and not they that descend from Ishmael, shall be owned by me for the children of Abraham; particularly the Messiah shall be one of his seed.

Ver. 13. Also of the son of the bondwoman, &c.] He renews the promise he had made him before (xviii. 20), that Ishmael should have a numerous posterity: because he was descended from Abraham.

Ver. 14. Rose up early.] Delayed not to fulfil the Divine will.

Took bread, and a bottle of water.] Which includes all sort of provision for their present necessity, till they came to the place unto which, in all probability, he directed them to bend their course. For it is not reasonable to think, that he sent them to seek their food, which as we speak without any care what became of them. It may seem strange rather, that he did not send a servant to attend them, but let Hagar carry the provision herself: which I suppose was done to humble her, and to show that her son was to have no portion of Abraham's inheritance, nor of his
And his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt.

22 ¶ And it came to pass at that time, that Abimelech and Phichol the chief captain of his host spake unto Abraham, saying, God is with thee in all that thou doest:

23 Now therefore swear unto me here by God that thou wilt not deal falsely with me, nor with my son, nor with my son's son: but according to the kindness that I have done unto thee, thou shalt do unto me, and to the land wherein thou hast sojourned.

24 And Abraham said, I will swear.

25 And Abraham reproved Abimelech because of a well of water, which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away.

26 And Abimelech said, I wot not who hath done this thing: neither didst thou tell me, neither yet heard I of it, but to day.

which country all the Oriental writers say the porternity of Ishmael lived: particularly Patrieides, who says he went into the land of Jathreb which is that part of Arabia, in which is the city of Beer-sheba.

A wife out of—Egypt.] Out of her own country, where she was best acquainted. The Jewish doctors say he had two wives, whose names, they tell us, were Aisach and Pathumah: the first of which received Abraham churlishly, when he went to visit his son; and therefore he put her away and took the other, who proved more civil, when he made a second journey thither. Which, though it looked like a fable, yet I think it not improbable that Abraham might go to see how his son lived, and that Ishmael might sometimes wait upon him (as the author of Schalsc, Hakab, and Pirke Eliezer affirm); for we cannot think they were so unnatural as never to have any correspondence: especially since we read that Ishmael, as well as Isaac, took care of Abraham's funeral, xxv. 9. After which, it is not improbable, Hagar might have another husband; which is the account Aben Ezra (upon Ps. lxxxiii. 6) gives of the people called Hagarenes, who are there mentioned as distinct from the Ishmaelites: they were, saith he, descended from Hagar by another husband, not by Abraham.

Ver. 23. Abimelech and Phichol, &c.] It is plain by this that Abraham still lived, if not in the country of Gerrar, yet very near it.

God is with thee in all that thou doest.] They saw him so thriving and prosperous, that they were afraid he might grow too strong for them, if he should have a mind to disturb them.

Ver. 23. Swear—thou wilt not deal falsely, &c.] That as there hath been a long friendship between me and thee, so thou wilt not violate it; but always preserve it, even when I am dead: according to thy frequent professions, and, perhaps, promises.

According to the kindness, &c.] Abimelech thought he might obtain it from Abraham, by virtue of the obligations he had laid upon him.

Ver. 24. I will swear.] He was as forward to confirm his promises as to make them.

Ver. 25.] But before he swear, he thought it necessary to settle a right understanding between them: and therefore argued with Abimelech (as it may be rendered) about a well of water digged by Abraham's servants, which Abimelech's had injuriously taken from him. This was wisdom to complain of wrongs now, before they entered into a covenant, that, they being redressed, there might remain no occasion of quarrels afterward.

27 And Abraham took sheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech; and both of them made a covenant.

28 And Abimelech set seven ewe lambs of the flock by themselves.

29 And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What mean these seven ewe lambs which thou hast set by themselves?

30 And he said, For these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witness unto me, that I have digged this well.

31 Wherefore he called that place Beer-sheba; because there they sware both of them.

32 Thus they made a covenant at Beer-sheba: then Abimelech rose up, and Phichol the chief captain of his host, and they returned into the land of the Philistines.

33 ¶ And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-

Ver. 26.] This is the first time I heard of it: if thou hadst complained before I would have done thee right.

Ver. 27.] Some think they were a present he made to Abimelech, in gratitude for what he had bestowed on him (xx. 11), or in token of friendship with him. But others think they were designed for sacrifices, by which they made a covenant one with another. At least some of them served for that use.

Ver. 28.] The meaning of this is afterwards explained, ver. 30. But though they were part of the present he made him, yet they should be understood also (being set apart from the rest) to be a purchase of a quiet possession of that well.

Ver. 30.] By this token it shall be remembered hereafter, that I digged this well, and that thou didst grant me quiet possession of it.

Ver. 31. Beer-sheba] The Hebrew word sheba signifies, both an oath, and also seven: perhaps for both reasons this place had this name. We are sure for the first, which is here mentioned: because they sware to each other.

Ver. 32. Thus they made a covenant, &c.] By giving and accepting those sheep and oxen, men-duenced ver. 24, and, perhaps, by offering sacrifices; or, at least, by eating and drinking together, as Isaac and Abimelech did in aftertimes (xxvi. 30).

Here some observe, it was not unlawful, by the law of nature, to make covenants with infidels and idolaters, for mutual defence and commerce, or such-like reasons; but I see no proof that Abimelech was such a person. In future ages the people of Canaan were so corrupted by this, as well as other sins, that God commanded them to be exterminated, and made it unlawful to enter into a covenant with them (Exod. xxxiv. 15). But as the Philistines were none of them, so it still remained lawful to make leagues with other gentiles who were not of the seven nations of Canaan, as we see by the examples of David, and Solomon, and others.

They returned into the land of the Philistines.] Into that part of the country where they dwelt; for both Abimelech and Abraham were now in that land, as appears from the last verse of this chapter.

Ver. 33. Abraham planted a grove] For a solemn and retired place wherein to worship God. For, as Servius says upon the ninth Ænied, Nunquam est mens sine religionis: "There never was a grove in ancient times, without religion." And therefore here we may well suppose Abraham built an altar, which was fenced and bounded with an enclosure, and shaded with trees, as Mr. Mede (Discourse xix.) observes their processions, or places of prayer, to have been in aftertimes. For, that this was intended for a place of prayer, appears by the following words—“and called there on the name of the Lord,” &c.

From hence, some think, the custom of planting groves was derived into all the gentile world, who so profaned them by images, and filthiness, and sacrifices to demons, that God commanded them, by the law of Moses, to be cut down. But Abraham made use of a grove before this (xii. 6, 8), where we find he built an altar on a mountain, which, I question not, was compassed with trees. (See xiii. 18.) Therefore I take this only to have been the first grove that he planted himself.

CHAPTER XXII.

1 Abraham is tempted to offer Isaac. 3 He giveth proof of his faith and obedience. 11 The angel stayeth him.

2 The generation of Nahor unto Rebekah.

1 And it came to pass after these things that God did tempt Abraham, and said unto him, Abraham: and he said, Behold, here I am.

2 And he said, Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of.

4 And Abraham sojourned in the Philistines' land many days.

Called there on the name of the Lord.] I find that Maimonides, in several places of his More Nevochim, translates the last words, The Lord God of the world, or the Lord the Almighty Creator of the world. For this was the great article of faith in those days, that God made the world (Par. ii. cap. 36, et par. iii. cap. 29).

Ver. 34. Many days, &c.] The word days often signifies years, and, it is likely, signifies so in this place: for here Isaac was born, and here he was weaned; and after that Abraham found so much friendship from Abimelech, and so many conveniences of life, that they invited him to stay a long time in this country.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1.] That which follows fell out while Abraham dwelt at Beer-sheba, or near it (ver. 19).

God did tempt Abraham.] Proved or tried his faith, in a very difficult instance. The Hebrews take great notice, that the name of Elohim (which they call, Nomen Judicij) is here used, as it is in several of the following verses.

And said unto him, Abraham:] I suppose there was such a visible appearance of the Divine Majesty to him as he had often seen (xv. 1, xviii. 1, xviii. 1).

Here I am.] A phrase expressing readiness to hear and to give answer (ver. 7, 12).

Ver. 2. Take, and lay it unto me.] Immediately.

Thy son:] A hard thing, had it been Ishmael.

Thy only son Isaac:] His only son by Sarah, and the child of the promise (xxi. 12).

Whom thou lovest.] Who was far dearest to him than any thing in this world: dearest than his own life: for men will venture that to preserve their children, According to an old saying in Euripides,

"Ανασι δ' ἀνθρώποις ἃρ ἄγεται κακιά.

"Children are to all mankind, their very life, or soul."

Whence it was that Pacatus Drepanius said in his panegyric to Theodosius the Great, Instituente natura plus iuris filios quam nemetsipso diligentius; “we are taught by nature to love our sons, in a manner more than ourselves.” But the love of God in Abraham was stronger than either.

Land of Moriah.] So it was called afterwards, from God’s appearing there (ver. 14) for the deliverance of Isaac, as many think. Certain it is, that the temple of Solomon was built upon Mount Moriah (2 Chron. iii. 1); but this name belonged not only to that mountain, but to all the mountains country thenceabouts, which is here called the land of Moriah. Which Aquila translates ἡμιαρία, “conspicuous;” for it is derived from the word ἀρία, to see. And the LXX. translate it not amiss, γῆν ἀειρέω, “high 34 And burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of.

3 ¶ And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose country;” which is very conspicuous. But Mount Zion, and Acra, and other neighbouring mountains, being also very high, this name of Moriah belonged to them, because they were very conspicuous. Insomuch that Mount Zion is often used in Scripture for Mount Moriah; for all that mountainous country went by one and the same name. And after him there.] The Hebrews observe the word is ambiguous, and may be translated, make him to go up; but Abraham understood it in the usual sense, that he should kill him, as they did the beasts for sacrifices. A very hard injunction, which some think God would not have laid upon Abraham, if he had not had a power thus to dispose of Isaac, inherent in him as his father. (See Dr. Taylor, Duct. Dubit. lib. iii. cap. 5, rule 2, n. 1.)

Upon one of the mountains] There were more hills than one thereabouts (Psalm cxxv. 2), as I observed on the foregoing verse. And it may be further here noted, that in ancient times they chose mountains, or high places, whereon to worship God, and offer sacrifices (xii. 8): which God himself approved of, till they were profaned, as the groves were (see xxii. 33), and then he commanded Abraham’s posterity not to worship in high places, but only in one certain mountain, where he ordered his temple to be seated. Nothing is plainer in the gentle writers, than that they chose mountains for places of worship: and herein Celsius, the Epicurean, compares them with the Jews; observing, particularly out of Herodotus, that the Persians offered sacrifices to Jupiter, going up, ἵκτι τα ἱεράτειαν τῶν ὄμοιοι, “to the top of the highest mountains,” as his words are in Orig. (lib. v. contra Cels.). It is well known, also, that these mountains were well shaded with trees; so that, houses, altars, and mountains are mentioned together, as places for religious worship.

Ver. 3. Abraham rose up early.] Some here take notice of the readiness of his obedience, in several instances.

First, That he rose up early. Secondly, Saddled up, and went unto the place of which God had told him.

4 Then on the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place afar off.

5 And Abraham said unto his young men, Abide ye here with the ass; and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you.

6 And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together.

7 And Isaac spake unto Abraham his father, his ass himself (though the phrase doth not certainly import so much). Thirdly, Carried wood ready cleft along with him, for the offering, lest he should find none there.

Isaac his son.] It is an inquiry among the Jews, how old Isaac was at this time. Some of them say seventy three years, whom the Arabic Christian writers follow, Patricides and Elmacinus. Aben Ezra, more probably, saith he was thirty. But there is no certainty of such things: for I find in the Genera Sanhedrim (cap. x. n. 4), it is said, this fell out a little after he was weaned (see ver. 9).

Went unto the place.] That is, toward the place; with which he did not see till the third day after he set out.

Ver. 4. On the third day.] It was not much above one day's journey from Beer-sheba to Moriah; but an ass goes slowly, especially being loaded, as this was, with a burden of wood, and with provisions, we must suppose, for their journey; and Abraham, and his son, and servants, went on foot, and could not travel far on a day (Isaac being but young), for it doth not appear they had more than one single ass (ver. 5).

Saw the place after.] It is most reasonable to suppose, that God had given him some token or sign, whereby he should know it. And I cannot but think it highly probable, that the Divine glory appeared in the place where he was to make the oblation. Which conjecture I find confirmed by R. Eliezer, among other of the Jews, who says, that when God bade him go to the place he would tell him of (ver. 2), and there offer his son; he asked how he should know it? and the answer was, "Wheresoever thou seest my glory, there I will stay, and will be for thee, &c." And accordingly, now, he beheld a pillar of fire reaching from heaven to the earth, and thereby knew this was the place. (See Pirke Eliezer, cap. 31.)

Ver. 5. Go yonder and worship.] This confirms the forementioned conjecture, that, the Divine glory appearing upon the mountain, he went thither to worship God.

Come again to you.] He either speaks of himself alone, or believed God would restore Isaac to life, though he did slay him.

Ver. 6. Laid it upon Isaac.] A figure of Christ, who carried his own cross (John xix. 17), according to the Roman custom. Philo's reflection upon Isaac's carrying the wood for his own sacrifice is, that "nothing is more laborious than piety." Ver. 7.] It appears, by this, that he had not hitherto acquainted Isaac with his intention.

Ver. 8.] It seems they stayed a while (as they were going together, ver. 6), till Isaac had finished this discourse with his father, and then they proceeded.

Ver. 9. Built an altar.] Of turf, some think; or of such stones as he could find.

Bound Isaac.] Both his hands and his feet, as it is explained in Pirke Eliezer (cap. 31). When the gentiles offered human sacrifices, they tied both their hands behind their backs, as appears from Ovid (lib. iii. de Pont. Eleg. 2), and other authors. Whether Isaac was thus bound, it matters not; but we cannot doubt that Abraham had now acquainted him with the will of God, and persuaded him willingly to comply with it. And he was more exactly, who laid down his life of himself, and no man (without his consent) could take it from him, as he speaks, John x. 17, 18. We have reason to believe this of Isaac, because he, being younger and stronger, could have made resistance, had he been so minded. Josephus says he was twenty-five years old (lib. i. Antiq. 14); and Bochart makes him twenty-eight: the word naaar, which we translate lad, being used for one of that age; nay, Joseph is called so when he was thirty years old (Hierozioc. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 9). This is certain, that he was old enough to carry such a load of wood (ver. 6), as was sufficient to make a fire to offer up a burnt-offering. There are those, also, who think Isaac was laid upon the altar to be offered, in that very place where Christ was crucified. And thus much is true, that though Mount Calvary was without Jerusalem, and therefore different from Mount Moriah, on which the temple stood, yet they were so near, and it is likely only parts of one and the same mountain, that they were anciently both comprehended under the name of Moriah.

Ver. 10.] His obedience proceeded so far that it evidently appeared he was fully resolved to do as he was bidden; for the knife was just at Isaac's throat, ready to do the execution. Insomuch that God made account of it, as if it had been actually done, and accepted him. Philo made mention of it, "as entirely perfect, and absolutely completed," as Philo speaks. And yet there have been those who disparage this obedience, by endeavouring to make the world believe that the sacrificing of children was in use before Abraham's time. And the very first thing that hath been alleged as a proof of it, is the very objection in Philo, made by cavilling calumniators (as he calls them), who said, why should such praise be bestowed on Abraham, δι' είκοσιοντον εκκατοφυρμάεος πολέμου, "as if he had attempted a thing altogether new, which private men, and kings, and whole nations, do upon occasion!" The learned reader cannot but know that one of our own countrymen (Sir J. Marsham, in Canon, Chronic. §v.) hath set this in the front of all his arguments, to prove that Abraham was not the first who sacrificed his son; without acquainting the reader with Philo's answer to this, which quite overthrows all his pretensions. For he says (lib. de Abrahamo, pp. 375, 376, edit. Paris), that some barbarians have done this, following the example of their countrymen, being in great distress, &c. But nothing of this nature could move Abraham to it, for the custom of sacrificing children

CHAPTER XXII.
11 And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I.
12 And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from me.
13 And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and beheld the Lamb of God, which was offered up for a sacrifice, instead of Isaac.

Nobody (that I know of) hath better explained this whole matter than Moses Maimonides, whose words are these (More Neovichim, par. ill. cap. 24): This story of Abraham makes good two great foundations of the law: 'one is, to show us how far the fear and love of God extends itself. For here was a command to do that, with which the loss of money, or of life itself, is not to be compared; nay, that from which nature abhorred; viz. that a man very rich, and in great authority, who earnestly desired an heir, which was born to him when he had no hope of one, in his old age, should so overcome his natural affection to him (which could not but be exceeding great), as to forego all the expectations he had from him, and consent, after a journey of three days, to slay this son with his own hands. This is the greatest thing that ever was performed: for if he had done it in that moment when he was commanded, it might have been his last act of love to his child; but to do it so many days after he received the command, upon mature deliberation, is the highest proof of his obedience, and that this act proceeded from nothing but from the fear and love of God: for he did not make haste to slay his son, out of any fright he was in lest God should have slain him, or taken away his estate, if he had disobeyed; but took time to consider of it, that he might show to all men what one ought to do for the love and fear of God, and not for fear of punishment, or hope of worldly reward: for the angel said, 'Now I know that thou fearest God.

The second thing we are taught by this history is, that the prophets were fully assured of the truth of those things which God spake to them, either in dreams, or in visions, or any other way; which they believed as strongly as things of sense. For if Abraham had in the least doubted whether this were the will of God or no, which he received either in a vision, or a dream, he would never have consented to a thing which nature cannot endure.

This very story is told by Alexander Polyhistor, as Eusebius relates out of him (lib. ix. Praepar. Evang. s. xiv.).

Ver. 13. Abraham lifted up his eyes.] From looking upon Isaac, or upon the angel.

Behold, behind him a ram, &c.] Bochart gives many reasons to prove that the most ancient reading, and much better, was, Behold, one ram: achar, which we translate behinda, being put for achad, one, or a single, one ram. But this is not material which way we take it; nor need we inquire how the ram came there. Nothing is more common than for sheep to go astray; and by God's providence this ram was caught in a thicket not far from Abraham; whereby he made good what Abraham had told his son, "God will provide a lamb for a burnt-offering." In which this ram was a notable type of Christ, who was a sacrifice provided by God, not by man, as this ram was brought by Divine Providence to be offered, not by Abraham.
looked, and behold behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt offering in the stead of his son.

14 And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh: as it is said to this day, In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen.

15 ¶ And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time,

16 And said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son:

17 That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies;

18 And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice.

19 So Abraham returned unto his young men, and they rose up and went together to Beer-sheba; and Abraham dwelt at Beer-sheba.

20 ¶ And it came to pass after these things, that it was told Abraham, saying, Behold, Milcah, she hath also born children unto thy brother Nahor;

21 Huz his firstborn, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram, 22 And Chesed, and Hazo, and Pildash, and Jidlaph, and Bethuel.

And the ram being accepted instead of his son, may be thought to signify that the offering of the blessed seed, God's only Son, should be suspended till future times, and that in the mean season the offering of the blood of beasts should serve as a pledge (to use the words of Mr. Mede) of that expiation which the blessed seed of Abraham should one day make (Dis- course xxv.), where he observes, that the more lively to express this, God so disposed, that the very place where the ram was offered, instead of Isaac, should be the place of sacrifice for Israel. For there it was, where the Lord answered David by fire from heaven (1 Chron. xxi. 36), and so designed it for the place he had chosen for his altar; where David pitched him a tabernacle (1 Chron. xxii. 1), and there Solomon built him a house (2 Chron. iii. 1).

And the Lord will see or provide: that is, take care of their safety who steadfastly obey him.

It is said to this day.] Which is thus called to this day: or, as others interpret it, now it is a proverbial speech when men are in great straits, "in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen:"

"in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen:"

where a double variation is observed, from what was said before: for here is Jehovah instead of Elohim (ver. 12), and then Jeruch instead of jireh; i.e. the passive instead of the active; signifying, that the Lord will not only see or provide, but make himself conspicuous by so providing, that all shall behold the care he takes of those that fear him.

Ver. 16.] This confirms what was noted on ver. 12, that it was God himself who called to Abraham to stay his hand, and now says, "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord," &c. What can be clearer, as Hacksan glosses (Disput. ii. de Nominibus Divinis, n. 16), than that we are to turn away our eyes from the angel, and fix them upon God, who blessed Abraham, and is called the Lord, for whose sake (ver. 12) Abraham spared his only son? for, therefore which exceed the angelical dignity, we are always to understand some such words as these here mentioned, Neum Jehovah, Thus saith the Lord.

Ver. 16.] I observed upon xii. 7, and xvii. 6, that God enlarged his mercies to Abraham, proportionably to his obedience; which is apparent in this great and last trial of all, the offering up his son, which was con- warded by the ratification of God's former promise or covenant, by a most solemn oath: By myself have I sworn, I will multiply thy seed, &c. This was promised before, but not confirmed by an oath: and besides, the very promise is now more affectionate (if I may so style it); "in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thee," &c. In the latter end also of the blessing, there seems to be couched the highest of all blessings, that God would make his own only Son such a sacrifice as Abraham was ready to have made his son Isaac: that "all the nations of the world (ver. 18), might be blessed in him;" i.e. all that would follow the faith of Abraham. So Abarbinel himself interprets it upon xii. 2.

Ver. 17. Possess the gate (that is, the cities) of his enemies.] And consequently their country: for the gates being taken, thereby they entered into their cities; and their cities being surrendered, the country was conquered.

Ver. 18. In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.] God promised to make Abraham's seed as numerous as the stars of heaven (xxv. 5); which promise he assures him here should be fulfilled in Isaac (ver. 17). But moreover directs him to expect, after the multiplying of his posterity, one particular seed who should bring a blessing to all mankind. This singularity St. Paul observes, and presses very much (Gal. iii. 16), applying it to the Messiah. And it is further observable, that there is an increase in sense in these words, as there is in the former. For he doth not simply say, verum, they shall be blessed, but verum, shall bless themselves, or count themselves blessed to him; to show, as Jacobus Altingius thinks, that this person should not stand in need of any blessing himself; but he is, as the rest of Abraham's seed did; but be the author of all blessings unto others, who should derive them from him alone (lib. ii. Schilbo. cap. 2).

Because thou hast obeyed, &c.] As a reward (the word in the Hebrew signifies) for obeying my voice.

Ver. 19.] Went together to Beer-sheba.] Where he had for some time settled his abode (xxi. 33).

Ver. 20.] The following genealogy is set down to show, whence Rebeckah the wife of Isaac was descended. For she alone, of all Bethuel's daughters (which is probable were many) is mentioned, ver. 23.

Ver. 21.] Huz his first-born.] There were two others of this name. One, the son of Aram (x. 23), another of the posterity of Esau (xvi. 28). But this Uz here mentioned, is he from whom Job descended; whose country was called Austis (so the LXX. translate Uz, Job i. 1), and his posterity called Austite by Pтолеми; who were a people of Arabia Deserta, near Gilead, near from Euphrates.

But] From whom came Eleliu the Buzite (Job xxxii. 2), a people in some part of the same country, or near it.

Aram.] Who inhabited, perhaps, some part of Syria which had the name of Aram from another, mentioned x. 23.

Ver. 22.] Chalder.] He was the father of the Chal- deans, who are called Chasdim in Scripture, from this Chessed, or Chasad, as some read it. Where the rest that follow settled, or whether they had any posterity or no, I cannot find. It is likely they never grew to make a nation or a family, and so left no name behind them.

Ver. 24. And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, she bare also Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahash, and Maachah.

was not the mistress of the family; but only taken for the increase of it, by procreation of children. Such wives were generally servants; whereas the prime wife was a free woman, or made so by being married to govern the family, and bring children to inherit the estate.

CHAPTER XXIII.

1 The age and death of Sarah. 2 The purchase of Machpelah, 19 where Sarah was buried.

1 And Sarah was an hundred and seven and twenty years old: these were the years of the life of Sarah.

2 And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.

3 ¶ And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying,

4 I am a stranger and a sojourner with you:

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1.] The whole verse may be thus translated, "And the years of the life of Sarah were (in the whole) a hundred and twenty and seven years:" it being usual with the Hebrews to repeat a word (as life is here) when they would signify any thing to be complete. And Sarah is the only woman whose entire age is set down in Scripture.

Ver. 2. Kirjath-arba; i. e. the city of Arba, who was a famous man among the Anakims (as we read, Josh. xiv. ult.), and either built this city, or made it the place of his residence; from whence it took his name.

It doth not appear when Abraham left Beer-sheba, and removed to this place.

The same is Hebron.] A very ancient city, as appears from Numb. xiii. 22. When it assumed this name, instead of Kirjath-arba, is not certain: but some conjecture it might be after Abraham purchased a burial place in this country. (See xxii. 18.)

Abraham came.] Some fancy he was in some other part of the country, when his wife died. And several of the Jews have a conceit, that he came from Mount Moriah (which is confuted by what we read, xxii. 19), where Sarah, hearing he was gone to sacrifice her son, died with grief. But Maimonides speaks better sense, when he says, Abraham came from his own tent, which was separate (as I noted before, xviii. 9), from his wife's: as appears further from xix. 67.

To mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.] The first relates to private sorrow; the other to the public, especially at the funeral solemnities; when they made great lamentation. After Abraham had performed the former, he made preparations for the latter; but what the rites of mourning were in those days we do not know. It is likely they shut themselves up from company, neglected the care of their bodies, abstained from their ordinary food: which, with many others, were the customs of Abraham's posterity; who made it a part of their religion to mourn for the dead.

Ver. 3. Abraham stood up from before his dead.] By give me a possession of a buryingplace with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight.

5 And the children of Heth answered Abraham, saying unto him,

6 Hear us, my lord: thou art a mighty prince among us: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead; none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre, but that thou mayest bury thy dead.

7 And Abraham stood up, and bowed himself that it seems to be apparent, that in Abraham's time they sat upon the ground while they mourned, as it is certain they did in future ages. In which posture they continued till they had satisfied natural affection, and the decent custom of the age and country where they lived. Then they rose up, as Abraham here did, to take care of the interment of his wife. Seven days, in after ages, were the common time of mourning: and for illustrious persons they mourned thirty days.

Spake unto the sons of Heth,] In whose country he now lived: concerning whom, see v. 15. By the sons are meant the principal persons of that nation.

Ver. 4. I am a stranger and a sojourner with you,] Though I am not a native of your country, yet I have lived long enough among you to be known to you.

Give me a possession of a buryingplace, &c.] I do not desire any large possessions among you, being but a sojourner; let me have only a place, which I may call my own, wherein to bury those of my family which die.

Ver. 5. The children (or sons) of Heth answered, &c.] By one of their body, who spoke in the name of the rest: as appears by the first words of the next verse, "Hear us, my lord:" in which form they were wont to address themselves to great men (ver. 11, 13, 15, 16).

Ver. 6. Thou art a mighty prince.] We have a great honour for thee.

In the choice of our sepulchres, &c.] Make choice of any one sepulchre; and nobody will deny to let thee have it. Every family (at least great ones) had their proper place for burial: which, I suppose, were sometimes so large, that they might spare others a part of them; or, of the ground wherein they were made.

Ver. 7. Abraham stood up.] It seems they had desired him to sit down among them, while they treated this business: which when they granted, he stood up to thank them.

Bowed himself.] The Hebrew word signifies the bowing of the body; and there are other words in that language proper to the bowing of the head, or of the knee.
to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth.

8 And he communed with them, saying, If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight; hear me, and entreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar,

9 That he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth he shall give it me for a possession of a burying-place amongst you.

10 And Ephron dwelt among the children of Heth: and Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth, even of all that went in at the gate of his city, saying, 11 Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the presence of the sons of my people give I it thee: bury thy dead.

12 And Abraham bowed down himself before the people of the land.

13 And he spake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, saying, But if thou wilt give it, I will pray thee, hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there.

14 And Ephron answered Abraham, saying unto him,

15 My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver; what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead.

16 And Abraham hearkened unto Ephron; and Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant.

17 ¶ And the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field, and the cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure.

18 Unto Abraham for a possession in the land of Canaan did Simon (or Ceramies) weigh down the silver, one hundred shekels by weight, after the weight of shekels which is among the Hebrews.

Ver. 17. Which was before Mamre.] Over against Mamre (see xiii. 18).

Ver. 18. Were made sure.] By a solemn contract, in a public assembly (ver. 11), where the money was tendered and accepted; and all there present desired to be witnesses to it.

Ver. 19. It is not likely that Ephron had ever buried any of his family here, but had only begun to make a vault in this field which Abraham bought of him, with all the trees therein (ver. 17); or, if it were finished, he sold it before he had made use of it. For we cannot think Abraham would lay his wife's body among those of the Hittites: but in a vacant place where he intended to be interred himself: as his family after him also were (cxxx. 30, 31).

Ver. 20. Were made sure.] He repeats this, which had been said, ver. 17, because now the purchase was more confirmed, by the laying Sarah's body in this place: it being a kind of taking actual possession of it.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Abraham sweareth his servant. 10 The servant's journey: 12 His prayer: 14 His sign. 15 Rebekah meeteth him, 18 fulfilleth his sign. 22 Rebekah receiveth jewels, 23 sheweth her kindred, 35 and inviteth him home. 26 The servant blesseth God. 28 Laban entertaineth him. 34 The servant sheweth his message. 50 Laban and Bethuel approve it. 58 Rebekah consenteth to go. 62 Isaac meeteth her.

1 And Abraham was old, and well stricken in age: and the Lord had blessed Abraham in all things.

2 And Abraham said unto his eldest servant.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. Abraham was old.] Some of the Hebrews, and Christian writers also, refer this to his wisdom; as the next words [well stricken in years] unto his age: nobody being called zaken (though far more aged) in the Holy Scripture till now: and therefore they translate it elder; which is the name of a wise man (see Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 14. p. 556. &c.). Certain it is, that Abraham was now a hundred and forty years old: for he was a hundred when Isaac was born (xxi. 5), and Isaac was forty when he married Rebekah (xxv. 20).

Ver. 2. Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house.] Or, rather, as the LXX. translate it, 'He said to his servant, the elder of his house:' that is, the steward, or governor of his family, as the Jews. Targum translates it (see Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 14. p. 550, and Dr. Hammond upon Acts xi. 35). All take this servant to have been Eliezer, mentioned xxv. 2.

Put—thy hand under my thigh.] Some will have this phrase to import no more than, Lift me up, that I may stand, and call God to witness. But Abraham, of his house, that ruled over all that he had, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: 3 And I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, no question, was now so vigorous as to be able to rise of himself: having many children after this. Others, therefore, follow the opinions of the Jewish doctors, which is this, in short: 'Before the giving of the law, the ancient fathers swore by the covenant of circumcision.' They are the words of R. Eliezer, in his Pirke, cap. 49. And it is not improbable, that this manner of swearing, by putting the hand under that part which was the subject of circumcision, had respect to the covenant God made with that family, and their right to accomplish the promise of the Messiah. But this was not a custom peculiar to Abraham’s family, for we find it among other eastern people: and therefore, it is likely, more ancient than circumcision. For which cause, Aben Ezra himself thinks putting the hand under the thigh was a token of subjection and homage done by a servant to his lord: he sitting, and the servant putting his hand under him. Groton imagines, that the sword hanging upon the thigh (Psalm xlv. 3), this was as much as to say, If I falsify, kill me. Which is very witty; but the other seems plainer, signifying as much as, I am under thy power, and ready to do what thou commandest.

Ver. 3. Sware the Lord.] It was not lawful to that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell: 4 But thou shalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac. 5 And the servant said unto him, Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest? 6 And Abraham said unto him, Beware thou that thou bring not my son thither again. 7 ¶ The Lord God of heaven, which took me from my father’s house, and from the land of my kindred, and which spake unto me, and that spake unto me, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this land; he shall send his angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence. 8 And if the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou shalt be clear from this my oath: only bring not my son thither again. 9 And the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his master, and swore to him concerning that matter. 10 ¶ And the servant took ten camels of the camels of his master, and departed; for all the goods of his master were in his hand: and he arose, and went to Mesopotamia, unto the city of Nahor. 11 And he made his camels to kneel down without the city by a well of water at the time of the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water. 12 And he said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, I pray thee, send me good speed this day, and shew kindness unto my master Abraham. 13 Behold, I stand here by the well of water; and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water:

angels: which Abraham’s servant takes particular notice of, ver. 40. Ver. 8.] If it fall out otherwise than I hope, thou hast done thy duty; if thou bring not my son into that country again. He speaks (both here and ver. 6), as if Isaac had once been there; because Abraham himself came from them; and his servant also, and a great many of his family (xii. 5), who, if Isaac went to settle there, must have gone with him, as part of his substance. Ver. 10. The servant took ten camels, &c.] Camels were of great use in those countries, as they are at this day: some of them being made for carriage of burdens: and others for swift travelling; which latter sort were called by a peculiar name, Sowados, dromedaris, as Salmasius observes in his Plinian. Exercit. p. 987. These, perhaps, were of that kind, for the greater expedition: like those we read of, 1 Sam. xxx. 17. 5 For all the goods of his master were in his hand.] He might choose what accommodations he pleased for his journey: having every thing belonging to his master at his command: who being a great person, it was fit his principal servant should be well attended (as it appears he was, ver. 32), especially when he went upon such an errand, as to court a wife for his master’s son. Most refer this to the presents he carried along with him; and R. Solomon will have it that he carried a writing with him under his master’s hand (an inventory we call it), specifying all his goods and riches, that they might know what a great match his son was.

City of Nahor.] Which was Nahor, from whence Abraham came (xi. 31), and to which Jacob went to find his kindred (xxviii. 10). How far it was thither we are not told: but the country were going to it; and Moses omits also whatsoever passed in the way, as not pertinent to his story. Ver. 11. Camels to kneel down] The posture wherein they rest themselves. Ver. 12.] He had observed the kindness of God to have been so great to Abraham, and Abraham to have shown so much kindness in his favour; that in confidence he would make good Abraham’s words (ver. 7, and 40), he not only begs he might have good success in his journey, but desires a sign of it to confirm his faith; and such a sign as was most apposite to denote the person that would make a good wife, by her courtesy, humility, condescension, hospitality, prompt and laborious charity; all which are included in what he desires and she did.

Ver. 15. It came to pass, before he had done speaking, &c.] This shows it was by a Divine suggestion that he made this prayer; which was answered immediately. Such is the divine goodness; or rather (to use the word of Horatius, upon occasion of many such instances), Sic cuiu parata et obissa solent Dei beneficia, ita ut preces nostras non tam sequantur, quam occupant anteceedant (par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 49), “So forward is God to bestow his benefits upon us, that they do not so much follow our prayers, as present and go before them.”

With her pitcher upon her shoulder.] Behold the simplicity, frugality, and industry of that age.

Ver. 20. Drew for all his camels. There were ten of them (ver. 10), and they are a very thirsty sort of creatures; and therefore she took a great deal of pains to serve him, who was but a stranger, in this manner. Which showed extraordinary goodness, and a most obliging disposition, which he might well be amazed, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 21.] He was so astonished at her kindness, readiness to do good, and laborious diligence, &c., and also at the providence of God in making things fall out so pat to his desires, that for the present he could not speak; having his mind employed in musing and observing every passage; whereby he might judge how to conclude whether this was the woman or no, whom God designed for his master’s son.

Ver. 22. The man took] Gave her, as the phrase is often used. But he first asked her whose daughter she was, as appears from ver. 47.

Golden earring.] Or rather (as the margin hath it) a jewel for the forehead. And so we translate the Hebrew word, Ezek. xvi. 12, and this person himself expounds it, ver. 47, “I put the earring (or jewel) upon her face,” i. e. her forehead. For such ornaments were used in these times and countries, hanging down between the eyebrows, over the nose.

Two bracelets for her hands.] i. e. Wristlets.

Ver. 26.] Gave solemn thanks to God for hearing his prayer: and acknowledged that by his providence he was conducted to the execution of his desires; as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 27. Mercy and his truth.] Mercy in promising, and truth in performing: or, “hast truly been merciful to him according to his promise” (ver. 7). See ver. 49.

The house of my master’s brethren.] i. e. His near kindred.

Ver. 28. Told them of her mother’s house.] The women in the eastern countries had their apartments by themselves; as was before observed, and appears again, ver. 67. This it was proper for Rebekah to go and acquaint her mother with what had passed.

Ver. 30. When he saw the earring, &c.] This was the reason why he ran to invite the man to their house.

He stood by the camels at the well.] Expecting to see the issue.

Ver. 31. Come in, thou blessed of the Lord.] Whom God favoureth, and I pray may still continue in his favour. For it refers both to the time past and future.
have prepared the house, and room for the camels.

32 And the man came into the house: and he ungirded his camels, and gave straw and provender for the camels, and water to wash his feet, and the men’s feet that were with him.

33 And there was set meat before him to eat: but he said, I will not eat, until I have told mine errand. And he said, Speak on.

34 And he said, I am Abraham’s servant.

35 And the Lord hath blessed my master greatly; and he is become great: and he hath given him flocks, and herds, and silver, and gold, and menservants, and maidservants, and camels, and asses.

36 And Sarah my master’s wife bare a son to my master when she was old: and unto him hath he given all that he hath.

37 And my master made me swear, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife to my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, in whose land I dwell:

38 But thou shalt go unto my father’s house, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son.

39 And I said unto my master, Peradventure he will not follow me.

40 And he said unto me, The Lord, before whom I walk, will send his angel with thee, and prosper thy way; and thou shalt take a wife for my son of my kindred, and of my father’s house:

41 Then shalt thou be clear from this my oath, when thou comest to my kindred; and if they give not thee one, thou shalt be clear from my oath.

42 And I came this day unto the well, and said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, if now thou do prosper my way which I go:

43 Behold, I stand by the well of water; and it shall come to pass, that when the virgin cometh forth to draw water, and I say to her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water of thy pitcher to drink; and she shall say, Let me give thee a draught, and let me give water to your camels also.

44 And she shall say, Thy servant Abraham sent me to meet thee;

45 And before I had done speaking in mine heart, behold, Rebekah came forth with her pitcher on her shoulder; and she went down unto the well, and drew water: and I said unto her, Let me drink, I pray thee.

46 And she made haste, and let down her pitcher from her shoulder, and said, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also:

47 And I drank, and she gave me water, and washed her feet, and did herself also.

48 And I set up the pitcher, and gave her water to drink: and I said, I am Abraham’s servant.

49 And she said, It is well: I consent: and I will be overareth before thee.

50 And I bowed down my head, and worshipped the Lord, and blessed the Lord God of my master Abraham, which had led me in the right way to take my master’s brother’s daughter unto his son.

51 And now if ye will dealt kindly with my master, tell me; and if not, tell me; that I may turn to the right hand, or to the left.

52 Then Laban and Bethuel answered and said, the thing proceedeth from the Lord: we cannot speak unto thee bad or good.

53 And it came to pass, that, when Abraham’s servant heard their words, he worshipped the Lord, bowing himself to the earth.

54 And the servant brought forth jewels of gold and silver, and raiment, and brought them out, and put them on his ass.”

Ver. 32.] As the custom was in those countries (see xviii. 4).

Ver. 33. [An excellent servant; who preferred his master’s interest to his own pleasure.

Ver. 35.] Enriched him exceedingly; so that he is become a person of great eminence (xxiii. 6).

Ver. 36. [Given all that he had.] Declared him his heir, and settled his whole estate upon him.

Ver. 40. [The Lord, before whom I walk.] Whom I worship and study to please; keeping a grateful remembrance of his benefits always in my mind.

For so Abraham’s own words are (ver. 7). “The God which brought me from my father’s house,” &c.

Ver. 41. [Then shall thou be clear from this my oath.] Or, curse, as the Hebrew word imports: for all oaths were made anciently with some imprecations upon themselves if they were falsely.

Ver. 42.] He doth not relate just the very words which he said; but the sense of them, and most of the words.

[Prosper my way which I go.] The design in which I am engaged.

Ver. 48. [My master’s brother’s daughter] The granddaughter of his brother Nahor.

Ver. 49. [If ye will deal kindly and truly.] Be really and sincerely kind.

[That I may turn to the right hand, or to the left.] A kind of proverbial speech; signifying, “that I may take some other course (which way God shall direct) to fulfil my master’s desire.” It is the fancy of some of the Hebrew doctors that he meant, he might turn either to the Ishmaelites, or the children of Lot.

Ver. 50. [Laban and Bethuel] The chief manager of this affair was Laban; for Bethuel is not mentioned till now; because, perhaps, he was old, and unfit for business: but consents to all that is desired.

[The thing proceedeth from the Lord.] It appears to be the Divine will and pleasure.

[We cannot speak unto thee bad or good.] No way contradict it.

Ver. 51. [Rebekah is before thee.] Is by us delivered to thee, to be disposed of according to thy desire; as the phrase is used, xx. 15.

As the Lord hath spoken.] Declared by those signs which thou hast related to us.

Ver. 52. [Worshipped the Lord—to the earth.] Gave the most humble thanks unto the Almighty God, for his goodness to him.

Ver. 53. [Gave also to her brother and to her mother] Here is no mention of the father; which hath made some think, as Josephus did, that the father was dead; and Bethuel, mentioned, ver. 50, was her younger brother. But I take it to be more likely, that her father being informed, had committed the care of his daughter to Laban and his wife: and so ap-silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah: he gave also to her brother and to her mother precious things. 54 And they did eat and drink, he and the men that were with him, and tarried all night; and they rose up in the morning, and he said, Send me away unto my master. 55 And her brother and her mother said, Let the damsel abide with us a few days, at the least ten; after that she shall go. 56 And he said unto them, Hinder me not, seeing the Lord hath prospered my way; send me away that I may go to my master. 57 And they said, We will call the damsel, and enquire at her mouth. 58 And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And she said, I will go. 59 And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse, and Abraham's servant, and his men.

peared no more than was just absolutely necessary, in this treaty of marriage; which was carried on principally by Laban, who is mentioned therefore before her mother.

Paraphrase:] Presents of great value. Ver. 55. Let the damsel abide with us a few days, at the least ten.] There is nothing more common in Scripture, than by days to express a year. And therefore we have exactly translated these words in the margin, a full year, or ten months (see iv. 3, Lev. xxv. 29; Isam. i. 3, compared with ver. 7, and 20). I say exactly translated, because the servant was in such haste to return to his master. But it was as fit for them to show their love to Rebekah, as it was for him to show his concern for his master. Besides, there was something of decency in it, the custom being in all countries, for her that was espoused to her husband, to stay some time with her parents, before the consummation of the marriage. And one would think the custom then was, for to keep her a year, or near it; which makes them desire she might stay at least ten months, that they might not depart too far from the common usage, and that she might have the longer time to fit herself with the usual nuptial ornaments. Thus Onkelos it is certain understood it, and the paraphrase of Uzzielides, and the Mauritian Jews, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 5.

Ver. 56. That I may go to my master.] Whom he would have to rejoice with him.

Ver. 57. Enquire at her mouth.] Let her resolve, how it shall be. St. Ambrose observes upon this passage, that they do not consult her about the marriage, "for that belonged to the judgment of the parents," but about the time of going to complete it. Upon which occasion he quotes the words of Hermione when she was courted by Orestes (in Euripides' Andromaches), which he thinks were taken from hence, Νυμφαίοι, μην ες ἱμαν Πατρή τος Μεθρήσας ἢς, ος ἔχει σύνες κατέφθικ. "My father will take care of my marriage: these things do not belong to my determination," lib. i. de Abrahamo Patriarcha, cap. ult.

Ver. 58. Will thou go with this man?] That is, presently, as he desires. For that she should be Isaac's wife was agreed already between them: and we are to suppose she had consented. The only question was, whether so soon as the man desired!

60 And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them.

61 And Rebekah arose, and her damsels, and they rode upon the camels, and followed the man: and the servant took Rebekah, and went his way.

62 And Isaac came from the way of the well Lahai-roi: for he dwelt in the south country.

63 And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the eventide: and he lifted up his eyes, and saw, and, behold, the camels were coming.

64 And Rebekah lifted up her eyes, and when she saw Isaac, she lighted off the camel.

65 For she had said unto the servant, What man is this that walketh in the field to meet us? And the servant had said, It is my master: therefore she took a vail, and covered herself.

66 And the servant told Isaac all things that he had done.

She said, I will go.] I agree to go, without any delay: which, no doubt, very much endeared her to Isaac.

Ver. 59. Her nurse.] Whose name was Deborah (xxxv. 8) who did not suckle her, perhaps, but was (as we speak) her dry-nurse: for whom, it is likely, she had a great affection. It being a piece of ancient piety and gratitude to keep such persons as long as they lived, who had taken care of them in their infancy. It is probable also she was remarkable for prudence, and other eminent qualities; or else Moses would search her by name, and her death and burial, had a place in his history (xxxv. 8).

Ver. 60. They blessed Rebekah, &c.] Her father and mother, with all the rest of their family and kindred, prayed God to make her exceeding fruitful: and to make her posterity victorious over their enemies; which were the great things they desired in those days. The Hebrews lock upon this (as Mr. Selden observes in the place before named on ver. 56) as an example of the solemn benediction, which was wont to be given (even before the law of Moses) when the spouse was espoused to her husband.

Thou art our sister.] Near cousin or kinswoman: for all that were near of kin called one another brothers and sisters.

Ver. 61. Her damsels.] Who waited upon her and were given as part of her portion.

Ver. 62. Well of Lahai-roi.] Mentioned xvi. 14. By which it appears that Abraham, after the death of Sarah, returned to live at Beer-sheba, or thereabouts; for that was nigh this well: and it is probable Abraham and Isaac were not parted.

Ver. 63.] The cool of the evening and solitude are great friends to meditation.

Ver. 64. She lighted off the camel.] As they always did who met any person whom they honoured.

Ver. 65. Took a vail.] Not only out of modesty, but in token of her subjection to him. Many will have this to have been a peculiar ornament belonging to a bride, called by the Romans fenum, by the Greeks ετερα, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 5. Whence those words of Ter- tumiab, de Velanid. Virgin. cap. 2. Etiam apud Ethiocos velatis (i. e. sponsos) ad virum ducentur: "Even among heathens brides are brought to their husbands with a veil over their faces."

Ver. 66.] How she had consented to be his wife.
CHAPTER XXV.

1 The sons of Abrahah by Kezurah. 5 The division of his goods. 7 His age, and death. 9 His burial. 17 His age, and death. 19 Isaac prayer for Rebekah, being barren. 22 The children strive in her womb. 24 The birth of Esau and Jacob. 27 Their difference. 29 Esau selleth his birthright.

CHAP. XXV.

1 Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Kezurah.
2 And she bare him Zimran, and Jokshan, and Medan, and Midian, and Ishbak, and Shuah.

3 And Jokshan begat Sheba, and Dedan. And the sons of Dedan were Asshurim, and Letushim, and Leummem.
4 And the sons of Midian; Ephah, and Jokshan.] Concerning whom I can find nothing but only this: that Theophanes, a chronographer, in the beginning of the ninth century, after he had treated of the Ishmaelites and Madianites (the latter of which came from one of Kezurah's children), and the parts of Arabia where Mahomet was born, immediately adds, that there were other people, i.e. Pagans, more in the bowels of Arabia, descended from Jec- tan, called Amnian, that is, Hecatae. Perhaps it should be written Joedan, not Jecatan: for Philo- torgius expressly says of the Homers, "Εστι βίο το ἱερὸς των εἰς Χειρομοίας &c., 'That they are one of the nations descended from Kezurah and Abraham," lib. iii. Hist. Eccles. § 4, where he relates a famous embassy which Constantius sent to them to win them to Christianity, and the good success of it. And there is this strong proof of their descent from some of Abraham's family, that they retained the rite of circumcision, even when they were idolaters. For he says expressly, "that it was a circumcised nation," κατά τὴν ὄδοιον περιτομομαίης ὁμοιόμοιος, "and circumcised also on the eighth day." Which was the custom of all the Arabians, if we may believe Josephus (lib. i. Antiq. cap. 27), and Eusebius in Hexaemeron, &c., where, the Arabians, who were still called Tribus, were thirty-three years old before they were circumcised.

Medan.] From whom the country called Made-ania, in the southern part of Arabia Felix, it is likely had its name.

Midian.] From whom Midianitis, in Arabia Per- trea, had its denomination.

Ver. 1. Abraham took a wife.] Sarah being dead, and Hagar long ago sent away, and his son Isaac lately married, he wanted a companion in his old age. For, having given up Sarah's tent unto Rebekah (xxiv. ult.), it is probable he gave up his own to Isaac, and so dwelt in a tent by himself, where he found it necessary to have a wife to look after his family.

Her name was Kezurah.] We are not told what family she was of; but it is not unlikely she had been born and bred in his own house, as Eliezer his steward was; and, perhaps, was chief among the women, as he among the menservants. Many of the Jews will have her to be Hagar, whom (Sarah, who was the cause of her expulsion, being dead) he now received again. So the Jerusalem paraphrase, and Jonathan also: but Aben Ezra confutes this opinion with good reason; for no account can be given of Abraham's having more concubines than one (ver. 6), unless we make Kezurah distinct from Hagar. Nor can anybody tell why he should call Hagar by the name of Kezurah here, when he calls her by her own name there (ver. 12).

Ver. 2. She bare him.] He was now a hundred and forty years old: but so vigorous as to beget many children. Which need not seem strange, considering the age to which they then lived (for he lived thirty-five years after this marriage, ver. 7), and that now, in our time, men have had children after they have been seventy, nay eighty years of age.

To the truth also of this history we have the testimony of pagan writers. For Alexander Polyhistor (mentioned by Josephus, and by Eusebius, lib. ix. Prepar. Evang. cap. 20) tells us, that Cleomedes (called by some Malchus) writing the history of the Jews, reports just as Moses doth, Ὄντι εἰς Χειρομοίας Ἀραμέων ἔγενετο πάθες ἱεροῦ: "That Abraham had a good many children by Kezurah;" three of which he mentions by name.

Zimran.] This son of his, with all the rest of his brethren, was sent by Abraham into the east country (as we read, ver. 6), and therefore we must seek for them in those parts; viz. in Arabia, and the countries thereabout, where some footsteps of them have remained for many ages, particularly of Zimran; from whom we may well think the Zamarani were descended, a people mentioned by Pliny, with their towns in Arabia Felix (lib. vi. cap. 28.)

Ver. 3. Jokshan begat Sheba.] I observed before upon x. 7, that there are four of this name, or near it, all comprehended by the Greek and Roman writers under the name of Sabaens. One of them, the son of Ramah had a brother called Dedan, as this Sheba here hath. But they were the fathers of a distinct people, as is evident from the Scripture story, and Epher, and Hanoch, and Abidah, and Eldaah. All these were the children of Keturah.

5 ¶ And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac.

6 But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and from other authors. For, besides the Sabaei in the furthermost parts of Arabia, near the Persian and the Red Sea, there were also a people of that name (descended, it is very probable, from this Sem of Cushan), in the very entrance of Arabia Felix, as Strabo tells us; who says that they and the Nabatei were the very next people to Syria; and were wont to make excursions upon their neighbours. By which we may understand (which otherwise could not be mastered) that Cushans broke into Jacob's country, and carried away his cattle. For it is not medi-ble they could come so far as from the Persian or Arabian Sea; but from this country there was an easy passage through the deserts of Arabia, into the land of Uz or Aushit, which lay upon the borders of Ephrates (see Bochart in his Phægus, lib. iv. cap. 9).

Dedan.] There was one of this name (as I said before, see Bochall) who gave his son, whom he called Dedan, to a name to a city upon the Persian sea, now called Dedan. But besides that, there was an inland city, called Dedan, in the country of Idumea, mentioned by Jeremiah (xxv. 23, xlix. 5), whose inhabitants are called Dedanim (Isa. xxx. 13). And this Dedan, here mentioned, may well be thought to be the founder of it, as the same Bochart observes, (de cap. 6.

The sons of Dedan were Asshurin, and Letushim, and Lemunim.] If these were heads of nations, or families, the memory of them is lost. For it is a mistake of Cleodemus (who mentions the first of these in Euseb. Praepar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 20), to derive the Assyrians from this Asshurium; they having their original from Asshur, one of the sons of Shem (x. 22).

Ver. 4. The sons of Midian; Epher.] The birth and long time of Epher, the eldest son of Midian, continued a long time; for these two are mentioned by Isaac, as near neighbours (ix. 6). And not only Josephus, Eusebius, and St. Jerome, but the Nubianisian geographer also, tells us of a city called Madian, in the shore of the Red Sea; which is called Epher, in the province of Midian. nay, Epher, or Ephrath, as it is here called, is the same with that place the Greeks call Τεθρατ, and Ptolemy mentions both a mountain and a village of this name on the same shore, a little below Madiane, which is the Madian here mentioned, as Bochall observes in his Hierozol. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 3.

Epher.] I can find no remainers of his family, unless it be among the Homerites mentioned before, whose metropolis was called Τεθρατος; in which Theophilus (sent by Constantius to convert that country) built a church, as Philostorgius relates (lib. iii. Hist. Ecles. § 4). Which city is mentioned by many other authors, as Jacobus Golofredus observes in his Dissertations upon Philostorgius; particularly by Armacius, in his Persius of the Red Sea, where he calls the metropolis of the Homerites expressly by the name of Αρατα, which one cannot well doubt came from this Epher.

Hanoch.] In that part of Arabia Felix where the Adriatics were sent, there was a great trading town called Cane, as Ptolemy tells us, and shows its situation from Alexan. πόλις, κενω κυρίων και άνθρωπων (lib. viii.). Pliny also mentions a country in Arabia, which he calls Regio Canauma; which may be thought to have taken its name from this person and his posterity.

Abidah.] The relics of this name remain (if the two last syllables, as is usual, be inverted) in the people called Δεδᾶος, or Δεδᾶς, which lay between Arabia and India, and was inhabited by authors said to belong sometimes to the one, and sometimes to the other. Philostorgius saith only they bare the name of Indians (in the place before named, where he saith, Theophilus, who was sent to convert the Homerites, was born here). But Pliny, reckoning up the tracts of Arabia, places the isle called Decade (which I take to be this) over against the concubines, because of a surname of Codonius (lib. cap. 28). And Strabo (as Gothafoed observes), Agrariades, and others call it Διασα.

Eldaah.] I know not where to find any remains of this name, unless it be in the city Elana (which might easily be formed from Eldaah, by leaving out the daleth, and turning the ain into nun, than which nothing is more probable). This Elane, I suppose, the Arabians, toward the east, called others Alana (Elana), from whence the Sinus itself was called Elanites, and the people that lived in it Elanites, as Salmasius shows out of many authors (Exercit. in Solinum, p. 183).

Ver. 5. Give all— to Isaac.] As he designed long before (cap. ii. 12, note 2, cap. 3.

Ver. 6. Sons of the concubines.] Which were Hagar and Keturah, who were wives, but of an inferior sort, according to the manner of those times and countries. Keturah is expressly called his concubine, 1 Chron. i. 32, as she is above (ver. 1 of this chap.) called his wife. Which R. Bochall (in Mr. Selden, cap. iii. de Successionibus) thus explains: 'She was not the concubine, because of a serf condition; but his wife, because married with covenants, to provide for her and her children; though they were not to heir his estate. The Talmudists, indeed, do not perfectly agree in this matter; for, though they all agree (and prove it evidently) that they were real wives, yet some say they were made so only by covenant especially the same as he before writing, as the principal wives had: others think they had a writing also, but not with such conditions as the principal wives enjoyed. Arabinel hath an accurate discourse about this, which Buxtorf hath translated into his book De Sponsalibus, n. 17. And see also Mr. Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Cap. 7. p. 570, &c. and G. Schickard, de Jure Regico, cap. 3. p. 70. Give gifts.] Some portion of his money, or movable goods; or, perhaps, of both; which, in all probability, he gave to Ishmael, as well as to these sons (though it be not mentioned, Gen. xxi. 14), because Moses here saith, he gave gifts to the sons of his concubines; of which Hagar was one.

Unto the east country.] Into Arabia and the adjacent countries, which was said before. For the Midian-} ites are called the 'children of the east," in Judg. vi. 3, 33, vii. 12, viii. 10.

Ver. 7.] This is spoken by anticipation (to finish the story of Abraham), for Esau and Jacob were born before he died, and were now fifteen years old. For Isaac was but sixty years old when they were born (ver. 26), and seventy-five when Abraham died; who was a hundred years old at Isaac's birth, and lived to the age of one hundred seventy and five.

Ver. 8. Abraham gave up the ghost.] Died of no disease, but old age.
in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people.

9 And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron the son of Zohar, the Hittite, which is before Mamre;

10 The field which Abraham purchased of the sons of Heth: there was Abraham buried, and Sarah his wife.

11 ¶ And it came to pass after the death of Abraham, that God blessed his son Isaac; and Isaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi.

12 ¶ Now these are the generations of Ishmael, Abraham’s son, whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah’s handmaid, bare unto Abraham:

13 And these are the names of the sons of Ishmael, by their names, according to their generations: the firstborn of Ishmael, Nebajoth; and Kedar, and Adbeel, and Mibsam,

14 And Mishma, and Dunah, and Massa,

15 Hadar, and Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah:

16 These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names, by their towns, and by their castles; twelve princes according to their nations.

In a good old age,] Without pain or sickness.

Full of years;] The Hebrew hath only the word full; we add years to make up the sense; which some think rather to be this, that he was satisfied, and had enough of this world, desiring to live no longer. Like that expression in Seneca (epist. lxi.), “Vixi, Lucili charissime, quantum sat est mortem plenum expecto.”

Gathered to his people.] It doth not relate to his body, which was not buried with them; and therefore must relate to his soul, which is supposed by this still to live in that place where his pious forefathers were gone. Or else it is a Hebrew idiom, signifying no more than this, that he left this world as all his fathers had done before him.

Ver. 9. His sons, Isaac and Ishmael, &c.] By this it appears that Isaac and Ishmael were not strangers one to another. Nay, some of the orientals tell us that Abraham went to see Ishmael at his house, and that Ishmael came to see him after he was sent away; which is not at all improbable; for no doubt Abraham provided for him suitable to the condition of his birth: and Ishmael could not but be convinced that the inheritance of his father belonged of right to Isaac, who was the son of a freewoman, and he only of a bondwoman. Nor could he well be ignorant that Isaac was to be heir of Abraham’s estate, by God’s designation.

In the field of Ephron, &c.] See xxiii. 17.

Ver. 11. Isaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi.] He continued, after Abraham’s death, his former habitation, which he had when he married (xxiv. 62).

Ver. 12. Having mentioned the blessing of God which went along with Isaac after his father’s death (in the foregoing verse), he takes this occasion to show, that God was not unmindful of his promise made to Abraham concerning Ishmael also (xvii. 21).

Ver. 13. Nebajoth:] As he was the firstborn of Ishmael, so his posterity gave the denomination to the whole country of Arabia Petraea (in the best part of which, see ver. 3, they inhabited), which Pliny, Strabo, and Ptolemy, call Nabataeae; and sometimes other authors call Nabathaeus; as the inhabitants were called Nabathaei or Nabathaei, by the Chaldee language, and Nabatheans, by their own name, in which language, Nabatea is the Greek name for another country, near Petraea.

Ver. 14. Kedar:] And this name also was so famous, that some authors call the whole country Kedar. For the language of Kedar is the Arabian language; and when David complains that he had dwelt long in the tents of Kedar,” the Chaldee expounds it, “in the dwelling of the Arabians.” But those Arabians called Scenitae were properly the people of Kedar: and yet not all the Scenites (i.e. all the Arabians who call themselves Kedar) are those only who dwelt in Arabia Petraea. For there were divers kinds of them (all called Scenitae), some near Euphrates, others in Arabia Felix, &c. as Salmasius shows in his Pin. Excercit. p. 484. Some take them to be the same with those whom Ptolemy calls Pharanite: for what the Psalmist calls dwelling among the tents of Kedar,” is called (1 Sam. xxv. 1) “dwelling in the wilderness of Paran.” Pliny says, Pharanitis bordered upon the Arabs (in “ora contermina gentis Arabiae”), and so later writers make Pharath and Arabia Petraea to be near neighbours, as the same Salmasius shows, p. 485.

Ver. 14. Dunah.] He seems, by Isaiah xxii. 11, to have been seated near Idumea.

Ver. 15. Kedar; some think the Athrites in Arabia Felix came from him. In which, likewise, there was a city called Tema, from the next son of Ishmael: and Jetur, the next son to him, may well be thought to have been the father of the Iturai in Cælo-Syria: and Kedemah, the last of his sons, to have dwelt near his brother Kedar. For so Jacobus Capellius expounds these words (Jer. xlix. 28). “Go to the tents of Kedar, and spoil the men of Kedem” (which we translate “the men of the east”). And there are some other people in those countries, whose names sound something like the rest of the sons of Ishmael, but not so like as these I have mentioned: which makes me omit all further search after them, enough having been said to show the truth of this account which Moses gives us of Ishmael’s posterity.

Ver. 16. These are their names, by their towns;] Though some of them dwelt in tents (and thence were called Scenite Arabes), yet they did not live so scatteringly, but pitched them together and made a town.

Their castles;] They had even then places of defence; which may make it probable, that they had also walled towns, to which they resorted from their tents in the fields, when they were in any danger (Isa. xlii. 11). For it must be here noted, that as there were divers people of this name of Scenite Arabes; so there was this difference among them (as Salmasius observes in the forenamed place), that some of them were Nomades, who wandered from place to 17 And these are the years of the life of Ishmael, an hundred and thirty and seven years: and he gave up the ghost and died; and was gathered unto his people.

18 And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria: and he died in the presence of all his brethren.

19 ¶ And these are the generations of Isaac, Abraham's son: Abraham begat Isaac:

place; others of them were not. Particularly the Sabaeans Sceinte, and most of the rest, dwell in tents, but were fixed in their habitations, and did not remove; and another tribe, which was called in Mesopotamia did, who were both Sceinte, and also Nomades. They, therefore, who were settled in tents, as the sons of Ishmael were, had reason to build fortresses for the security of their slender habitations.

Twelve princes according to their nations.] Or, rather (as Dr. Jackson well glosses, book i. on the Creed, cap. 25), twelve heads of so many national houses, or tribes, or clans. Which kind of government they continued till four hundred years after Christ, and is better expressed by heathen writers than by many Christian interpreters, when they call them "rulers of their tribes," as Strabo speaks (lib. xvi.), in his description of Syria. And so the later writers speak of the Sarmaces (who were the same people formerly called Sceinte Arabes), as the governors which they called Phylarchi Saracenorum, as may be seen in Sextus Rufus and Jornandes. See Salmas.

Ver. 17. Gathered unto his people.] The same phrase being used here of the death of Ishmael, that was (vers. 30) of Abraham; the mean of the former is no more, but that they left the world as others had done before them. We do not read where Ishmael was buried: it is likely in his own country, not in the cave of Machpelah; for that had been to give his posterity a claim to a share in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 18. They dwell from Havilah unto Shur, &c.] See Gen. x. 7. Josephus (lib. i. Antiq. cap. 12), makes the bounds of the country which the Hebrews inhabited no more, but that they left the world as others had done before them. We do not read where Ishmael was buried: it is likely in his own country, not in the cave of Machpelah; for that had been to give his posterity a claim to a share in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 19. As thou goest toward Assyria: The wilderness of Shur was over-against Egypt, and touched it in that part by which the way lay from Egypt to Assyria. Or, as some understand the whole verse, "The sons of Ishmael dwelt from Shur, which is towards Egypt, unto Havilah, which is towards Assyria, in the way from Egypt thither."

He died (Heb. fell) in the presence of all his brethren. Of all his relations or kindred, which are called brethren in Scripture. But his death has been spoken of before; and in this verse mention being made only of the situation of his country, some interpret it in this manner, "His lot fell, i. e. he had his portion in the presence of all his brethren, according to the promise made to his mother (xvi. 12), the children of Keturah being on the west, that he should live there; and then he lived twenty years with his uncle Laban, was upon that account called a Syrian, though born in Canaan (Deut. xxvi. 5)."

Ver. 19. His principal design being to give an account of those descended from Abraham by Isaac; Moses returns to that, after a short account of his other progeny.

Ver. 20. The Syrian of Padan-aram, &c.] Bethuel and Laban are called Aramites, or Syrians, not because they were of that nation, but because they lived in the country of Aram, or Syria, that is, in Padan-aram; as it is here expressed, and appears more fully from Rebekah's discourse with her son Jacob, when he sent him with a present to Laban, the son of Rebekah's brother, who dwelt twenty years with his uncle Laban, was upon that account called a Syrian, though born in Canaan (Deut. xxvi. 5).

Padan-aram was a part of Mesopotamia. I say a part of it, for Mesopotamia itself was called Aram-Naharaim, that part of Syria (for there were many parts of it then called Aram). The same part, however, that was spoken of here, i. e. the country between the Euphrates and Tigris. Which country had two parts also; one toward the north, from the mountains of Armenia to the river Chaboras, i. e. Araxes, (from whence Balaam seems to have been fetched, Numb. xxii. 7), which was exceeding fruitful, and upon that account called Padan, which signifies in Arabic the same that Sela doth in Hebrew, i. e. a field. And therefore what Moses calls going to Padan-aram (Gen. xxv. 2), the prophet Hosea calls fleeing to Sela-Aram, into the country or field of Syria (Hosea xii. 12), this being a cultivated country, abounding with all the plenty. The other part of Mesopotamia was southerly, from the aforesaid river unto Babylon; and was very stony and barren. The Syrians lived in the former, and the Arabians in the latter, as Bochart observes (lib. ii. Phalag, cap. 6).

Ver. 21. Isaac intreated, &c.] The Hebrew word atar doth not signify barely to entreat, or pray, but to beseech with earnestness, vehemence, and importunity. It is most likely he continued these importunate prayers several years; the desire of seeing the Messiah making them very uneasy under barrenness; and some of the Hebrews fancy, that she remaining barren twenty years, Isaac at last carried her with him to Mount Moriah (where he should have been offered), and there made most fervent supplications for a son; as if he would remember God of the promise he had there made him, that he would multiply Abraham's seed as the stars of heaven (xxii. 17).

Ver. 22. The children struggled together within her.] Some time before her delivery (ver. 24) she felt as if two were wrestling together in her womb; and put her into pangs, by striving which should get out first. If it be so, why am I thus?] If I cannot be delivered, why did I conceive? She went!] The struggling and pangs, we must sup-
And the Lord said unto her, Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger.

And when her days to be delivered were fulfilled, behold, there were twins in her womb. And the first came out red, all over like an hairy garment; and they called his name Esau. And after that came his brother out, and his hand took hold on Esau's heel; and his name was called Jacob: and Isaac was three-score years old when she bare them.

And the boys grew: and Esau was a pose, ceased for some time; so that she was able to go and consult the Divine Majesty about this unusual contest.

To enquire of the Lord. There were some places where the Divine Majesty used to appear, which was the settled place of worship (see iv. 3). Maimonides will have it, that she went to the school of Sem, or Heber, who were prophets, to desire them to consult the question about her case (Moreh Nevuchim, par. ii. cap. 41). And it is very probable, that there was some divinely inspired person attending the Shechinah, whosoever it was; such as Melchizedek was at Salem. Whom Patriarchs took to have been the person to whom Rebekah resorted, for resolution of her doubt.

The Lord said unto her. By Melchizedek, saith the forenamed Patriarchs; By an angel, saith Maimonides: who tells us (in the place now mentioned) their masters are so settled in their opinion that she went to inquire of the forenamed prophets, and that by the Lord is meant his angel, that they will have Heber to be him that gave the answer (for prophets, say they, are sometimes called angels), or the angel that spake to Heber in this prophecy; but it is most reasonable to think, that the Lord spake to her by an angel, from the Shechinah.

Two nations are in thy womb. The heads of two nations.

Two manner of people shall be separated. Greatly differing in their dispositions, manners, course of life, and country; which will make them perpetually disagree.

From thy bowels. Shall issue from thee. The elder shall serve the younger. In his posterity, not in his own person.

Ver. 24. When her days to be delivered were fulfilled. This demonstrates the time of her delivery was not come when the struggling first began.

Ver. 25. Red, all over. Some will have it with red hair, not only on his head, but all over his body.

Like a hairy garment. As rough as hair-cloth; just as the poets describe satyrs. He was hirsutus; not only hairy all over, but those hairs as stiff as bristles; arguing great strength of body, and a rough, fierce temper.

They called his name Esau. Which signifying made in Hebrew, this is commonly taken for the reason of his name, that he was as full of hairs when he was born as others are at man's estate. But I think it may as well denote his active genius, which they thought this presaged.

Ver. 26. Jacob. He certainly had his name from his taking his brother by the heel at his birth; as if he would supplant him, as he afterwards did.

Was three-score years old. God exercised Isaac's faith and patience (just as he had done Abraham's) for the space of twenty years, before he gave him a cunning hunter, a man of the field; and Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents.

And Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison: but Rebekah loved Jacob.

And Jacob said pottage: and Esau came from the field, and he was faint:

And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage; for I am faint: therefore was his name called Edom.

And Jacob said, Sell me this day thy birthright.

And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die: and what profit shall this birthright do to me?

Ver. 27. Cunning hunter. Had great skill in hunting, in which his active genius delighted.

Man of the field. That took pleasure to be abroad, pursued wild beasts, in woods and mountains; where afterwards he had his habitation.

Plain man, dwelling in tents. He loved not violent exercise, but was to be seen abroad, and looked after the flocks of sheep, and the breed of cattle.

Ver. 28. Isaac loved Esau, &c. Not only because he was his first-born, and because his love of hunting argued him to be a man of great activity and valour, who was likely to prove a great person, but because he also took care frequently to entertain his father with venison (which was of divers sorts), and afforded him such variety at his table, as gave his father frequent occasion to commend him.

But Rebekah loved Jacob. Being a man of a more meek and quiet temper, suitable to her own disposition, and more at home also with her than Esau was, and designed by God to inherit the promise (ver. 25), It is likely Esau made great court (as we speak) to his father, and Jacob to his mother; whereby they won their affection.

Ver. 29. He was faint. With too violent and long pursuit of his sports.

Ver. 30. Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red, &c. It was made of lentils, as we learn from the last verse of this chapter. And St. Austin, upon Ps. cvii. (saith the commentators), speaks of it as a kind of venison.

Ver. 31. Sell me this day thy birthright. The eldest son had several privileges belonging to him above the rest: the chief of which was to have a double portion of his father's estate. As for the right of priesthood, there are many reasons to prove it did not belong thereunto. But whatsoever they were, Jacob cunningly made an advantage of Esan's necessity, to purchase them all for a small matter. In which some think he did not amiss: about which I shall not dispute.

Ver. 32. He speaks very slightly, if not contemptuously of it: preferring the present satisfaction of his appetite, before his future dignity and greatness. For some are of opinion he pretended to be fainter 33 And Jacob said, Swear to me this day; and he swear unto him: and he sold his birthright unto Jacob.

34 Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage for his soul; for he was very hungry.

Ver. 33. Swear to me this day:] That I shall peaceably enjoy the prerogative of the birthright.

Esau seems to have been very quick at all things; and to have pursued this as eagerly as he did his sports: Jacob, on the contrary, very sedate and crafty to make the best use of the opportunities he met with to promote his ends.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 And there was a famine in the land, beside the first famine that was in the days of Abraham. And Isaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philistines unto Gerar.

2 And the Lord appeared unto him, and said, Go not down into Egypt; dwell in the land which I shall tell thee of:

3 Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father;

4 And I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed;

5 Because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws.

6 ¶ And Isaac dwelt in Gerar:

Ver. 34. Rose up, and went his way:] Well satisfied, and without any trouble for what he had done. Which the apostle censures as a piece of profaneness: parents being wont to give a special blessing to their first-born.

Despised his birthright.] He thought, perhaps, he could recover that by force which he had lost by his brother's craft.
7 And the men of the place asked him of his wife; and he said, She is my sister: for he feared to say, She is my wife; lest, said he, the men of the place should kill me for Rebekah; because she was fair to look upon.

8 And it came to pass, when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philistines looked out at a window, and saw, and, behold, Isaac was sporting with Rebekah his wife.

9 And Abimelech called Isaac, and said, Behold, of a surety she is thy wife: and how saist thou, She is my sister? And Isaac said unto him, Because I said, Lest I die for her.

10 And Abimelech said, What is this thou hast done unto us? one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife, and thou shouldst have brought guiltiness upon us.

11 And Abimelech charged all his people, saying, He that toucheth this man or his wife shall surely be put to death.

12 Then Isaac sowed in that land, and received in the same year an hundredfold: and the Lord blessed him:

13 And the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great:

14 For he had possession of flocks, and possession of herds, and great store of servants: and the Philistines envied him.

15 For all the wells which his father's servants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, the Philistines had stopped them, and filled them with earth.

16 And Abimelech said unto Isaac, Go from us: for thou art much mightier than we.

17 ¶ And Isaac departed thence, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there.

18 And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them.

The same of that country Byzacium: insomuch that Becharius fancies the metropolis of that rich country, viz. Atrimetum, had its name from hence; signifying in the Phoenician language, as much as, the region of a hundredfold (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 24). Nay, some places in Africa were so rich, that they produced two hundred, yea, three hundred-fold, as he shows out of several good authors in the twenty-fifth chapter of that book. Whence he thinks Africa had its name; being as much as Ecoroxys, terrâ spicarum, "a land of ears of corn." All which I have noted; that this passage may not seem incredible to any reader.

The Lord blessed him.] Or, for the Lord blessed him. This is the reason of the fruitfulness of that soil; which naturally would not have yielded so much.

19. 15. I suppose he had many such fruitful years: so that his riches increased till he grew very great, and bought more cattle than he had before. For in them consisted the ancient riches, as Servius tells us on the first of Virgil's Eclogues. "Omne patrimonium apud majores peculium debeat, a pecorum; in quibus universa eorum substantia constabat. Unde etiam pecunia dictus fuit, a peculo." The same also we find said by Columella.

19. Great store.] The margin hath, store of husbandry. Which is very likely; because he was encouraged in it by his great crops: which could not likewise but increase the number of his servants. The Arabic set forth by Erpenius hath only, a great revenue; or vast increase; which, among the eastern people, as I said, was principally from their cattle. But God blessed him with abundance of corn also.

19. Thou art much mightier than we.] As the people envied him (ver. 14), so the king himself, it seems, began to fear him; and therefore desired him, in a friendly manner, to leave his country. For they were not yet grown so wicked, as to attempt to destroy those who lived quietly amongst them; when they apprehended they would become richer and stronger than themselves.

19. The valley of Gerar.] Where that was is uncertain; but at some distance from the city where Abimelech dwelt, and near to which Isaac had inhabited before.

19. He chose to open the old ones, rather than dig new ones, because he was certain there to find a spring of water, and because it was most easy and least obnoxious to censure or envy; and because
And Isaac's servants dug in the valley, and found there a well of springing water.

And the herdsmen of Gerar digged strivesth with Isaac's herdsmen, saying, The water is our's; and he called the name of the well Esek; because they strove with him.

And they digged another well, and strove for that also: and he called the name of it Sitnah.

And he removed from thence, and digged another well; and for that they strove not: and he called the name of it Rehoboth; and he said, For now the Lord hath made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land.

And he went up from thence to Beer-sheba.

And the Lord appeared unto him the same night, and said, I am the God of Abraham thy father: fear not, for I am with thee, and will bless thee, and will multiply thy seed for thy servant Abraham's sake.

And he built an altar there, and called upon the name of the Lord, and pitched his tent there; and there Isaac's servants digged a well.

Then Abimelech went to him from Gerar, and Abuzzath his one of friends, and Phichol the chief captain of his army.

And Isaac said unto them, Wherefore he would preserve his father's memory: for which reason he did not give them new names, but those they had in his father's days.

Ver. 19. In process of time, they found a necessity of more water; and so digged till they met with a new spring in the valley.

Ver. 20. Because it was found in their soil, as Menochius observes. But they having left the ground to Isaac, the water was truly his, as long as the contract lasted.

Ver. 21. I suppose, in the same valley: for, rather than contend, he receded from his right in the other well.

Ver. 22. To avoid strife, he quitted that part of the country, and went to another: the altar was not disturbed in his pasturage.

For now the Lord hath made room for us, He was straitened before, for want of sufficient water for his flock; which now he enjoyed in abundance.

We shall be fruitful in the land.] Increase more than formerly: now that they could water their flocks quietly and plentifully.

Went to Beer-sheba.] Where he and his father had anciently lived (xxi. 31, xxv. 11).

The Lord appeared unto him.] As he had done before he came to Gerar (ver. 2).

I am the God of Abraham.] Who was so kind to him, and made a covenant with him.

I am with thee.] My special providence is over thee; as was explained before (ver. 3).

Pitched an altar there.] To offer sacrifice unto the Lord.

Called upon the name of the Lord.] As Abraham had done before him, in this very place (xxii. 33).

Pitched his tent there.] Resolved to settle in this place.

Ver. 23. Phichol, &c.] The same name and the same office that he had, who is mentioned xxi. 22, but he was not the same man no more than Abimelech the same king. It is probable this was a name of some dignity among them; like that of Tribunus or Dictator among the Romans; which passed from one to another.

Ver. 25.] We have observed such a special providence over thee, that we come to establish a perpetual friendship with thee, by a solemn oath, if thou wilt consent to our desire. They were afraid, it seems, lest, being disobliged by their sending him out of their country, he should fall upon them one time or other; being mightier than they, as they acknowledged (ver. 18).

Ver. 29. Have sent thee away in peace.] They remember him how they dismissed him peaceably; and did not go about to seize upon his estate, while he lived among them: which they make an argument why he should contract a nearer friendship with such civil people.

Thou art now the blessed of the Lord.] This looks like a high compliment, or flattering expression.

Ver. 30. He made them a feast, &c.] So covenants were made, by eating and together.

Ver. 32. Told him concerning the well which they had digged, &c.] They had begun to dig before Abimelech and Phichol came (ver. 25), and now they came at a spring of water.

Ver. 33. He called it Shebah.] From the oath which was lately made between him and Abimelech. It had been called so before by Abraham (xxi. 31), but that name, perhaps, was forgotten, and so he revived it, as he had done others (ver. 18).

Ver. 34.] Josephus saith, these two men, Beeri and Elon, whose daughters Esea married, were Dynasts, powerful men among the Hittites: which is not improbable. But his father sure had given the same charge to him, that Abraham had done concerning his own marriage (xxiv. 3), and then it was a very unfruitful, nay, an impious action, to marry with those people, who were under the curse of God. The Scripture might well call him profane; who seems not to have regarded either the curse or the blessing of the Abrahamic covenant.

Ver. 35.] His very marrying with them sorely afflicted his father and mother. Or, as others interpret it, their idolatry and bad manners extremely grieved them.
1 And it came to pass, that when Isaac was old, and his eyes were dim, so that he could not see, he called Esau his eldest son, and said unto him, My son: and he said unto him, Behold, here am I.

2 And he said, Behold now, I am old, I know not the day of my death:

3 Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver, and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me some venison;

4 And make me savoury meat, such as I love, and bring it to me, that I may eat; that my soul may bless thee before I die.

5 And Rebekah heard when Isaac spake to Esau his son. And Esau went to the field to hunt for venison, and to bring it.

6 And Rebekah spake unto Jacob her son, saying, Behold, I heard thy father speak unto Esau thy brother, saying,

7 Bring me venison, and make me savoury meat, that I may eat, and bless thee before the Lord before my death.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. When Isaac was old.] A hundred and thirty and seven years old, as many have demonstrated.

My son, &c.] It appears by this and what follows, that though Esau had displeased him by his marriage, yet he retained his natural affection to him, which he had from the beginning.

Ver. 3. Thy quiver.] Some take the Hebrew word to signify a sword; which was as necessary for a hunter as a bow and arrows.

Ver. 4. Make me savoury meat, &c.] To raise his feeble spirits, and enable him to deliver his last and solemn benediction with the more vigour.

My soul may bless thee before I die.] It seems Isaac did not understand the Divine oracle (xxv. 25) as Rebekah did; or, she had not acquainted him with it. For he intended to bestow upon Esau the promised land; which was that God told Abraham he would bless his posterity withal. For the last benediction of these great men was the settling of their inheritance; and making those their heirs upon whom they bestowed their blessing. Now the birthright which Esau sold Jacob gave him right only to the greatest part of Isaac’s estate; but not to the land of Canaan, which was to be disposed of by Isaac, according to Divine direction.

Ver. 7.] These words show it was not a common blessing, but a solemn benediction, and by Divine authority or approbation, which Isaac meant to give his son Esau.

Ver. 8.] Rebekah, having just reason to conclude that Esau had forfeited the blessing which she was desirous to preserve in her family, by marrying with the people of Canaan, who were cursed by God, thought of this device to get Jacob preferred before him. And, indeed, it cannot be denied, that it was a profane thing (as I noted before) to marry with a daughter of Hezir. And he seems afterwards to have had no good design in marrying with a daughter of 8 Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee.

9 Go now to the flock, and fetch me from thence two good kids of the goats; and I will make them savoury meat for thy father, such as he loveth:

10 And thou shalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bless thee before his death.

11 And Jacob said to Rebekah his mother, Behold, Esau my brother is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man:

12 My father peradventure will feel me, and I shall seem to him as a deceiver; and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing.

13 And his mother said unto him, Upon me be thy curse, my son: only obey my voice, and go fetch me them.

14 And he went, and fished; and brought them to his mother: and his mother made savoury meat, such as his father loved.

15 And Rebekah took goodly raiment of her

Ishmael (xxviii. 9), for it looks as if he went about to set up the pretensions of that family against Isaac’s.

Ver. 9. Two good kids of the goats.] Two fat sucking kids, as Aben Ezra expounds this phrase, “kid of the goats,” (upon Exod. xxiii. 19), which, in old time, were accounted very delicious meat: a present fit for a king (1 Sam. xvi. 20), and which Manoah prepared for the angel, whom he took for a noble guest (Judg. xiii. 15), and (which is most proper to be here considered) allowed to decayed and weak people, as an excellent nourishment.

Both these kids were not prepared for Isaac: but she took the most tender and delicate parts of both, and dressed them for him.

I will make them savory meat.] Dress it so as to please his palate; and not to be distinguished by him from venison. For we know the natural taste of things may be quite altered by various sorts of seasonings, as we call them; and ordered in such manner, that Bochartus says he knew skilful huntsmen take a pasty made of beef for venison.

Ver. 11. Hairy man.] In the Hebrew, isch sair, a rough man, hairy like a goat. For the same word sair, signifies a goat, Gen. xxxvii. 31; Lev. ix. 15, and other places.

Ver. 12. Deceiver.] One that cheats his father: imposing on his age, and on his blindness; which, he wisely considers, would have been a high provocation if he had been discovered.

Ver. 13. Upon me be thy curse.] i.e. There is no danger: I will warrant the success.

Ver. 15. Took goodly raiment, &c.] His best clothes; which most suppose were laid up in a chest, among odoriferous flowers, or other perfumes; both to preserve them from moths, and to comfort the brain when they were worn: for their smell is mentioned ver. 27. It is a groundless fancy of the Jews, that these were sacerdotal garments (and the very same that Adam wore, which descended to Noah, &c.), eldest son Esau, which were with her in the house, and put them upon Jacob her younger son:

16 And she put the skins of the kids of the goats upon his hands, and upon the smooth of his neck:

17 And she gave the savoury meat and the bread, which she had prepared, into the hand of her son Jacob.

18 And he came unto his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I; who art thou, my son?

20 And Isaac said unto his son, How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son? And he said, Because the LORD thy God brought it to me.

21 And Isaac said unto Jacob, Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not.

22 And Jacob went near unto Isaac his father; and he said, Come near, I pray thee, unto me, and kiss me, my son.

23 And he kissed him, and asked him, and said, My son: and he said, Here am I, my father.

24 And he said, Bring it near to me, and I will eat of my son's venison, that my soul may bless thee. And he brought it near to him, and he did eat: and he brought him wine, and he drank.

25 And his father Isaac said unto him, Come near now, and kiss me, my son.

26 And he came near, and kissed him: and he smelled the smell of his raiment, and blessed him, and said, See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the LORD hath blessed:

27 Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine:

29 Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy father's sons bow the knee; and Testament.

30 And Esau went to Jerusalem to Jacob his father. And Jacob said to Esau, Come near, I pray thee, and I will bless thee.

31 And Esau said unto his father, Art thou indeed my father? for I have deposed these multitudes of my father's with which I ran away from thee.

32 And Jacob said, Art thou my father's son? saying, Am I thy brother? and his own seed shall be slaves unto thy seed, and they shall serve thy seed four hundred years.

33 But Jacob said, wilt thou give me thy blessing? And he said, Why is it that thou dost ask me this thing? I have enough at home, and also I have acquired wealth.

34 And Jacob said, Thou knowest how I have served thy father Jacob. And he said, Blessed art thou of the LORD, my son, in Whose name I have given thee this blessing.

35 And he blessed him, and said, The LORD give thee of the fruit of the land, and the wealth of the Gentiles, with abundance of corn and wine:

36 And let people bow down before thee, and thy brethren shall bow the knee to thee; and shall serve thee, and shall bless thee: and give thee the blessing of Abraham, thy father.
thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee. 30 And it came to pass, as soon as Isaac had made an end of blessing Jacob, and Jacob was yet scarce gone out from the presence of Isaac his father, that Esau his brother came in from his hunting. 31 And he also had made savoury meat, and brought it unto his father, and said unto his father, Let my father arise, and eat of his son's venison, that thy soul may bless me. 32 And Isaac his father said unto him, Who art thou? And he said, I am thy son, thy first-born Esau. 33 And Isaac trembled very exceedingly, and said, Who? where is he that hath taken venison, and brought it me, and I have eaten of all before thou camest, and have blessed him? yea, and he shall be blessed. 34 And when Esau heard the words of his father, he cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry, and said unto his father, Bless me, even me also, O my father. 35 And he said, Thy brother came with subtlety, and hath taken away thy blessing. 36 And he said, Is he not rightly named Jacob? for he hath supplanted me these two times: he took away my birthright; and, behold, now he hath taken away my blessing. And he said, Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me? 37 And Isaac answered and said unto Esau, Behold, I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for servants; and with corn and wine have I sustained him: and what shall I do now unto thee, my son? 38 And Esau said unto his father, Hast thou but one blessing, my father? bless me, even me also, O my father. And Esau lifted up his voice, and wept. 39 And Isaac his father answered and said unto him, Behold, thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew from above; 40 And by thy sword shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy brother; and it shall come to pass when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck. 41 And Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him: and Esau said in his heart, The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob. 42 And these words of Esau her elder son were told to Rebekah: and she sent and called Jacob her younger son, and said unto him, Behold, thy brother Esau, as touching thee, doth comfort himself, purposing to kill thee. soil of his country, it did not last, as appears by Mal. i. 3. Ver. 40. By thy sword shalt thou live.] Live upon spoil. Or, as others interpret it, be in perpetual war to defend thy country. Shall serve thy brother.] Here Isaac speaks out the very words of the oracle mentioned before (xxv. 23), which was fulfilled in the days of David, 2 Sam. viii. 14, and 1 Chron. xviii. 15 (the circumstances of which conquest are more fully described, 1 Kings xi. 15, &c.). And again, after they had recovered some strength, Amaziah made great slaughters among them (2 Kings xiv. 7), as the Maccabees did afterwards (1 Mac. v. 65), and at last were utterly disabled by Hiericus, the son of Simon Maccabaeus, as we read in Josephus, lib. xiii. Antiq. cap. 17. When thou shalt have the dominion.] St. Jerome and the LXX. do not understand this of their having any dominion over the seed of Jacob (which we never read of), but only of their regaining power to shake off subjection to them, as it follows in the next words. Thou shalt break his yoke.] Which they did in the days of Joram, as we read, 2 Kings viii. 20, 22; 2 Chron. xxviii. 21. Ver. 41. Esau said in his heart,] Designed and resolved within himself: and, as it should seem, was so full of it, that he could not contain his purpose within his own breast, but in his anger blurted it out to somebody, who told it to Rebekah. The days of mourning for my father, &c.] He will die shortly (in which he was deceived, for he lived three-and-forty years after this), and then I will be revenged. He had some regard to his father still remaining (whom he would not grieve), but no consideration of his mother, who had helped Jacob to supplant him. Ver. 41. Tarry with him a few days.] A year or two. But herein she also was mistaken, for he did not return in twenty years' time.
43 Now therefore, my son, obey my voice, and arise, flee thou to Laban my brother to Haran; 44 And tarry with him a few days, until thy brother's fury turn away; 45 Until thy brother's anger turn away from thee, and he forget that which thou hast done to him: then I will send, and fetch thee from thence: why should I be deprived also of you both in one day? 46 And Rebekah said to Isaac, I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth: if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are of the daughters of the land, what good shall my life do me?

Until thy brother's fury]. Time, in which various things happen, very much allays fury and rage.
Ver. 45. He forget, &c.] The memory of it be much worn out, and grown weak.
Why should I be deprived?] She had reason to think, that if Esau killed Jacob, and the public justice did not punish it (according to the precept ix. 6, which had settled courts of judiciature), God himself would prosecute Esau with his vengeance, as he did Cain.
Ver. 46. I am weary of my life, because of the daughters of Heth.] The two wives of Esau, who were Hittites, were such a continual vexation to her, that she wished rather to die, than to live among them.

[If Jacob take a wife, &c.] She pretends only this reason for sending Jacob among her kindred, and says not a word of the danger his life was in; for she would not afflict her husband, but only preserve her son.
What good shall my life do me?] I had rather die, than live in such perpetual vexation; therefore let him go and take a wife, as Abraham did for thee, of our kindred.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 And Isaac called Jacob, and blessed him, and charged him, and said unto him, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan. 2 And Isaac sent away Jacob: and he went to Padan-aram unto Laban, son of Bethuel the Syrian, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Esau's mother.

6 ¶ When Esau saw that Isaac had blessed Jacob, and sent him away to Padan-aram, to take him a wife from thence; and that as he blessed him he gave him a charge, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Cannan; 7 And that Jacob obeyed his father and his mother, and was gone to Padan-aram; 8 And Esau seeing that the daughters of Cannan pleased not Isaac his father; 9 Then went Esau into Ishmael, and took unto the wives which he had Mahalath the daughter of Ishmael's brother, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife.

11 And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for a pillow, and lay thereupon.

He went to Padan-aram] Prepared himself to go and set forward. Or else it is spoken by anticipation; for he did not come thither till after several passages which are related in this and in the next chapter.
Son of Bethuel the Syrian.] See xxv. 20.
Jacob's and Esau's mother.] Now Jacob is put first, as being lately declared Isaac's heir, and heir of all the promises.

To the family of Ishmael, for he himself died fourteen years ago. And therefore Nebajoth (his eldest son, xxv. 19), is here mentioned as the present head of the family, whose sister Esau married. Whereby he showed himself not to have any great regard to the Divine revelation; otherwise he could not but have known, that this family, being descended from a bond-woman, was not to inherit the promises made to Abraham and Isaac.

Ver. 10. Jacob went out from Beer-sheba, &c.] Quite alone, without any servants to attend him, and without any presents to court a wife, or gain the kindness of Laban, neither of which were wanting, when Abraham sent Eliezer to take a wife for Isaac.
But as he was sent away in haste (as I noted before, them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep.

12 And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it.

13 And, behold, the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed;

14 And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed.

15 And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of.

16 ¶ And Jacob awoke out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not.

17 And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! and said, How dreadful is this place!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

ver. 5), so hereby the anger of Esau was mitigated, who at present was left the sole possessor of all Isaac’s riches, and saw Jacob depart in a poor condition. This also was an act of Divine faith, that God would take a singular care of him, and let him want nothing. And, as they could not but hope that Laban, being so near a relation, would be glad to see him and entertain him; so it is probable he might carry letters of singular engagement with him, that the Lord put in his heart, as Eleazer assured them Isaac was to be to Abraham (xxiv. 38). We are to suppose, likewise, that he was not sent without money to bear his charges (as we speak), and had some provision with him, for we read of oil (ver. 18), which he poured on the top of the pillar.

Ver. 11. He lighted up upon a certain place, &c. A convenient place (shaded with lovely trees, see ver. 19) to lodge in; unto which he did not go by design, but happened (as we speak) upon it, when he did not think of it.

He took of the stones of that place,] One stone from among many others that were there, as appears from ver. 18. The same form of speech was observed before (xix. 29, xxii. 7).

Ver. 12. He dreamed.] He had the following representation made to him in a dream.

Behold a ladder, &c.] It is judiciously observed by Maimonides, in his preface to his More Nevochim, that there are two sorts of prophetic parables (as he calls them), in one of which every word hath some peculiar signification; in the other, the whole parable represents the thing intended, but every word hath not its weight; some serving only for elegance. Among the first sort he reckons this; in which the ladder may be thought to represent the Divine Providence, which governs all things, and particularly now directed Jacob in his journey, every step of which was under God’s guidance. It being “set upon the earth” denoted, he thinks, the steadfastness of Providence, which nothing is able to shake. And “the top of it reaching to heaven,” signifies that it extends itself all the world over; to every thing, great or small, high or low; and the several steps in the ladder, the motions and actions of Divine Providence. The angels which went up and down, signify that they that were near Jacob’s present condition, or in his house, by whom he manages all things here below; and that they are never idle, but always in motion to serve those especially who serve God faithfully. Their ascending represents their going to receive the Divine orders and commands; and their descending, the execution of his orders. Or (with a peculiar respect to Jacob’s present condition) they signified their safe conduct of him in his journey to Padan-aram; and the other, bringing him safe home again.

This is infinitely more solid than the conceit of almost all the ancient rabbins, that God represented in this ladder the rise and the fall of the four great monarchies. For where is there any mention in this dream of four angels? or, of seventy steps representing the seventy years’ captivity in Babylon? or, of two-and-fifty steps representing the time of the reign of the four kings of Persia and Media, according to their computation? &c. All this is the pure invention of idle men, who dream upon the Holy Scriptures.

Ver. 13. The Lord stood above it.] Finally, he saw the Divine Majesty, or Glory (so the Targum here expounds it), as the immovable mover of all things: from whom all comes as the first cause, and to whom all returns as the last end.

I am the Lord God, &c.] This is the first time that we read of God’s appearing to Jacob: and it was only in a dream. It is made such a deep impression upon him, that he doubted not of the truth of what was now expressly promised him by God himself; that he should have the blessing of Abraham, as his father had told him (ver. 4).

Ver. 15. Behold, I am with thee.] Or, will be with thee; i.e. My peculiar providence shall be over thee, and take care of thy safety, as Maimonides well expounds it, in his More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 18.

I will not leave thee, &c.] This shows the extent of the dream was to comfort Jacob in his solitary and poor condition, by an assurance that God’s watchful providence should attend him till he had accomplished all his promises to him.

Ver. 16. Surely the Lord is in this place.] By his special extraordinary presence; for he had manifested himself to him, and given him singular assurances of his favour, and that the very first night after he went from home: which made this place more acceptable to him than his father’s house. For now he was become a prophet, as Maimonides observes (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 45), where he says, that they who prophesy in a dream, do not call it a dream after prophecy is come to them in a dream, but simply say, it was a prophecy. Thus the patriarch Jacob, after he awakened out of his prophetic dream (wherein he heard the Lord speak to him, ver. 13, 14), he doth not call it a dream, but roundly says, “Surely the Lord is in this place,” &c.

I know it not.] I did not expect to meet with such a Divine appearance: but my heart was full of words to me.

Ver. 17. He was afraid.] Possessed with a religious, awful apprehension of God, which made him say, How dreadful is this place! With what reverence ought I here to behave myself!

This is—the house of God.] The Divine Majesty dwells here; this is not a common place, but a sacred, having a Divine presence in it.

The gate of heaven.] Here God keeps his court, attended by his holy angels, whom he had seen come from heaven hither, and go up from hence thither. So Mr. Mede explains it (book ii. p. 436). The presence of God in one place more than another, consists in his train or retinue. A king is there, where his court is; and so God is there specially present, where the angels keep their station; which is the meaning of the gate of heaven, i. e. heaven's court; for the gate was wont to be the judgment-hall, and the place where kings and senators used to sit, attended by their guards and guardsmen.

Ver. 18. Took the stone—and set it up for a pillar.]
Upon the top of some other stones, which he heaped up together, that it might remain as a monument of the Divine mercy to him, and preserve the memory of this heavenly vision; and that by this token he might know this place, when God brought him back again, and commemorate his goodness to him here.

This stone, which was in a great temple in Jerusalem, dedicated by the Jews in future times, and translated to Jerusalem. After the destruction of which by Titus, they were wont (upon that day when it was taken, which was the only day they were permitted to come thither), with great lamentation and rending their garments, to go and anoint this stone. Such is the power of freedom of worship (see Vossius, de Idolol. lib. vi. cap. 38).

Pour'd oil upon the top of it.] Not in honour of this stone (as Bonfrierus himself confesses), much less any of idolatry to which it was dedicated; but to consecrate it as a monument of God's great mercy to him in the before-mentioned celestial vision. Oil, it appears, was used in ancient times by the Egyptians in consecrating things, before the law of Moses; and not only in this family, but in others also, it is probable: from whence the pagan custom came of anointing stones, which by Theophrastus are called Λαμποι Νεφρον, upon which supernitious people were wont, when they met with them in the highways, to pour oil, and fall down and worship. A great many authors mention these stones, which are believed by the Jews, in many observations upon Arnobius, p. 37. They that would be satisfied how wretchedly some of the Romish writers plead for the worship of images from this very place, may read Dr. Jackson's Treatise of the Original of Unbelief (chap. xxxv.), where he excellently explains this action of Jacob, n. 5, 6,7.

Ver. 19. Beth-el.] From this word Beth-el, came the word Berceau (as Scaliger, in his Animad. upon Euseb. p. 198, and others think) among the heathen, whereby they denoted rude stones, which they worshipped either as symbols of Divinity, or as true Gods, animated by some heavenly power. Of which worship, see Pholus in his Bibliotheca (extilii.), but especially in that poem, where he has his heaven, and shows the Phenicians (at least, as the Jews think) first worshipped this very stone which Jacob anointed; and afterwards consecrated others, which they called Bethylia, and Bethylia, in memory of this stone anointed at Bethel (see p. 785, 786). Certain it is, this idolatrous practice came very early into the world; which made Moses forbid the erecting of such pillars, they being, in his time, converted to a profane use (Iev. xxvi. 1; Deut. xii. 3, xxi. 22).

But the name of that city.] Which was near to the place where this pillar was first set up.

Was—Luz at the first.] So called, perhaps, from the many almond-trees which grew there (for Luz signifies an almond, see xxx. 37), among which, it is but the name of that city was called Luz at the first.

20 And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on,

21 So that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God:}

probable, Jacob took up his lodging, because they were a kind of covering to him. Both this word, in the tribe of Benjamin, and the other among the Hittites, in the tribe of Ephraim (Judg. i. 36), Bochart doubts not their name from this original (lib. i. Casam. cap. 33).

Perhaps Jacob was the first that in this manner expressed his devout affection towards God.

If God will be with me, &c.] Perform his promise to me (ver. 15.)

Give me bread to eat, &c.] Support and maintain me, which is the explication of the promise.

Ver. 21. Then shall the Lord be my God.] I will most royally worship and serve him; which doth not imply that he would not worship him, if he did not bring him home in peace: but that, if he did, he would perform some special service to him, and worship him with extraordinary devotion: consecrating (as it follows) this place to his honour, offering him sacrifice, and giving him the tenths of all he had, to maintain his worship.

Ver. 22. This stone, which I have set for a pillar.] All pillars were not unlawful, but such only as were for idolatrous uses; as Malmendes resolves (lib. de Idolol. cap. 6, p. 151.) But this stone is not to be interpreted as found those words before mentioned, "Thou shalt not set thee up any statue (or pillar), which the Lord thy God hateth" (Deut. xvi. 22), concerning pillars set up for worship, not of those from memorial.

Shall be God's house:] Here will I set apart a place for God's solemn worship and service; build an altar, and offer sacrifice, &c. See xxxv. 3.

Ver. 23. Beth-el.] From this word Bethel, came the word Berceau (as Scaliger, in his Animad. upon Euseb. p. 198, and others think) among the heathen, whereby they denoted rude stones, which they worshipped either as symbols of Divinity, or as true Gods, animated by some heavenly power. Of which worship, see Pholus in his Bibliotheca (extilii.), but especially in that poem, where he has his heaven, and shows the Phenicians (at least, as the Jews think) first worshipped this very stone which Jacob anointed; and afterwards consecrated others, which they called Bethylia, and Bethylia, in memory of this stone anointed at Bethel (see p. 785, 786). Certain it is, this idolatrous practice came very early into the world; which made Moses forbid the erecting of such pillars, they being, in his time, converted to a profane use (Iev. xxvi. 1; Deut. xii. 3, xxi. 22).

But the name of that city.] Which was near to the place where this pillar was first set up.

Was—Luz at the first.] So called, perhaps, from the many almond-trees which grew there (for Luz signifies an almond, see xxx. 37), among which, it is but the name of that city was called Luz at the first.
CHAPTER XXIX.

1 Jacob cometh to the well of Haran. 9 He taketh acquaintance of Rachel. 13 Laban entertaineth him.
18 Jacob covenanteth for Rachel. 23 He is deceived with Leah. 28 He marrieth also Rachel, and serveth for her seven years more. 32 Leah beareth Reuben, 33 Simeon, 34 Levi, 36 and Judah.

Then Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the people of the east.
2 And he looked, and beheld a well in the field, and, lo, there were three flocks of sheep lying by it; for out of that well they watered the flocks: and a great stone was upon the well's mouth.
3 And thither were all the flocks gathered: and they rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the sheep, and put the stone again upon the well's mouth in his place.
4 And Jacob said unto them, My brethren, whence be ye? And they said, Of Haran are we. 5 And he said unto them, Know ye Laban the son of Nahor? And they said, We know him.
6 And he said unto them, Is he well? And they said, He is well: and, behold, Rachel his daughter cometh with the sheep.
7 And he said, Lo, it is yet high day, neither is it time that the cattle should be gathered together: water ye the sheep, and go and feed them.
8 And they said, We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep.
9 ¶ And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep: for she kept them.
10 And it came to pass, when Jacob saw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban his mother's brother, that Jacob went near, and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother.
11 And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept.
12 And Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's brother, and that he was Rebekah's son: and she ran and told her father.
13 And it came to pass, when Laban heard that these eastern countries, where the sun had great power in the summer-time, to bring their flocks towards noon into shady places, where there was water to refresh them; otherwise the extreme heat would have killed them. There they rested (it appears by many places of Scripture, particularly Cant. i. 7), till the heat of the day was over, and then, having watered them again, they carried them out to feed till sunset.

Ver. 9. For she kept them.] It was a noble employment in those days to keep sheep; whence God himself hath the name of the Shepherd of Israel. She had those under her, we are to suppose, who took the greatest pains about them; but she was the chief shepherdess, who inspected them all.

Ver. 10. Went near and rolled the stone.] He was stronger, or more dexterous at such things, than anybody there; or, the meaning is, he assisted in this work; and, perhaps, was the first that set to his hand about it.

Ver. 11. Jacob kissed Rachel.] Having told her who he was, and satisfied her of the truth of it, then, after the custom used among near relatives at their first meeting) he saluted her; and that with more than ordinary affection, for he wept for joy to see her. Laban in like manner kissed him.
the tidings of Jacob his sister's son, that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kissed him, and brought him to his house. And he told Laban all these things.

14 And Laban said to him, Surely thou art my bone and my flesh. And he abode with him the space of a month.

15 ¶ And Laban said unto Jacob, Because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for nought? tell me, what shall thy wages be?

16 And Laban had two daughters: the name of the elder was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel.

17 Leah was tender eyed; but Rachel was beautiful and well favoured.

18 And Jacob loved Rachel; and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter.

19 And Laban said, It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man: abide with me.

20 And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her.

21 ¶ And Jacob said unto Laban, Give me

Ver. 12. Her father's brother.] So all near relations are called (ver. 15).

Ver. 13. He told Laban all these things.] Which are mentioned in the foregoing and this chapter. The reason of his coming from home, God's providence over him in his journey, and his happy meeting with Rachel.

Ver. 14. Surely thou art my bone and my flesh.] So very near of kin to me that I can deny thee nothing.

Ver. 15. Because thou art] Or, as De Dieu translates the word Haci (and gives many instances of it), Art thou not my brother? Is it fit then that thou shouldst serve me for nothing?

Ver. 17. Leah was tender eyed.] Some translate it, and hath not eyes. So the Chaldee; and then the meaning is, All her beauty lay in her eyes. Beautiful and well favoured.] Was very amiable, being well shaped, having good features, and a fine complexion.

Ver. 18.] He had not brought money enough with him to purchase a wife (as the manner was in those days), and therefore offers his service for seven years, instead of it.

Ver. 19.] He seems to answer cunningly; and yet one cannot but take it for a contract, as it appears to have been by ver. 21.

Ver. 20. They seemed unto him but a few days.] He valued Rachel so much, that the price at which he purchased her seemed inconsiderable.

Ver. 21. Give me thy wife.] So she had been by contract ever since it was made (ver. 19), and he doth not now demand that he might have her to wife, but that he might enjoy her; being already his wife by that solemn agreement made seven years ago.

Ver. 22.] All such private contracts were completed by the elders or governors of the place, in the presence of all the people. We had an instance of this before in Abraham's purchase of a sepulchre for his family (xxiii. 11, 18); which was a sacred and religious thing, as well as the rites of marriage; and therefore both of them publici juris, as Cornet. Bertram speaks, part of the public care.

my wife, for my days are fulfilled, that I may go in unto her.

22 And Laban gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feast.

23 And it came to pass in the evening, that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him; and he went in unto her.

24 And Laban gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah his maid for an handmaid.

25 And it came to pass, that in the morning, behold, it was Leah: and he said to Laban, What is this thou hast done unto me? did I not serve with thee for Rachel? wherefore then hast thou beguiled me?

26 And Laban said, It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born.

27 Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this also for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years.

28 And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife also.

29 And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter Bilhah his handmaid to be her maid.

30 And he went in also unto Rachel, and he

Ver. 23. In the evening.] At bed-time. Brought her to him.] The modesty of those times made them bring the bride to her husband's bed veiled, and without lights; so that it was the easier for Laban to deceive Jacob by bringing Leah to him; whom he could not hope so readily to dispose in marriage as Rachel, because she was homely.

Ver. 24.] A very poor portion; yet all that he gave to Rachel afterward (ver. 29): which made them say, that he used them as strangers, not as his children; putting them off without any portion (xxxiii. 14, 15).

Ver. 26.] We do not read of any such ancient custom; and, therefore, this seems a mere shift, or a jest; or if it had been true, he should have told it Jacob beforehand.

Ver. 27. Fulfil her week, &c.] Perfect this marriage with Leah, by keeping a seven days' feast (as the custom was), and then thou shalt have Rachel also. For he doth not speak of a week of years, but of days, as Mr. Selden shows out of many authors (lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. v), where he hath this plain commentary upon these words:

"Marriages are to be celebrated, according to custom, by a seven days' feast: complete this marriage thou hast begun with Leah, and then, upon condition of another seven years' service, thou shalt marry Rachel also, and keep her wedding-feast seven days."

Ver. 28.] After he had solemnly married Rachel, and bedded her (as we speak), for that he did seven days after his marriage with Leah was accomplished. So this verse begins, "And he went in also unto Rachel," and then began his other seven years' service. There was no positive law, as yet, against such marriages as this (with two sisters), which were afterward expressly condemned; but at present indulged; as the marriage of a man's own sister was in the beginning of the world. Whence that saying of the Jews in the Genara Hierosol. upon the title Sanhedrim, "The world was built by indulgence."

And Jacob, it is very likely, thought there was an unavoidable necessity for his marrying these two sisters.
loved also Rachel more than Leah, and served with him yet seven other years.

31 ¶ And when the Lord saw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb: but Rachel was barren.

32 And Leah conceived, and bare a son, and she called his name Reuben: for she said, Surely the Lord hath looked upon my affliction; now therefore my husband will love me.

33 And she conceived again, and bare a son; and said, This time will I be happy; therefore called she his name Judah; and left bearing.

For Rachel was his true wife; Leah being imposed upon him by a cheat. But, having known her, he concluded he could not honestly leave her; no more than he could Rachel, to whom he was first contracted.

Ver. 31. Leah was hated.] Comparatively, not absolutely. For Leah having joined with her father to deceive him, he could not love her so well as Rachel; to whom he had engaged his first affection.

Ver. 32. Reuben.] The name of this son, and of all the rest that follow, are derived from the Hebrew tongue: which shows that Laban’s family spake the same language with Abraham’s with some little variation, as appears afterwards, xxxi. 47.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 Rachel, in grief for her barrenness, giveth Bilhah her maid unto Jacob. 5 She beareth Dan and Naphtali. 9 Leah giveth Zilpah her maid, who beareth God and Asher. 13 Reuben findeth mandrakes, with which Leah buyeth her husband of Rachel. 17 Leah beareth Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah. 22 Rachel beareth Joseph. 25 Jacob desirith to depart. 17 Laban stayeth him on a new covenant. 37 Jacob’s policy, whereby he became rich.

I AND when Rachel saw that she bare Jacob no children, Rachel envied her sister; and said unto Jacob, Give me children, or else I die.

2 And Jacob’s anger was kindled against Rachel: and he said, Am I in God’s stead, who hath withholden from thee the fruit of the womb?

3 And she said, Behold my maid Bilhah, go in unto her; and she shall bear upon my knees, that I may also have children by her.

4 And she gave him Bilhah her handmaid to wife: and Jacob went in unto her.

5 And Bilhah conceived, and bare Jacob a son.

6 And Rachel said, God hath judged me, and hath also heard my voice, and hath given me a son: therefore called she his name Dan.

7 And Bilhah Rachel’s maid conceived again, and bare Jacob a second son.

8 And Rachel said, With great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed: and she called his name Naphtali.

9 When Leah saw that she had left bearing, she took Zilpah her maid, and gave her Jacob to wife.

10 And Zilpah Leah’s maid bare Jacob a son.

11 And Leah said, A troop cometh: and he called his name Gad.

whom I may set upon my knees, as my own. For so it follows.

That I may also have children] Though not by my own body, yet by her. For she being Rachel’s servant, the children that were born of her, were Rachel’s children, not her own.

Ver. 4. She gave him Bilhah.] Of such kind of wives as this and Zilpah, ver. 3, see xxv. 6.

Ver. 6. God hath judged me.] Decided the controversy between me and my sister; and given sentence on my side.

She called his name Dan.] The mothers sometimes gave names to their children (as Leah had done to hers, mentioned in the foregoing chapter); but with the approbation of the father, who sometimes controlled them (xxxv. 16).

Ver. 8. With great wrestlings, &c.] I have struggled exceeding hard (i. e. in incessant, vehement desires, and perhaps in prayers to God) to have another child, before my sister; and have prevailed.

Ver. 9. Took Zilpah her maid.] Imitating her sister, and perhaps out of the same principle; hoping some or other of her children might be the father of the Messiah; and therefore the more children she had, the more likely some of them might be so happy.

Ver. 11. A troop cometh.] The Hebrew writers generally expound it, “Good fortune cometh:” as Mr 13 And Zilpah Leah's maid bare Jacob a second son.

14 And Reuben went in the days of wheat harvest, and found mandrakes in the field, and brought them unto his mother Leah. Then Rachel said to Leah, Give me, I pray thee, of thy son's mandrakes.

15 And she said unto her, Is it a small matter that thou hast taken my husband? and wouldest thou take away my son's mandrakes also? And Rachel said, Therefore he shall lie with thee to night for thy son's mandrakes.

16 And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him, and said, Thou must come in unto me; for surely I have hired thee with my son's mandrakes. And he lay with her that night.

Selden shows in his Synagoga, de Disis Siris, cap. 1. And the LXX. translate it αἰδερον, "in a lucky hour," and other Greek versions εἰδερον, as in St. Chrysostom (Hom. lvi. on this book), who expounds it εἰδερον τοῦ σώστου, "I have obtained my aim." Others have εἰδερον, which is the same: whence the Latin anciently had it, beata facta, or felix sum, as in St. Austin, Q. xci, in Gen. And this seems to some to be nearer to the Hebrew than any other translation; because, what other way soever we expound the word god, either for a troop, or for fortune, we must make two words of bagad, as the Masorites do, and take 2 to signify as much as σωστος, according as we translate it. A troop cometh, or Good fortune cometh. But I see no necessity of this; for, taking god for a troop, it may be simply translated, With a troop; a troop shall follow this, i.e. a great many more children. And it must be confessed that Jacob in his blessing (xlix. 19), doth allude to this signification of the word, which I doubt not is the truest. For god, or gada, never denotes fortune anywhere but in the Targum of Onkelos and Jonathan, and among the rabbins who follow them: and therefore this may be looked on as a later, not the ancient signification of the word.

Ver. 14. In the days of wheat harvest.] Which began at Pentecost, when the first-fruits of it were offered; as barley harvest began at the passover.

Mandrakes] In the Hebrew the word is dudaim: which here signifies the fruit of a tree or plant (whateverse it be); and in the book of Canticles, vii. 13, it signifies the flowers; and these are the only two places where this word is found in the Bible. Which Job Ludolphus gives many reasons to prove, cannot signify a mandrake: for the flowers of that have a bad smell, and the fruit of it a bad taste. And therefore, after great variety of opinions, he concludes it to be that which in Syria they call mauz: which is a small leprous fruit, growing upon a plant, in the top of which there are great bunches of it like a cucumber. From whence he fancies this fruit was anciently called dudaim; from the Hebrew word dud, which signifies, propinquus, cognatus, amicus; which signifies a neighbour, kinsman, or friend. Such were these dudaim, which he calls cognatos aut patresque ab unus collegit protectos (Vid. Comment. in lib. i. Hister. Ethiop. cap. xix. n. 72).

Ver. 15. Taken my husband?] It seems he had estranged himself, for some time, from Leah's bed, out of his great love to Rachel, or because he took little delight in her. Or Rachel's envy at her having 17 And God hearkened unto Leah, and she conceived, and bare Jacob the fifth son.

18 And Leah said, God hath given me my hire, because I have given my maiden to my husband: and she called his name Jezabel.

19 And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob the sixth son.

20 And Leah said, God hath endowed me with a good dowry; now will my husband dwell with me, because I have born him six sons: and she called his name Zebulun.

21 And afterwards she bare a daughter, and called her name Dinah.

22 And God remembered Rachel, and God hearkened to her, and opened her womb.

23 And she conceived, and bare a son; and said, God hath taken away my reproach:

24 And she called his name Joseph; and said, The Lord shall add to me another son.

25 And it came to pass, when Rachel had so many children, when she herself had none, made her contrive ways to keep him from Leah.

Ver. 16.] I cannot think of any good reason, either of this contention among Jacob's wives for his company, or their giving him their maids to be his wives, or for Moses's taking such particular notice of all this; but only the earnest desire they had to fulfil the promise made to Abraham, That his seed should be as the stars of heaven; and that in one seed of his (the Messiah) all the nations of the earth should be blessed. It had been below the dignity of such a sacred history as this is, to relate such things, if there had not been something of great consideration in them. And what can that be, but chiefly the birth of the blessed Seed? which was the object of the hopes of all pious people in those days. For it is evident, both by Rachel and her sister, that it was children they desired, and not merely the company of their husbands: as it here follows, ver. 17.

Ver. 17. God hearkened unto Leah,—To her earnest prayer, or vehement desire: and gave her another son.

Ver. 18. Given me my hire,—I purchased my husband's company, and God hath repaid me, by the gifts of another child, for mine, which I had lost; and that in one seed of his (the Messiah) all the nations of the earth should be blessed. It had been below the dignity of such a sacred history as this is, to relate such things, if there had not been something of great consideration in them. And what can that be, but chiefly the birth of the blessed Seed? which was the object of the hopes of all pious people in those days. For it is evident, both by Rachel and her sister, that it was children they desired, and not merely the company of their husbands: as it here follows, ver. 17.

Ver. 19. Conceived again,—The birth of this son begat a greater kindness between them; and made him less a stranger to her bed.

Ver. 20. God hath endowed me with a good dowry,—By restoring her husband to her, and bestowing new fruitfulness upon her: for she had ceased to bear (xxix. ult.)

Ver. 21. Dinah,—No reason is given of her name: but it seems to have the same with that of Rachel's firstborn by Bilhah (ver. 6). For, as if she had now got the better of Rachel, she calls this child by a name implying revenge.

Ver. 22. God remembered Rachel,—He would not have Leah insult over her, nor triumph too much; and therefore blessed Rachel with a son out of her own womb, for that was to remember her.

Ver. 24. Joseph,—His name seems to have been taken both from ending her reproach, which she more in a further reflection; as if this was the reward of her kindness to her husband, in bestowing her maid upon him to be his wife.

Ver. 25. Conceived again,—The birth of this son begat a greater kindness between them; and made him less a stranger to her bed.

The Lord shall add to me another son,—This was a great expression of her faith; more than we find in all the former births.
CHAPTER XVIII.

121 born Joseph, that Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country.

26 Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served thee, and let me go: for thou knowest my service which I have done thee.

27 And Laban said unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thine eyes, tarry: for I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake.

28 And he said, Appoint me thy wages, and I will give it.

29 And he said unto him, Thou knowest how I have served thee, and how thy cattle was with me.

30 For it was little which thou hadst before I came, and it is now increased unto a multitude; and the Lord hath blessed thee since my coming: and now when shall I provide for mine own house also?

31 And he said, What shall I give thee? And Jacob said, Thou shalt not give me any thing: Ver. 25.

Ver. 25. Send me away.] It is plain, by this, that the seven years' service for Rachel was now finished, just when Joseph was born; and therefore he desires to set off his wages, 'unto mine own house, and to the house of the ancients.' Unto mine own place and unto my country.] i.e. To his father's house in Canaan: which was his country, because he was born there.

Ver. 26. For thou knowest my service.] He appeals to himself whether he had not served him with all diligence and fidelity: and therefore deserved to be rewarded in each long labours.

Ver. 27. I have learned by experience.] Or, as the ancients understood the word nachasst, I have found by division: and Aben Ezra thinks he learnt it by consulting with his Teraphim. But there needed no such advice with them; the thing was plain in itself, that he had brought prosperity along with him into his house.

Ver. 29. Thou knowest how I have served thee.] With how much care and fidelity, as he had admonished him before (ver. 26).

How thy cattle was with me.] How they prospered under my care.

Ver. 30. Blessed thee since my coming.] So St. Jerome explains the Hebrew phrase, at my feet: ever since I cast my foot with, or in thy dwelling, since I entered into thy service. Others expound it, wheresoever I went, or by my leading thy flock. But Maimonides says this phrase, leragli (at my foot) signifies because of me: for my sake. And so he explains the like phrase, xxxiii. 14, par. i. More Nevoch. cap. 28.

Ver. 31. Thou shalt not give me any thing, &c.] I will take nothing of thee at present; but make this following bargain with thee, for the future.

Ver. 32. All the speckled and spotted.] In this place, and in xxxi. 10, there are four distinct words used to express what should be his. The first of them is nakad, which we well translate speckled. For the word signifies little points or pricks, which the Greeks call elphousa: as many have observed; particularly Beochart in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. The next is talus, which signifies broader and larger spots; which we frequently see in cattle. The next is ekod, which signifies, spotted with divers colours: but most properly spots, or rather circles, or rings about the feet or legs (which we translate ring-straked): so Symmachus renders it. The fourth is onodes, white-footed; and Onkelos and Jonathan, having marks on their feet; rather lists round their legs or feet; for the word de-thing: if thou wilt do this thing for me, I will again feed and keep thy flock:

32 I will pass through all thy flock to day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats: and of such shall be my hire.

33 So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come, when it shall come for my hire before thy face: every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats, and brown among the sheep, that shall be counted stolen with me.

34 And Laban said, Behold, I would it might be according to thy word.

35 And he removed that day the he goats that were ringstraked and spotted, and all the she goats that were speckled and spotted, and every one that had some white in it, and all the brown among the sheep, and gave them into the hand of his sons.

36 And he set three days' journey betwixt notes, binding or twisting about any thing. And then the last word barad signifies, whitish spots like hail. For barad, in Hebrew, is hail.

Ver. 33.] This separation being made, it would appear, that if he had any spotted, they were not taken from Laban's flock; but given to him by God out of them, as a reward of his honest diligence.

Ver. 34.] He thought this so good a bargain, that he was not called to any further account. Ver. 35. Into the hand of his sons.] i.e. Of Laban's sons, who were now grown up; though, perhaps, when Jacob first came to him, they were so little as not to be able to look after the flocks; which his daughter therefore fed (xxix. 9); as for Jacob's sons, the eldest of them was scarce seven years old; and therefore could not be fit for such employment. Laban therefore gave all the spotted cattle from the rest; and then, lest Jacob should get any of them to mix with those of one colour, he committed them to his own sons, to be fed apart by themselves. And, as it follows in the next verse, made a distance of three days' journey between the one and the other; that none might be in danger to stray to the flock which was fed by Jacob; unto whose care were committed all that had no spots at all.

Ver. 36. Set three days' journey, &c.] That they might be sure not to come near, so much as to see one another.

Ver. 37. [Of the hazel] The Hebrew word hus signifies an almond: Bochart proves at large, out of a great many authors. And therefore St. Jerome here rightly translates it, virgas amygdalinas. And himself and Jacob: and Jacob fed the rest of Laban's flocks.

37. And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chesnut tree; and pilled white stripes in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods.

38. And he set the rods which he had pilled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering troughs when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink.

39. And the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattle ringsteaded, speckled, and spotted.

40. And Jacob did separate the lambs, and set the heads of the flock towards the ringsteaded, and all the brown in the flock of Laban; and he put his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban's cattle.

41. And it came to pass, whosoever the stronger cattle did conceive, that Jacob laid the rods before the eyes of the cattle in the gutters, that they might conceive among the rods.

42. But when the cattle were feeble, he put them not in: so the feebleer were Laban's, and the stronger Jacob's.

43. And the man increased exceedingly, and had much cattle, and maid-servants, and menservants, and camels, and asses.

The Hebrew interpreters, who will have it signify a hazel-tree, confess that herein they depart from the opinion of those that went before them. So Aben Ezra and Kimchi, who both acknowledge that the ancient doctors expound it, almond-rods.

Pilled white stripes in them. He had three artifices to compass this end. The first was this: to peel off their skins before they put them at certain places, till white appeared between the bark, which was of a different colour. And these rods, thus discoloured, he laid in the channels of water, at that time when the cattle were wont to couple (as it follows in the next verse), that their fancies might be painted with such divers colours as they saw in the rods (see ver. 40.)

Ver. 39. The flocks conceived before the rods, &c.] The Greek fathers ascribe this to the miraculous operation of God, as Bochart observes in his Hierozoic. (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 49.) But the Latin fathers, particularly St. Jerome, look upon it as done by the natural operation of the imagination. For which he alleges the like thing done in Spain among horses and mares: and brings Quinectillan and Hippocrates to justify the like concepions in women. Which he backs with a great number of authorities, out of Galen and other writers; who have observed indelible marks to have been impressed upon children, by the objects that were presented to their mother's imagination at the time of her conception.

And St. Austin says, the Egyptians, by the like device with this of Jacob's, had still a new apis, or pied-bull, to succeed that which died: to whom they gave divine honour. But whatsoever power there might be in natural imagination to produce such effects, it must be acknowledged that God gave an extraordinary blessing to this contrivance: as appears by the vision which Jacob says he had, wherein God (who had directed him to this invention) promised to give it success (xxxii. 10—12.) For beasts have very rarely such a strong and vehement imagination as produces such effects; unless it be moved by some unusual passion. And therefore we must confess that God excited and stirred up their imagination; which otherwise would not have wrought in that manner; at least, not in all the cattle. For, let any shepherd now try this device, and he will not find it do what it did then by a divine operation (vide G. Vossius, lib. iii. de Idolol. cap. 29.)

Ver. 40. Jacob did separate the lambs, &c.] One species is put for all; and the meaning is, that those young cattle (whether lambs or kids of the goats, &c.) which were thus brought forth spotted, he did not suffer to remain with the flock of Laban; lest he should say that he did him wrong by letting them mix together, and so bring forth spotted cattle (and perhaps he might also think that they, looking upon Laban's one-coloured cattle, might bring forth young ones like to them). But, instead of this way of ex- tending himself, he had a second artifice; which was to put the spotted cattle (produced by the former device) foremost; so that Laban's flock should always look upon them, and thereby be the more apt to conceive the like. And then it follows, in the end of this verse:

Ver. 41. He put his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban's cattle.] Which looks like a repetition of what was said in the beginning of the verse: but the meaning is, that those which brought forth spotted, by this second artifice, he also put by themselves; and suffered them not to be mingled with Laban's cattle: as before he had separated those that were brought forth spotted, by looking upon them.

Ver. 42.] This was his third artifice; which is thus expounded by the Chaldee and a great number of other authors (which may be seen in Bochart, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 46.), that he laid the rods before the cattle only in the spring-time, when the sun was ascending, and the cattle lusty and vigorous; but let them alone when the cattle came together in September, or the declension of the year (for they bred twice a year in those countries), at which time they were become more feeble. If he had always laid the rods before the cattle, there might have been none but spotted, and so Laban have been quite impoverished. Therefore he chose to do it only in their first and prime copulation, which was in the spring-time; and omitted it in the autumn, which was in the fall of the year.

Our famous Mr. Mede follows this interpretation (Discourse xiv. p. 355.) But there is no certainty in it: for Pliny and Columella prefer those begot in autumn to those begot in the spring. And therefore our translation is most proper, which represents Jacob as using this artifice of laying the rods before them, only when the stronger cattle came together, and not when the weaker. And so the LXX. understood the words, without respect to the former or later breed: and so the Hebrew words import, as Bochartus shows in the place before named (p. 541.)

Ver. 43. The man increased exceedingly, &c.] Some have made it a question, whether he got all these riches honestly; because Laban did not think of his using any art, but only of bare casual productions. But as what was not directly against the contract, may be thought to be allowed by it; so it is certain that Jacob might lawfully take what God bestowed upon him; who seems to have directed him by an angel to use this artifice; or, at least, testified his approbation of it: intending to transfer unto Jacob of the riches of the Egyptians to the Israelites. For the world is his, and the fulness thereof: and he may dispose of everything in it as he pleases.

Maid-servants, &c.] To look after his cattle; and after his camels and asses, which he also purchased.
CHAPTER XXXI.

1 And he heard the words of Laban's sons, saying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our father's; and of that which was our father's hath he gotten all this glory.
2 And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and, behold, it was not toward him as before.
3 And the Lord said unto Jacob, Return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred; and I will be with thee.
4 And Jacob sent and called Rachel and Leah to the field unto his flock.
5 And said unto them, I see your father's countenance, that it is not toward me as before; but the God of my father hath been with me.
6 And ye know that with all my power I have served your father.

Ver. 1. He heard the words of Laban's sons.] Who uttered such discontented or threatening speeches, as made him fear they would fall upon him and do him mischief. This was the first cause of his resolved flight.

Hath taken away all that was our father's,] They speak of him as if he had been a thief; which made him suspect they would use him accordingly.

All this glory.] All these riches (ver. 16).

Ver. 2.] This was the second cause of his resolution to be gone; that he saw by Laban's looks things were not likely to go well with him, if he stayed any longer.

Ver. 3.] This was the third cause, the Divine Majesty appeared to him, and bade him be gone. And as he had his warrant, so he sends it with his promise to protect him in his return to his own country.

Ver. 4. Jacob sent and called Rachel.] Rachel is first mentioned as his chief wife; for so she was in his desigual; and so the posterity of Leah afterward acknowledged, naming her first in the blessing of Ruth, iv. 11.

To the field.] That he might discourse with them privately: fearing also, it is likely, that he might be seized by Laban and his sons, if he went to the house.

Ver. 5. God—hath been with me.] Hath appeared to me (ver. 3), and bid me not fear your father.

Ver. 6. With all my power.] I have omitted nothing that I could do to promote his interest.

Ver. 7. Hath deceived me.] Dealt unjustly with me, in not standing to his agreement.

Changed my wages ten times.] i.e. Very often; as many interpret it from the like expression in other places, particularly Levit. xxxvi. 26, where ten women are put for a great number of women. But others think that he really changed his wages just ten times. For he served him six years, after he made the agreement with him, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 31, &c. And the first year he stood to his bargain; but seeing him thrive exceedingly, he altered the form of their covenants, at the end of that year. And in like manner, every half-year, when the ewes brought forth young ones (which they did twice a-year) and he saw them spotted, he broke his contract, and made a new one, less advantageous to Jacob, sometimes restraining it to one sort of cattle, sometimes; to another, and sometimes not letting him have the whole benefit of his contract. Which is not at all improbable: for Jacob mentions his ill dealing with him in the very same words (ver. 41). And in the next verse to this he relates how Laban would sometimes let him only have the spotted; at another time, none but the ring-straked; and so we may suppose of the rest. See note on ver. 27.

Ver. 8.] God suffered him not to hurt me.] To defraud me of my wages, by these changes which he made in them.

Ver. 9.] He prudently conceals his own artifice, and only relates what hand God had in the business (which indeed was the chief, for without his blessing it could not have prospered), for fear perhaps that they should any way divulge it, and bring him into danger with Laban. For everybody cannot keep a secret (the Hebrews make too severe and foolish reflections on women upon this occasion); and his whole estate depending on this, he thought it best to keep it to himself for the present.

Ver. 10.] To confirm them in their opinion, that the hand of God had transfixed all the riches of their father unto him, he relates what was represented to him in a dream.

The rams that leaped, &c.] He beheld them as he had agreed to have for his hire; and therefore likely to produce others spotted, and streaked, like themselves. According to the common observation of the poet:

"Sic carulos canibus similis, sic matribus hodos."

For in the Hebrew, the words ring-straked and speckled, may be referred to the ewes as well as to the rams. And it is probable he had this vision before he made this agreement with Laban; whereby he was directed to the artifice of which he made use; or else God represented to him afterward that he approved it, and would make it successful.

Grisled. This word (barud) is not used before; but I took notice of it in the foregoing chapter (ver. 32), that it signifies as much as great white or gray spots, like to hailstones. It is just the quite contrary to narkod, speckled or sprinkled with little black spots, which were upon the sheep that were white; as they 12 And he said, Lift up now thine eyes, and see, all the rams which leap upon the cattle are ringstraked, speckled, and grisled: for I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee.

13 I am the God of Beth-el, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowest a vow unto me: now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred.

Ver. 14. And Rachel and Leah answered and said unto him, Is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's house?

15 Are we not counted of him strangers? for we were whithis or grisled spots upon those that were black.

16 [The angel of God spake unto me, &c.] In the name of God, as his ambassador: God being supposed to be present, where his angels, who are his retinue, are said to appear; as I have often noted (see xxviii. 17.)

Ver. 17. Lift up now thine eyes, he said (ver. 10.), that he did lift up his eyes: therefore the meaning here is, as he lifteth up his eyes, what will he see? I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee, &c.

Taken such notice of it that I will do thee right.

Ver. 18. I am the God of Bethel—It is plain by this, that though the angel only appeared (ver. 11.), yet God himself was present and remembered him, how he had appeared unto him in Bethel (xxviii. 11, 12, &c.), and how Jacob had anointed the pillar, and vowed a vow unto him. So Maimonides explains it: for Jacob, no doubt, saith he, made the vow to God, and not to the angel: and therefore the angel (as he understands it) speaks here in the name of God and not of himself (More Neboch. par. i. cap. 27.). See ch. xxii. 11, 15. But I see no reason why we should not suppose the Divine Majesty himself to have appeared also, as he did at Bethel: when Jacob saw the angels ascending and descending upon the ladder, and the Lord himself standing at the top, and speaking to him, as he doth here.

For upon a serious consideration of all the circumstances, this vision, here mentioned, seems to me to be distinct from what was represented by an angel in a dream (ver. 11.). For it is not quite evident, at the beginning of his last six years' service: this, at the conclusion of them; and he put them both together, because they belong to the same matter.

And God now remembers his vow, to show him that he was well pleased with it; and to excite him to perform it, when he had brought him (as he assures him he would) to that place again.

Ver. 14. They immediately consented to go along with him; and not so much as to acquaint their father with it; for they knew he would give them nothing.

Is there yet any portion, &c.] We shall get nothing by staying with him: the reason of which follows.

Ver. 15. Are we not counted of his strangers? &c.] He hath not dealt with us as if we were his children: but as if we were of some other family; whom he had bought and sold again.

Sold us, I] Not so much giving us in marriage, as selling us for the price of Jacob's labour.

Quite devoured also our money.] Kept to himself all the money he got by his service; and given us not a farthing of it.

Ver. 16. For all the riches, &c.] God hath but given us that which was our own; and therefore thou mayest lawfully keep it, and go away with it.

Ver. 17. Jacob rose up.] Prepared himself for the journey.

And set his sons] As was but needful: Reuben, his eldest, being scarce fourteen years old; and Joseph, his youngest, scarce six.

Upon camels.] They used to ride upon camels in the east country; especially when they made long journeys (see xxiv. 10.)

Ver. 18. He carried away all his cattle.] But nothing of Laban's, as Josephus, without any reason, fancy.

Ver. 19. Laban went to shear his sheep.] Which gave Jacob the better opportunity to escape, whilst he was busy about that; and feasting, perhaps, his shearsers.

And Rachel had stolen] In all likelihood his wives returned to the house, to fetch what they had left there, when Jacob sent to speak with them in the field (ver. 4.), and then Rachel took away these images.

The images that were her father's.] These images in the Hebrew are called teraphim: of which we read very often afterward, in the Holy Scripture. Mercer and Simeon de Muis take it for an exotic word; but others derive it from the Hebrew word reproph, which signifies, to cure or heal; as if these were looked upon as gods, as they were strangers, or of another race, and not as instruments of divination; as Mr. Selden observes (de Dilis Syris Synagog. i. cap. 2), where he shows, that several of the Hebrew doctors take them to have been figures in human shape (1 Sam. xix. 12), made by astrologers to be capable (as they fancied) of the heavenly influences; either to be a phylactery, or an oracle (see lib. i. Histor. Orient. cap. 8).

But the conjecture of Lud. de Dieu upon this place seems to me far more probable, that they were the representations of some angelical powers (teraphim and seraphim being the very same, by the change only of a letter), who, they imagined, had declared the mind of God by them. For, in those countries where the Shechinah, or presence of the Divine Majesty, did not appear, as it did in Abraham's family, they had at least some tradition of it, and of the angels that were its attendants: the resemblance of which they made, in hope they might by that means have a communica-
Rachel had stolen the images that were her father's.
20 And Jacob stole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not that he fled.
21 So he fled with all that he had; and he rose up, and passed over the river, and set his face toward the mount Gilead.
22 And it was told Laban on the third day that Jacob was fled.
23 And he took his brethren with him, and pursued after him seven days' journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead.
24 And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night, and said unto him, Take heed that thou speakest not to Jacob either good or bad.
25 ¶ Then Laban overtook Jacob. Now Jacob had pitched his tent in the mount: and Laban with his brethren pitched in the mount of Gilead.
26 And Laban said to Jacob, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword?

Ver. 22. On the third day] There was such a distance between Jacob's flock and his (xxxi. 36), that he could not hear sooner; especially when he was taken up with other business (ver. 19), and did not make inquiry.

Ver. 23. Took his brethren] Some of his near kindred.

They overtook him.] The Hebrew word imports, they came close up to him.

Ver. 24. And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream, &c.] See concerning this expression, xx. 3.

Speak not to Jacob either good or bad.] About his return to the Syrian. Unto which God charges him, he should neither allure him by promises, nor affright him by threats.

Ver. 25. Then Laban overtook Jacob] This is a different word from that in ver. 23, signifying he came near, or approached just to him; so that they might confer one with another.

Now Jacob had pitched his tent, &c.] For Jacob and Laban had both pitched their tents in the same mount; not far from one another. This Josephus thinks they had done in the evening; when Laban came up so close to him, that if the night had not parted them, they might then have discoursed together; which they did next morning, when they came nearer one to another; after God had warned Laban not to stop his journey.

Here Gilead is redundant, as the word Syrian was before in ver. 20, 24.

Ver. 26. As captives taken with the sword?] As prizes in war, which are wont to be carried off with force and violence.

Ver. 28. Thou hast now done foolishly in so doing.] It seems to pretend, that he would have been very kind to him, if they had parted with mutual consent: and would have him think he had lost, by stealing away, not only the music and merriment (beforementioned, ver. 28), but such gifts as he would have bestowed upon him.

Ver. 29. The God of your father spoke unto me, &c.] There is no ground to think that the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, appeared to him; for we do not read either here or ver. 21 of his seeing any thing, but hearing one speak to him, and that in a dream: who told him, I suppose, that he was the God of Isaac, and of Abraham. Or, if he saw a glorious appearance it was in his sleep only; not when he was awake.

Ver. 31. Because I was afraid.] This is an answer thou wouldest take by force thy daughters from me.

32 With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live: before our brethren discern thou what is thine with me, and take it to thee. For Jacob knew not that Rachel had stolen them.

33 And Laban went into Jacob's tent, and into Leah's tent, and into the two maidservants' tents; but he found them not. Then went he out of Leah's tent, and entered into Rachel's tent.

34 Now Rachel had taken the images, and put them in the camel's furniture, and sat upon them. And Laban searched all the tent, but found them not.

35 And she said to her father, Let it not displease my lord that I cannot rise up before thee; for the custom of women is upon me. And he searched, but found not the images.

36 ¶ And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban: and Jacob answered and said to Laban, What is my trespass? what is my sin, that thou hast so hotly pursued after me?

37 Whereas thou hast searched all my stuff, what hast thou found of all thy household stuff? set it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both.

to the first part of Laban's expostulation (ver. 26, 27, &c.)

Ver. 32. With whomsoever thou findest, &c.] This is an answer to the last part of it. From which some gather, that theft was punished with death in those days. Sacrilege perhaps was.

Ver. 33. Laban went into Jacob's tent, &c.] This shows that men and women had every one of them their distinct tents, apart by themselves: as was noted before, xxiv. ult.

Ver. 34. Camel's furniture.] The saddle upon which they rode, or laid their carriage.

Search all the tents.] Except that place where she sat.

Ver. 35. Let it not displease, &c.] She begs his pardon that she did not stand up to do him reverence, as became a child to her father: and excuses it, by an infirmity which was upon her.

And he searched.] He looked all about the place where she sat.

Ver. 36. Jacob answered and said, &c.] He proceeded farther in his answer; and expostulates with Laban, as he had done with him: setting forth the causelessness of his pursuit, the injustice of charging him with theft, and all his unkind usage of him, from the time he came to him, till his departure; notwithstanding his faithful services, which he represents most admirably.

Ver. 37. Thy eyes and thy she-goats have not cast their young.] I looked so carefully after them, and such was the blessing of God upon my care, none of them miscarried. A most high commendation of his service. Who would not have valued such a servant, for whose sake God bestowed such an unwonted fecundity upon Laban's flock?

The rams of thy flock have I not eaten.] Under rams are comprehended the lambs also: for if he had eaten any of them, it had been no great commendation to abstain from the rams. But he contented himself with pulse, or such-like mean diet, to promote his master's profit.

Ver. 39. That which was torn of beasts, &c.] And that also which was stolen by theft, was not brought to Laban's account; but Jacob made them good. Which was not only an unjust exactation, but an inhuman 38 This twenty years have I been with thee; thy ewes and thy she-goats have not cast their young, and the rams of thy flock have I not eaten.

39 That which was torn of beasts I brought not unto thee; I bare the loss of it; of my hand didst thou require it, whether stolen by day, or stolen by night.

40 Thus I was; in the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes.

41 Thus have I been twenty years in thy house; I served thee fourteen years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy cattle: and thou hast changed my wages ten times.

42 Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty. God hath seen mine affliction and the labour of my hands, and rebuked thee yesternight.

43 ¶ And Laban answered and said unto Jacob, These daughters are my daughters, and these children are my children, and these cattle are my cattle, and all that thou seest is mine: and what can I do this day unto these my daughters, or unto their children which they have born?

man: for the most careful shepherd in the world could not have his eye everywhere to prevent such things, especially in the dark; as it follows.

Whether stolen by day, or stolen by night.] A most barbarous usage of a nephew and a son-in-law, to make him pay for that which wild beasts devoured, or thieves stole, against his will; when nobody could see their approach in the night. Some question where Jacob got money to pay for them. But it is to be considered, that he did not come quite unprovided from his father's house; with which also, we may reasonably think, he still held some correspondence.

Ver. 40. Thus I was; in the day the drought, &c.] While I served thee, the heat consumed me in the daytime, and the frost appalled me by night. For in these countries shepherds were wont to watch their flocks; especially about the time that ewes were likely to yeat: as we read Luke ii. 8 (see Bochart in his Hierozoic, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44).

My sleep departed from mine eyes.] Many times he took no rest; being awakened by wild beasts, or by thieves, or kept awake by his great solicitude for his flock.

Ver. 41. Thus have I been twenty years in thy house.] This hath been my manner of life, for no less than twenty years, that I have been a servant in thy family.

Ver. 42. The fear of Isaac.] The God whom Isaac feared; that is, worshipped: as the Chaldee interprets it.

Thou hast sent me away now empty.] Without goods, wives, or children: for he seems to have been so barbarous, that if he had been left to himself, he would have made them all his slaves.

God hath seen mine affliction.] How ill thou hast treated me; and taken care to relieve me. For so the word signifies in many places; particularly xvi. 13.

Ver. 43. These cattle are my cattle, &c.] Because they belonged to his daughters, and their children, therefore he calls them his. That is, now he is in a good mood, and pretends the same care of every thing that Jacob had, as if it were his own. So it follows.

And what can I do this day unto these my daugh-44 Now therefore come thou, let us make a covenant, I and thou; and let it be for a witness between me and thee.

45 And Jacob took a stone, and set it up for a pillar.

46 And Jacob said unto his brethren, Gather stones; and they took stones, and made an heap: and they did eat there upon the heap.

47 And Laban called it Jegar-sahadutha: but Jacob called it Galeed.

48 And Laban said, This heap be a witness between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called Galeed;

49 And Mizpah: for he said, The Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another.

50 If thou shalt afflict my daughters, or if thou shalt take other wives beside my daughters, no man is with us; see, God is witness betwixt me and thee.

ters, &c.] How can I do them any harm, when they are so very dear to me?

Ver. 44. Let us make a covenant, &c.] Enter into a strict league, by some monument or other: that shall remain as a testimony of our friendship.

Ver. 45. Set it up for a pillar.] For a monument of what Laban desired.

Ver. 46. Jacob said unto his brethren, Gather stones, &c.] He prays every one whom Laban had brought with him, to bring a stone; and they did so, and laid them together on a heap; which was flat at the top like a table; so that they did eat upon it the next morning (ver. 54).

Ver. 47. And Laban called it Jegar-sahadutha, &c.] One of them gave it a Syriac name, signifying the heap of testimony: the other a Hebrew, signifying the heap of witness. For gal is a heap in Hebrew, and ed, a witness. These two languages were different; but not so much as that they did not understand one another, as appears by the whole story.

Ver. 48. This heap be a witness between me and thee this day.] It shall remain as a monument, that we agree not to transgress these bounds; as it is explained, ver. 52.

Ver. 49. Mizpah.] A watch-tower. This shows that Laban understood Hebrew as well as Syriac: or, rather, that these were two dialects; which differed in pronunciation, and in many words (as those mentioned ver. 47), but in most had the same common to them both.

The Lord watch between me and thee.] Observe how we behave ourselves, when we cannot see one another. Here he uses the name of Jehovah; which shows he was acquainted with the religion of Jacob, as well as his language: and worshipped, it is likely, the Lord of heaven and earth; though not without some superstitious mixtures.

Ver. 50. If thou shalt afflict my daughters, &c.] It seems to be a short form of speech, importing, God who observes all things will punish thee for it.

If thou shalt take other wives beside my daughters, &c.] Which might have been worse for them and their posterity: and therefore he lays this restraint upon him. No man is with us, &c.] Though here be no man beside ourselves, to be witness of this agreement; yet consider that God (which is infinitely more) knows it, and will punish him that transgresses it.

In these two last verses he discourses very religiously; which revived also his natural affection to his children.

Ver. 52. This heap be witness, and this pillar be 51 And Laban said to Jacob, Behold this heap, and behold this pillar, which I have cast betwixt me and thee;

52 This heap be witness, and this pillar be witness, that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap and this pillar unto me, for harm.

53 The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their father, judge betwixt us. And Jacob swear by the fear of his father Isaac.

54 Then Jacob offered sacrifices upon the mount, and called his brethren to eat bread: and they did eat bread, and tarried all night in the mount.

55 And early in the morning Laban rose up, and kissed his sons and his daughters, and blessed them; and Laban departed, and returned unto his place.

witness, &c.] It seems that Laban and his company set up a heap, made of the stones which every one brought; and Jacob set up one single large stone (ver. 15) in the form of a pillar. And it is likely his pillar looked towards the land of Canaan; and their heap towards the land of Haran.

That I will not pass over this heap, &c.] As stones were set in the confines of fields to be boundaries, and landmarks (as we call them) to distinguish men's possessions, and limit them from encroaching one upon another; so were this heap and this pillar intended to be in the nature of such boundaries; beyond which neither of them should pass armed, to offend the other.

Ver. 55. The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor.] These two were brethren (for he doth not mean, sure, their grandfather, the father of Terah, xi. 24), and before Abraham was called out of Ur, they both worshipped other gods (Jesh. xxiv. 2). But then Abraham renounced these gods, and worshipped only the Creator of heaven and earth; as Nahor, I have formerly conjectured, also did, when he followed him to Haran. Therefore, I think, we need not make a question by which of Abraham's gods Laban now swears: for I take him to have been bred up in the true religion, which made Abraham desire his son should have a wife out of this family; for which reason Isaac also sent Jacob hither.

The God of their father.] As much as to say, by the God of our ancestors; who, after God's appearing to Abraham and calling him out of his own country, became the worshippers of the Lord of heaven and earth alone (see xi. 31). Jacob swears by the fear of his father Isaac.] By Him whom Isaac worshipped (ver. 43). He mentions the fear of Isaac rather than the God of Abraham, to declare more plainly and undoubtedly by what God he swears. For Abraham had been an idolater; but Isaac never was.

Ver. 54. Jacob offered sacrifice.] Peace-offerings (as they were afterward called), part of which were eaten by him that offered them, and by his friends. This further shows they were of the same religion, by their partaking of the same sacrifice; which Jacob no doubt offered to the true God.

Called his brethren to eat bread.] Invited them to feast with him upon that sacrifice; whereby they confirmed the covenant lately made between them.

Ver. 55. Laban—blessed them.] Prayed God to preserve and prosper them.

Returned unto his place.] viz. Haran.
1 And Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him.

2 And when Jacob saw them, he said, This is God's host: and he called the name of that place Mahanaim.

3 And Jacob sent messengers before him to Esau his brother unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom.

4 And he commanded them, saying, Thus shall ye speak unto my lord Esau; Thy servant Jacob saith thus, I have sojourned with Laban, and stayed there until now:

5 And I have oxen, and asses, flocks, and menservants, and maidservants: and I have sent to tell my lord, that I may find grace in thy sight.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. The angels of God met him.] To encourage and comfort him, with the assurance that God was with him. This is a remarkable passage, showing the singular care God had of him; who, as he appeared to him when he went from Canaan, so now appeared to him again in his return thither, that he might depend upon the promise he then made him (xxviii. 13-15).

Ver. 2. This is God's host.] Which attend upon the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, to execute his commands.

Mahanaim. i.e. Two hosts, or camps, as it is in the margin. Either, because there were several squadrons (as we speak) of the angels, drawn up like an army, ready for his defence; or, because, besides his own family, which was pitched here in order like a camp, there was that of the angels also. The former seems more probable, because this name relates to God's host, mentioned before; which consisted of several troops of angels.

Ver. 3. And Jacob sent messengers before him, &c.] As he was about to pass over Jordan (ver. 10), he sent some to wait upon his brother.

Unto the land of Seir.] Which Esau, it seems, had conquered in Jacob's absence, according to the blessing of his father (xxviii. 40), "By thy sword shalt thou live." This Jacob thought fit to congratulate to him; and at the same time to try how he stood affected towards himself.

The country of Edom.] So it was called in Moses's time.

Ver. 4. Thus shall ye speak to my lord Esau.] He calls him his lord, that he might mollify his anger, if any remained, by humble language. Which sounded as if he had no thoughts of the birthright he had purchased of him. This also was the style wherein others addressed themselves to Esau, after he had won the principality of Seir.

Thy servant Jacob.] These are submissive words also, showing his inferiority.

I have sojourned with Laban, &c.] This hath the same design with the foregoing words; to insinuate that he was much inferior to Esau; having been a servant a long time to Laban.

Ver. 5. And I have oxen, &c.] Yet he adds this, that he was plentifully provided for, lest Esau should think he came a begging, and might prove a burden to him; so the Hebrews understand it. And Maimonides observes, that he mentions only oxen, asses, and flocks (I. c. x. 21, and Gen. xxv. 29), because these were the common possessions of all men, and in all countries that had any thing. But horses and camels were not ordinary goods, but the possessions of a few great persons, and in some countries only (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39). Jacob indeed had camels (ver. 7, 15, and xxxi. 17); but, it is likely, they were not many, and he had no great breed of them.

Menservants and women servants.] These were a part of their possessions, as oxen and sheep were; which they bought and sold; and were nowhere more plentiful than in Syria (from whence Jacob came), if it were then such a country as it was in aftertimes, when the Roman writers say, they were "servituti natii," born to slavery.

That I may find grace in thy sight.] He courts his friendship, and desires he would favour him, and not hinder him in his passage to their old father.

Ver. 6. We come to thy brother Esau, and also he cometh to meet thee.] They reported, no doubt, what he replied to Jacob's message; and this coming to meet him signifies, that he gave them a civil reception, and pretended, at least, to be glad to hear of his brother's return; and therefore prepared to come and welcome him into his own country.

Four hundred men with him.] Nobly attended; partly to show his greatness, and partly to do honour to Jacob by a public salutation.

Ver. 7. Then Jacob was greatly afraid, &c.] Being conscious to himself what cause Esau had not to love him. If one interpreted his coming to meet him, with such a number, otherwise than it was represented. The vision of angels, indeed, who met him (ver. 1), might have fortified him against all fear of Esau's meeting him; but the first motions of such passions cannot always be prevented.

He divided the people that was with him, &c.] Put his family and all belonging to him in as good a posture as he was able.

Ver. 9. O God of my father Abraham, &c.] As he had prudently disposed of all things for the preservation of his family, at least of some of them, so he addresses himself to God (of whose goodness both Abraham and 10 I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast shewed unto thy servant; for with my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands.

11 Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau; for I fear him, lest he will come and smite me, and the mother with the children.

12 And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude.

13 ¶ And he lodged there that same night; and took of that which came to his hand a present for Esau his brother;

14 Two hundred she goats, and twenty he goats, two hundred ewes, and twenty rams, 15 Thirty milch camels with their colts, forty kine, and ten bulls, twenty she asses, and ten foals.

16 And he delivered them into the hand of his servants, every drove by themselves; and said unto his servants, Pass over before me, and put a space betwixt drove and drove.

17 And he commanded the foremost, saying, When Esau my brother meeteth thee, and asketh thee, saying, Whose art thou? and whither goest thou? and whose are these before thee?

18 Then thou shalt say, They be thy servant Jacob's; it is a present sent unto my lord Esau:

19 And so commanded he the second, and the third, and all that followed the droves, saying, On this manner shall ye speak unto Esau, when ye find him.

20 And say ye moreover, Behold, thy servant Jacob is behind us. For he said, I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; and peradventure he will accept of me.

21 So went the present over before him: and himself lodged that night in the company.

22 And he rose up that night, and took his two wives, and his two womenservants, and his eleven sons, and passed over the ford Jabbok.

23 And he took them, and sent them over the brook, and sent over that he had.

24 ¶ And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day.

Ver. 15. Milch came's] Who had lately foaled: for nothing was more delicious in those countries (as Bochart observes out of Aristotle, Pliny, and many other authors, 1b. lib. ii. cap. 2) than camels' milk.

Ver. 18. It is a present'] With which he hoped to sweeten him; there being a great power in gifts to win men's hearts, even when they are affected as the wise man observes in many places (Prov. xvii. 8, xviii. 16. &c.).

Ver. 21. Lodged that night in the company.] Or, camp, i.e. where he pitched the tents for his family.

Ver. 22. He rose up that night,] Before it was day; in the last watch of the night.

4 His eleven sons,] i.e. All his children: for the daughter is comprehended.

Passed over the ford Jabbok.] This was a little river flowing from the country of the Ammonites, and falling into Jordan, where it comes out of the lake Geneareth. It was in one place fordable; and there Jacob first passed over himself, to try the depth of it.

Ver. 23. Having tried the ford, he returned; and caused them all to pass over; and so (as it follows) was left alone, on the east side of the brook.

Ver. 24. There wrestled a man with him.] He stayed alone, in all likelihood, that he might commence himself and his family to God, by earnest prayer: which seems to be confirmed by the prophet Hosea, xii. 4. And as he was praying, or when he had done, a man encountered him, with whom he grappled; taking him, perhaps, for some of Esau's attendants come to surprise him. For it was so dark, that he could not see what kind of acquaintance he had; or, if he could, angels were sent to appear so like to men, that at the first they did not discern the differ-
25 And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wrestled with him.

26 And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh. And he said, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.

27 And he said unto him, What is thy name? And he said, Jacob.

28 And he said, Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed.

29 And Jacob asked him, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name. And he said, Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name? And he blessed him there.

30 And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel: for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved.

31 And as he passed over Peniel the sun rose upon him, and he halted upon his thigh.

32 Therefore the children of Israel eat not of that import (as imports) with God, and with men, &c. That is, hast shown such an heroic spirit (as we speak) in this combat, that thou needest not fear Esau and all his followers: this victory is an assurance that thou shalt get the better of him.

There is nobody skilled in the original language, but easily sees, no other derivation of the name of Israel is to be sought for, but what is contained in this word Scharitha: which gives the reason of it. For sar, as St. Jerome observes, signifies a prince; and the jod in the beginning, is the common note of a proper name. So the meaning of Israel is as much as a prince with God.

Ver. 33. Jacob asked him and said, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name. Jacob having told him his own name, desires him to requite him in the same kind: that thereby he might more certainly know whether he was an angel or a man. For these words seem to demonstrate, he did not think him to be God himself.

Wherefore—dost thou ask after my name?] Do not inquire more into his name. Rashi thinks angels changed their names according to the offices and functions to which they were assigned.

He blessed him there.] Renewed the blessing which God had promised to Abraham and his seed; whereby Jacob was fully satisfied who he was: for he pronounced this blessing in the name of God, from whom he came.

Ver. 30. I have seen God face to face.] Been admitted to the nearest familiarity with him. For he looked upon this angel as a part of the Shechinah; which now also, it is likely, visibly appeared, and made him call this place Peniel, the face of God. Which doth not import that the Shechinah appeared in a human figure (for it never did), but that he looked upon it as a token of the Divine Presence, and that it approached very near him; as when one friend speaks to another face to face, as the ancient phrase was.

My life is preserved.] This is commonly interpreted by the opinion, which was in old time, that if they saw one of the heavenly ministers, they were to be no longer men of this world, but die presently. But it may refer (as Menochius observes) to the principal scope of the combat, which was to confirm Jacob against the fear of Esau: and so the meaning is, I doubt not, I am safe, God will preserve me from any hurt by Esau.

Ver. 31. He halted upon his thigh.] Because the hip-bone was out of its place. Many think this lasted only for a time; and some will have it, that the angel cured him before he got to Esau. But there is no certainty of either of these conjectures.

Ver. 32. The children of Israel eat not of the sinew.] That sinew (or tendon) which fastens the hip-bone in its socket; which comprehends the flesh of that muscle which is composed of it. He that ate of this was to be hewn as the Jewish masters tell us (see Mr. Selden, lib. ii, de Synedriis, p. 552. Hottinger de Leg. Hebr. § 3, Vorstius upon Pirke Eliezer, p. 221).
CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 The kindness of Jacob and Esau at their meeting. 17 Jacob cometh to Succoth. 18 At Shalem he buyeth a field, and buildeth an altar called Ed-elohe-Israel.

1 And Jacob lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, Esau came, and with him four hundred men. And he divided the children unto Leah, and unto Rachel, and unto the two handmaids.

2 And he put the handmaids and their children foremost, and Leah and her children after, and Rachel and Joseph hindmost.

3 And he passed over before them, and bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother.

4 And Esau ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him: and they wept.

5 And he lifted up his eyes, and saw the women and the children; and said, Who are those with thee? And he said, The children which God hath graciously given thy servant.

Ver. 1. Jacob lifted up his eyes, &c.] Being come to his family (whom he sent before him over the brook, xxxii. 23), and looking about him, he beheld Esau and his train at some distance; and put himself, his wives, and his children, in good order to meet him.

Ver. 2. Joseph hindermost.] As more dear to him than any of the rest: for he did not yet know that the Messiah was to proceed from Judah, one of the sons of Leah.

Ver. 3. He passed over before them.] Put himself in the front of them.

Bowed himself to the ground seven times.] At some distance he began to bow: and so, at every other step, or more, he bowed again (seven times) till he came near to his brother. This was to testify the great honour he had for him: and to take out of Esau's mind all suspicion, that he looked upon himself as the elder brother.

Ver. 4. Esau ran to meet him.] This declares the forwardness of his affection: which would not let him proceed so ceremoniously as Jacob did.

Kissed him.] This word is marked in the Hebrew text (as fourteen other words in the Bible are) with four unusual points over it: to denote, as the Hebrew doctors think, some remarkable thing: which some of them take to be, the sincerity of Esau's reconciliation to his brother. And truly, if he heartily pardoned the injury, which he conceived Jacob had done him, it is much to be noted; and ought to be looked upon as a sign he was become a good man. And so Mart. Bacher, I remember, understood it, in his Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans: where he makes this an argument that Esau was not a reprobate, as some are apt to imagine. If it be said that God deterred him from doing his brother any hurt, it is more than can be proved. For it is recorded indeed that God threatened Laban in such a manner, that he durst not meddle with him: but no such thing is said of Esau, though it would have been of more concern to have recorded the same here, if Moses had known of any such Divine appariation to him.

27. (as he called himself ver. 5), so he still honours Esau by the name of his lord.

Ver. 9. I have enough, my brother, &c.] In this he shows himself not to be of a covetous humour: but as free from that vice as from revenge.

Ver. 10. If now I have found grace in thy sight.] If thou lovest me.

As though I had seen the face of God.] For Esau's kind reception of him, he could not but look upon as a token of the Divine favour towards him. Some think by God may be meant an angel, or great man: into whose presence, inferiors, as I said, were wont to approach with presents.

Thou wast pleased with me.] Received me kindly.

Ver. 11. Take—my blessing.] i.e. My present, as we expound it in the margin of 1 Sam. xxv. 27.

I have enough.] It is a larger word in the Hebrew than that used by Esau, ver. 9, signifying that he had the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank.

brought to thee; because God hath dealt graciously with me, and because I have enough.
And he urged him, and he took it.
12 And he said, Let us take our journey, and let us go, and I will go before thee.
13 And he said unto him, My lord knoweth that the children are tender, and the flocks and herds with young are with me: and if men should overdrive them one day, all the flock will die.
14 Let my lord, I pray thee, pass over before his servant: and I will lead on softly, according as the cattle goeth before me and the children be able to endure, until I come unto my lord unto Seir.
15 And Esau said, Let me now leave with thee some of the folk that are with me. And enough to spare of all sorts of things: and therefore Esau needed not fear his impoverishment, by accepting this present.
16 And he said, Let us take our journey, &c.] Esau invites him to go along with him, to the land of Seir, and there refresh himself.
17 I will go before thee.] Show thee the way, and conduct thee.
18. 13. He said unto him, &c.] i.e. Jacob said this in exence, that he could not go so fast as Esau; and therefore desired to follow after by easy journeys.
Children are tender.] Joseph was not above six or seven years old.
Flocks and herds with young.] The Hebrew word aloth (in 1 Sam. vii. 7), signifies kine that had sucking calves. Unto which sense Bochart inclines in this place; and so do Jonathan, Onkelos, and other ancient interpreters (see his Hierozoe. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 30.)
Are with me.] Must be looked after very carefully.
* All the flock will die.] i.e. All that are big with young; or, have newly brought forth young.
19. 14. I will lead on softly.] Follow thee with a gentle pace; such as the flocks and children can bear.
According as the cattle that goeth before me.] It was observed particularly (xxx. 30), that Maimonides interprets this phrase, leregel, for the sake: and so he understands it here, with respect to the cattle and children (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 28). Or, because of the cattle, &c. that they may not be overdriven.
Until I come unto my lord, unto Seir.] Moses omits this journey to Seir, as he doth his visit to his father; which one cannot think he deferred for so many years, as were between his return to Canaan, and the mention of his coming to Mamre (xxxv. 27). Or, Jacob was hindered, perhaps, by something which he could not foresee, from performing this promise to his brother: of which, no doubt, he gave him an account, that he might not be thought to break his word.
15. Let me now leave with thee, &c.] He would have left some of his followers with Jacob, to show him the way, and to be a guard to him; or honourably attend him.
16. Let me find grace in the sight of my lord.] In this also be so kind as to gratify my desire (xxxiv. 11).
17. Esau returned that day.] The same day they met together; because he would not be a burden to Jacob.
18. Journeyed to Succoth.] After he had been with his brother in Seir, if he did follow him thither; he said, What needest it? let me find grace in the sight of my lord.
19. So Esau returned that day on his way unto Seir.
20. And Jacob journeyed to Succoth, and built him an house, and made booths for his cattle: therefore the name of the place is called Succoth.
21. And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, when he came from Padan-aram; and pitched his tent before the city.
22. And he bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor, Shechem's father, for an hundred pieces of money.
23. And he erected there an altar, and called it El-eleh-Isralee.
CHAPTER XXXIV.

1 Dinah is ravished by Shechem. 4 He saith to marry her. 13 The sons of Jacob offer the condition of circumcision to the Shechemites. 20 Hamor and Shechem persuade them to accept it. 25 The sons of Jacob upon that advantage slay them, 27 and spoil their city.

1 And Dinah the daughter of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land.

2 And when Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, saw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled her.

3 And his soul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved the damsel, and spake kindly unto the damsel.

4 And Shechem spake unto his father Hamor, saying, Get me this damsel to wife.

5 And Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter: now his sons were with his cattle in the field: and Jacob held his peace until they were come.

6 ¶ And Hamor the father of Shechem went out unto Jacob to commune with him.

7 And the sons of Jacob came out of the field when they heard it: and the men were grieved, and they were very wroth, because he had wrought folly in Israel in lying with Jacob's daughter; which thing ought not to be done.

8 And Hamor communed with them, saying, The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter: I pray you give her him to wife.

9 And make ye marriages with us, and give your daughters unto us, and take our daughters unto you.

10 And ye shall dwell with us: and the land shall be before you; dwell and trade ye therein, and get you possessions therein.

11 And Shechem said unto his father and unto his brethren, Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye shall say unto me I will give.

12 Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife.

13 And the sons of Jacob answered Shechem treating, in came Jacob's sons: who, hearing how their sister had been abused, were very much afflicted, and no less angry.

Wrought folly in Israel? Or, against Israel. Committed a wickedness, highly to the disgrace and injury of Israel's family.

Which thing ought not to be done. Contrary to the law of nations; that a virgin should be violated without punishment. So Rasi.

Ver. 8. Hamor communed with them. With the whole family, Jacob, Leah, and Dinah's brethren.

Longeth. Is extremely in love.

For your daughter. The daughter of Jacob and Leah, unto whom he speaks in the presence of her brethren.

Ver. 9. Make ye marriages with us, &c. Become one people with us (ver. 16).

Ver. 10. Ye shall dwell with us. Settle yourselves among us.

The land shall be before you. In any part of our country.

Dwell. He repeats it again, to beget in them a confidence of a settlement among them; in the enjoyment of all their rights and privileges; as much as if they had been natives.

Trade ye. Exercise what traffic you please upon and down the country, without any let or impediment.

Get you possessions therein. Purchase land.

Ver. 11. Let me find grace in your eyes. Grant this petition, which my father makes in my behalf (xxxiii. 15).

What ye shall say unto me, &c. Make your own terms, I will agree to them.

Ver. 12. Ask me never so much dowry and gift. This shows more fully, that the custom of those times was (as was noted upon xxix. 18) for men to give money for their wives. But there was a greater reason for a dowry now, and a large one too; that he might make compensation for the wrong he had done. For there was a natural equity in those laws of Moses (Exod. xxii. 16; Deut. xxii. 28), by which men were bound to make satisfaction to the fathers; and Hamor his father deceitfully, and said, because he had defiled Dinah their sister:

14 And they said unto him, We cannot do this thing, to give our sister to one that is uncircumcised; for that were a reproach unto us:

15 But in this will we consent unto you: If ye will be as we be, that every male of you be circumcised;

16 Then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people.

17 But if ye will not hearken unto us, to be circumcised; then will we take our daughter, and we will be gone.

18 And their words pleased Hamor, and Shechem Hamor's son.

19 And the young man deferred not to do the thing, because he had delight in Jacob's daughter: and he was more honourable than all the house of his father.

20 ¶ And Hamor and Shechem his son came unto the gate of their city, and communed with the men of their city, saying, if, either by incitement or violence, they had abused their daughters.

Dowry and gift seem to be distinct things: the dowry being given to the parents, the gift to the kindred.

Ver. 13.] Hence some infer, that, by the custom of those days, the consent of the brethren was required rather than the parents: for the sons of Jacob here make the contract, as Laban had done with Abraham's servant (xxiv. 50). But it is more reasonable to think, that Jacob left it to them to consider what was fit to be done in a matter which required great deliberation, and then to report their opinion to him, who had the greatest interest in her, and right to dispose of her.

Ver. 14. We cannot do this thing. It is against our religion. Which was partly true; for though Jacob himself had married one whose father was uncircumcised (as Isaac had done before him), yet by degrees this opinion prevailed among them, till it was established by the law of Moses.

Ver. 15. In this will we consent unto you. They plead honour as well as conscience.

Ver. 16. In this will we consent unto you. Upon these terms we will agree to the match.

Ver. 17. By this it appears they treated in their father's name, as was noted before, ver. 13.

Ver. 18. It may seem strange they should so easily consent to be circumcised, till we consider how passionately Shechem loved Dinah, and the great affection Hamor had to Shechem: who was his beloved son (ver. 19). Besides, this was but a poor prince, and his city little and mean: which he thought to enrich and strengthen by Jacob's family (who were very wealthy) being incorporated with them (ver. 22).

Ver. 19. He was more honourable. In greater esteem with his father, and all the family, than any other belonging to it.

Ver. 20. Came unto the gate of their city. Where all public affairs were transacted.

And communed with the men of their city. Such great matters could not be concluded without the public consent (see xxiii. 18, xxix. 22).

Ver. 21. These men are peaceable. They use many arguments to persuade the people to consent: and the first is, that the Israelites had hitherto lived offensively among them.

Let them dwell in the land, and trade therein.] By a public decree, or law.

For the land—is large enough. This is the second argument: which was land enough in their country uncultivated, which these men would improve.

Ver. 23. This is the greatest argument of all; taken from the profit they should have by them; the gain of no less than all they had. Which is not to be understood as if they intended to overpower them, and seize upon all their stock; but that by intermarriages, their estates would be inherited by them, as much as by the Israelites.

Ver. 24. All that went out of the gate of his city. i.e. All the citizens (xxiii. 18) who were met together in the common-hall (or place of public assemblies), and were soon persuaded to yield to the reasons which had persuaded their rulers.

Ver. 25. On the third day, when they were sore. And began to be a little feverish. For the greatest pain and anguish, the Jews observe, was upon the third day after circumcision, which very much indisposed them (see Pirke Eliezer, cap. 29, and Vorstius's Annotations, p. 195). And indeed Hippocrates observes the same of all wounds and ulcers; that they are the most inflamed, by a confux of sharp humours in them.

Two of the sons of Jacob. &c. With their servants: for they two alone could not destroy a whole city, though but small.

Slew all the males. The women and children in those days were always spared in the most deadly wars: as when the Midianites were killed, Numb. xxxi. 7, 9, and the Edomites, 1 Kings xi. 16. CHAPTER XXXV.

27 The sons of Jacob came upon the slain, and spoiled the city, because they had defiled their sister.

28 They took their sheep, and their oxen, and their asses, and that which was in the city, and that which was in the field.

29 And all their wealth, and all their little ones, and their wives took they captive, and spoiled even all that was in the house.

(who were able to bear arms) came after the slaughter, and helped to plunder the city. Thus they were all involved in the guilt, which was very great and manifold; as Bonfrerius, and, out, of him, Menochius, have observed.

Because they had defiled] Their prince had defiled her: whose fact, it seems, they did not disapprove: and therefore it is imputed to them all, as the cause of their slaughter.

Ver. 28. They took their sheep, &c.] It is a reasonable conjecture of Bonfrerius, that Jacob caused all these to be restored to the wives and children of the slain, whom he set at liberty.

Spoiled even all that was in the house.] Of Hamor and Shechem: which, perhaps, they kept to themselves, in compensation of the wrong he had done; and none of the family, perhaps, surviving to own them.

Ver. 30. Ye have troubled me.] Disturbed my quiet, and made it unsafe for me to live in this country; where I hoped to have settled.

28 And Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, Ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land, among the Canaanites and the Perizzites: and being few in number, they shall gather themselves together against me, and slay me; and I shall be destroyed, I and my house.

31 And they said, Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot?

Made me to stink, &c.] Made me odious to all the country, as a murderer, a robber, and a breaker of my faith.

Ver. 31. Should he deal with our sister as with a harlot?] As with a common whore, that prostituted herself to his lust? If she had done so, there had been no ground for their quarrel (according to the Hebrew doctors), because Shechem had not then offended against the laws of the sons of Noah (as they speak), i.e. the right of nations: which was not violated by a man's lying with a single woman, by her free consent. But Dinah being forced and violently ravished (as they take the sense of ver. 2 to be), they tell their father they might right themselves by making war upon them. For there was no other way to deal with princes, whom they could not implead in any court; and therefore betook themselves to arms (see Mr. Selden, lib. vii. de Jure N. et G. justa Hebr. cap. 5).

CHAPTER XXXV.

1 God sendeth Jacob to Beth-el. 2 He purgeth his house of idols. 6 He buildeth an altar at Beth-el. 8 Deborah dieth at Allan-bachuth. 9 God blesseth Jacob at Beth-el. 16 Rachel travaileth of Benjamin, and dieth in the way to Edar. 22 Reuben lieth with Bilhah. 23 The sons of Jacob. 27 Jacob cometh to Isaac at Hebron. 28 The age, death, and burial of Isaac.

1 And God said unto Jacob, Arise, go up to Beth-el, and dwell there: and make there an altar unto God, that appeared unto thee when thou fleddest from the face of Esau thy brother.

2 Then Jacob said unto his household, and to all that were with him, Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean, and change your garments:

3 And let us arise, and go up to Beth-el; and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress, and was with me in the way which I went.

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1. God said unto Jacob.] There were several ways, as Maimonides observes, whereby God communicated himself to the prophets. Unto whom he is said sometimes, to speak by an angel in a dream, as he did to Jacob, xxxi. 11. Sometimes by an angel, without any mention how it was, whether in a dream or vision, or not: of which he takes this place to be an instance; and verse the tenth of this chapter, and xxxii. 15. Thirdly. In other places there is no mention of an angel, but of God alone speaking; yet in a vision, or dream, xv. 1. And, lastly, God is said to speak absolutely, neither in a dream, nor vision, nor by angel, xii. 1, xxxi. 3 (More Neevechim, parii, cap. 42). In which classes I think he might have put this apporation to Jacob, as well as that last mentioned; for there is no difference between them but this, that in the former place (xxxi. 3) it is said, The Lord said unto Jacob; and here, God said unto Jacob.

Go up to Beth-el, and dwell there.] By this advice God showed he still took care of him; and delivered him from the fear he was in of the Canaanites and Perizzites, who, one would think, detested the fact of Shechem; or, else it may seem strange that they did not immediately cut off Jacob and his family, who had taken such a terrible revenge for it; but let them remove quietly to Bethel. But Moses gives us the true reason of this, ver. 5.

Make there an altar.] Perform a vow which thou madest in that place (xxviii. 20—22). Some wonder Jacob made no more haste to this place, after his return to his own country (for now he had been about nine years in Canaan), and some of the Hebrew doctors fancy God punished him for deferring so long to go thither (where he promised to worship him, if he prospered his journey and brought him back again in safety), by suffering his daughter Dinah to be ravished. But it is more probable that he met with obstructions, which made it not safe for him, as yet, to go thither; or, that he waited till God, who had conducted him hitherto, should direct him to take his journey to that place. For, it is very probable, he inquired of him about his removal.

Ver. 2. Then Jacob said unto his household, &c.] Being to perform a solemn sacrifice to God, he calls upon his family to prepare themselves for it.

All that were with him.] Hired servants who lived with him.
GENESIS.

4 And they gave unto Jacob all the strange gods which were in their hand, and all their earrings which were in their ears; and Jacob hid them under the oak which was by Shechem.

5 And they journeyed: and the terror of God was upon the cities that were round about them, and they did not pursue after the sons of Jacob.

6 ¶ So Jacob came to Luz, which is in the land of Canaan, that is, Beth-el, he and all the people that were with him.

Put away the strange gods.] Rachel had her father’s teraphim, which now, it is to be supposed, she confessed. And he suspected there might be some among the men-servants and maid-servants he brought with him out of Mesopotamia (xxxii. 5), where there was much superstition; and that in the sacking of Shechem they might bring away some images with them (in Silver and gold) which they kept secretly among them.

Be clean.] Wash your bodies, as Aben Ezra truly interprets it: for this was the ancient rite of cleansing. Wherein he seems to have followed Jonathan, who thus paraphrases it, “Purify yourselves from the pollution of the slain, whom ye have touched;” referring it to the foregoing slaughter of the people of Shechem.

Change your garments.] Put on clean clothes. Which was but a reasonable injunction, being to appear before the Divine Majesty; in whose presence it was rudeness to be seen in sordid raiment; especially in those wherein they had newly defiled themselves by sacrifice. The case is as in our own countries, that there are conspicuous customs, which their godly ancestors had observed, from the beginning of offering solemn sacrifices. It being very unseemly to appear before a great man in dirty apparel, or with a sweaty body. And I do not see why we should not look upon these as an external profession of the like purity in their minds and hearts. All nations retained these usances and solemn raiment, when they performed the solemn offices of religion: which were not derived from idolaters, but from the purest antiquity.

Ver. 4. They gave unto Jacob all the strange gods.] Which, it seems by this expression, were numerous. Their earrings which were in their ears?] In the ears of the idols; for there was no harm in theearing them. Indeed, there is no just reason for doubting that those earrings which were ornaments, there were others worn in the nature of amulets; or for some other superstitious uses, having the effigies of some god or other; or some symbolical notes, in which they fancied there was some power to preserve them from several miscarriages. Maimonides, in his book of Idolatry, cap. 7, mentions such idolatrical rings, as were utterly unlawful to be used; and vessels marked with the image of the sun, the moon, or a dragon: which were symbols of divinity among the heathens; who made marks also in several parts of their bodies.

Jacob hid them.] Buried them in the earth; after he had first broken them in pieces (as some think), or melted them, as Moses and Hezekiah did, Exod. xxxii. 30; 2 Kings xviii. 4. Which, if it be true, it is but a tale which is told of the Samaritans; that they dugged up these idols and worshipped them (see Hohninger, Sogmam Orient. p. 339).

Under the oak which was by Shechem.] It was so usual among them to keep this as a ground for their opinion, who think this was the same oak mentioned in Josh. xxiv. 36. For he intended to abolish the memory of these idols; and therefore hid them where he thought nobody would find them.

7 And he built there an altar, and called the place El-beth-el: because there God appeared unto him, when he fled from the face of his brother.

8 But Deborah Rebekah’s nurse died, and she was buried beneath Beth-el under an oak: and the name of it was called Allon-bachuth.

9 ¶ And God appeared unto Jacob again, when he came out of Padan-aram, and blessed him.

10 And God said unto him, Thy name is Ja-

It took up some time to do all this; and yet the people of the land did not fall upon Jacob’s family; the providence of God watching over him, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 5.] Here is the true reason why the country did not at least fall upon the rea of Jacob’s family, when they marched away; because God made a promise to him, and he desired to live with his wives (which I would guess by this) had an inclination to be revenged for the destruction of Shechem. For though they could not justify the fact of Shechem; yet they might think Jacob’s sons too cruel in the punishment of it: for their own father was of that opinion.

Ver. 6. So Jacob came to Luz.] See xxviii. 19.

Ver. 7.] They were all then together, the national sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, for performing his promise to him, beseeching him still to continue his care of him.

Ver. 8. Deborah, Rebekah’s nurse, died.] She went to attend Rebekah, when she was married to Isaac: which troubled the Jews to give an account how she came here, to Jacob’s family. R. Solomon solves it thus: that Rebekah having promised Jacob when he went away, to send for him (xxvii. 45), she performed this promise by Deborah: whom she sent to Padan-aram to invite him home, and in her return she died here. But it is more reasonable to suppose that Jacob had been at his father’s house before this time; and Rebekah being dead (whether before or after is uncertain); he returned to his family, and his wives, who were her countrywomen: and that her death is here mentioned (though we read nothing of Rebekah’s) to give an account how this oak came by the name of Allon-bachuth, in aftertimes.

Under an oak:] There were many about Bethel, near to which there was a wood, or forest; out of which the bear came which devoured Elisha (2 Kings ii. 23). And under an oak also the old prophet found the man of God sitting, as he went from Bethel (1 Kings xiii. 14).

Ver. 9.] The Shechemiah, or Divine Majesty, who bade him go to Bethel (ver. 1), appeared to him when he came there, in a most glorious manner: as he had done after he had lodged there in his journey to Padan-aram (xxviii. 13).

Ver. 10. Israel shall be thy name.] This is a far more honourable name than that of Jacob: and therefore by it thou shalt be commonly called. For the name of Jacob was given him from the supplanting of his brother, and getting the advantage of him; but this of Israel from his prevalence over the angel of God. He called his name Israel.] He solemnly confirmed that name, which was given him before by his angel (xxxi. 28).

This seems to me to prove that it was no more than an angel who wrestled with Jacob, and told him his name should be changed. For, if it had been God himself, Jacob was as much satisfied when he gave him his name. But I take it, God reserved the declaration of it from his own mouth, till this time: when he ratified what he had before spoken by his angel.
15 And Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him, Beth-el.
16 ¶ And they journeyed from Beth-el; and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath; and Rachel travailed, and she had hard labour.
17 And it came to pass, when she was in hard labour, that the midwife said unto her, Fear not; thou shalt have this son also.
18 And it came to pass, as her soul was in departing, (for she died) that she called his name Benoni: but his father called him Benjamin.
19 And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Beth-lehem.
20 And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel’s grave unto this day.

Ephrath. The Hebrew word for a little is chibzath, whose precise signification is uncertain. Benjamin Tudelenis saith, this place was within half a mile and a little more of Ephrath (see his Itinar. p. 47, and Const. L’Emperour on the place, p. 176).

Ver. 17. Fear not; thou shalt have this son also.] The midwife seems to comfort Rachel with her own prediction (xxx. 24).

Ver. 18. She called his name Benoni.] Rachel seems to give her former hopes of a second son for lost; at least, she expected no comfort from him, being ready to expire. And therefore she called him a son of sorrows; his birth being her death.

But his father called him Benjamin.] To comfort Rachel in her sorrow, and to avert the sinister omen, Jacob immediately changed his name into Benjamin, signifying the son of his right hand or of his strength, as it is commonly interpreted. Though others will have it, the son of years, i. e. of his old age: or, putting both together, the support and stay of his old age.

Names are oftentimes strangely adapted to things; and the presages of parents have anciently been observed to be fulfilled.

Which is in no instance more verified than in this child of Jacob’s, who did not bear either of these names for naught. There being two very different fates of his, Jacob observes in the discourse of his upon St. Matt. ii. 17, 18, answerable to the contrary importance of the names given him by his father and his mother. No tribe in Israel more valuable, yet none so subject to sorrowful disasters as this tribe of Benjamin. It was almost extirpated in the time of the Judges (xx. 25, &c.), and yet before the conclusion of that age, Benjamin became the head of his brethren: the first king of Israel being chosen out of that late desolate tribe: and though that king proved at last but a Benoni; yet this tribe stuck close to Judah, when all the rest revolted to his brother Joseph.

Ver. 20. Jacob set a pillar upon her grave.] After that law was made (Deut. xvi. 22) against erecting pillars, the Jews did not think all pillars unlawful; but only those which were superstitious uses: not those which were in memory of something; as Maimonides’s words are, lib. de Idolol. cap. 6.

Ver. 21. Israel journeyed.] This is the first time that Moses calls him Israel after this name was given him by God, which he repeats twice in the next verse; and then calls him Jacob again, in the latter end of it. It is in vain to search for a reason. Some of the Jews will have it, that he calls him Israel, because he
And Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Edar.

And it came to pass, when Israel dwelt in that land, that Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father's concubine; and Israel heard it. Now the sons of Jacob were twelve:

29 The sons of Leah: Reuben, Jacob's first-born, and Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Zebulun:

24 The sons of Rachel; Joseph, and Benjamin:

25 And the sons of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid; Dan, and Naphtali:

bare the death of his beloved wife with admirable patience and submission to God's will. But they cannot give so good a reason, why he immediately alters his style, and calls him Jacob again (see ver. 22).

Beyond the tower of Edar.] i. e. The tower of the flock, as some translate it; who think there was such a tower near Jerusalem, because of those words of Micah (iv. 8), "0 tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughters of Zion." Which, if it be true, it doth not prove there was no tower in Jacob's days called by that name; but rather that in future ages this tower was renewed, in the same or a neighbouring place; and called by the ancient name which it had in the days of Jacob.

Ver. 22. Went and lay with Bilhah] She is called his wife, xxx. 4, and, according to the laws of those times, was truly so; as I have often observed all those called concubines were: though not the principal wives, but of a lower rank (see Mr. Selden, de Jure N. and G. lib. v. cap. 7. p. 570, 571, &c.).

Israel heard it. And highly resented it, as we find xliv. 4. But in this short history Moses passes over Israel's censure of his incest till he came to die; which shows sufficiently how he was affected when the fact was committed. Or perhaps these words, Israel heard it, may signify, that though Reuben thought to have committed this sin so secretly, as to have concealed it from his father, yet he came to the knowledge of it; and gave him such private reproofs, as were not passed to public punishment, to avoid scandal.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

1 Esau's three wives. 6 His removing to Mount Seir.

20 The sons and daughters of Seir. 24 Anak findeth mules. 31 The kings of Edom. 10 The dukes that descended of Esau.

1 Now these are the generations of Esau, who is Edom. 2 Esau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, 9 His sons. 15 The dukes which descended of his sons.

and Atholbhamah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite;

3 And Bashemath Ishmael's daughter, sister of Nebajoth.

but the Divine justice took care of the rest by distinguishing them thus exactly from him; that they might not perish under the name of Amalekites.

Ver. 2. Esau took his wives, &c.] The names of these wives are not the same with those he is said to have married, xxxvi. 34. Therefore it is probable his former wives died without issue: and so he took another daughter of Elon (when Judith was dead) called Adah; and the daughter of a man called Anah; by whom he had such children as here follow.

The daughter of Zibeon. The word daughter here signifies niece; or, she is called Zibeon's daughter, 4 And Adah bare to Esau Eliphaz; and Bas-hemath bare Reuel;

5 And Aholibamah bare Jeush, and Jaalam, and Korah: these are the sons of Esau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan.

6 And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob.

7 For their riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle.

8 Thus dwell Esau in mount Seir: Esau is Edom.

9 ¶ And these are the generations of Esau the father of the Edomites in mount Seir:

10 These are the names of Esau’s sons; Eliphaz the son of Adah the wife of Esau, Reuel the son of Basemath the wife of Esau.

11 And the sons of Eliphaz were Teman,

Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz.

12 And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Esau’s son; and she bare to Eliphaz Amalek: these were the sons of Adah Esau’s wife.

13 And these are the sons of Reuel; Nahath, because he bred her; as the children of Michal are mentioned (2 Sam. xxi. 8), though she had none at all; but only educated the children of her sister, as Zibeon, perhaps, did his brother Anah’s daughter (ver. 20).

Ver. 3. Bushemath, Ishmael’s daughter.] She is called by another name, xxxviii. 9. But it is likely Esau changed her name from Mahalath, which signifies sickly and infirm, into this of Bushemath, which signifies aromatic and fragrant: either because the name better pleased him, or he thought would better please his father: or, she grew more healthy after marriage; or perhaps she had two names given her at first.

Ver. 6. Ent into the country from the face of his brother Jacob.] Into another country out of the land of Canaan: into which he lately came to bury his father, as we read in the latter end of the last chapter.
Which being done, he and Jacob, no doubt, agreed about the division of Isaac’s estate, out of which a large share came to Esau: who had something also of his own there before (all his sons before mentioned being born to him in Canaan, ver. 5), besides what he had in Seir.

His brother Jacob.] He knew of no other name his brother had; that of Israel, it is likely, being not yet published and commonly used.

Ver. 7. There was not room enough in the land of Canaan (where they were but sojourners, and could have no more than the present possessors would let them) for such a vast stock as they had between them;
and therefore were constrained to separate, as Abraham, for the same reason, had done from Lot (xiii. 6, &c.). And Esau having begun before to settle in Seir, did not think fit to bring what he had there hither: but carried what his father left him thither.
Where he had enlarged his dominion, since Jacob’s return to Canaan.

Ver. 8. Thus dwelt Esau in Mount Seir:] It is a question how he could be said to have gone to dwell in Seir, upon this occasion; seeing we find him there before, when Jacob came out of Mesopotamia (xxxii.
3). But the answer is easy, that then he had only some part of the country, and not the best of it neither; and therefore, perhaps, had some of his estate still in Canaan, while the rest of it was in Seir. And it seems remarkable to me, that he is not said till now to dwell in Mount Seir, but only in the land of Seir, or barely in Seir, to which he invited Jacob at his return (xxxii. 3, xxxiii. 14, 16). This mountainous country, which was richer than the other, he got into his possession after that time.

Esau is Edom.] The father of the Edomites, as it follows, ver. 9.

Ver. 12. She bare to Eliphaz Amalek:] This was necessary to be set down (as I observed on ver. 11), that there might be a distinction between the Amalekites, who were to be destroyed, and the rest of the potesty of Esau: concerning whom it is said, “Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite, because he is thy brother” (Deut. xxxii. 7). Thus Joseph Albo. For though they made a distinct people from the Edomites, and lived in a neighbouring country; yet they possessed that part of Mount Seir which was near Kadesh Barnea, as may be gathered from Num. xiii. 29, and xiv. 43.

Ver. 15. These were dukes:] The word alloukaph, if we may believe R. Solomon Jarchi, signifies heads, chiefs, or rulers of families, who may be called princes;
though their government was not yet regal, but a kind of an-stocracy in the beginning.

Ver. 16. Duke Korah.] He is not reckoned among the sons of Eliphaz (ver. 11), but called the son of Aholibamah (ver. 14), and accordingly said to rule over a family descended from hers (ver. 18). We must suppose, therefore, there were two Korahs; one the son of Aholibamah, the other a nephew of Eliphaz, by some of his sons or grandsons; who came to be a great ruler, and to get the government of some of these families: and according to the style of Scripture is reckoned for Eliphaz’s son.

Ver. 20. These are the sons of Seir the Horite.] From this Seir the country had its name: but from whom he descended is not recorded.
21 And Dishon, and Ezer, and Dishan: these are the dukes of the Horites, the children of Seir in the land of Edom.

22 And the children of Lotan were Hor and Heman; and Lotan’s sister was Timna.

23 And the children of Shobal were these: Alvan, and Manahath, and Ebal, Shepho, and Onam.

24 And these are the children of Zibeon: both Ajah, and Anah: this was Anah that found the mules in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father.

25 And the children of Anah were these: Dishon, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah.

26 And these are the children of Dishon: Hemdan, and Eshban, and Ithran, and Cheran.

27 The children of Ezer are these: Bilhan, and Zaavan, and Akan.

Who inhabited the land: Who were the ancient inhabitants of this country before Esau conquered it, and perhaps were the first that possessed it after the flood; whose genealogy, I suppose, is here mentioned, because Esau’s posterity married with some of them; particularly his eldest son Eliphaz took Timna, sister of Alvan (ver. 22), and his second son Reuel (ver. 22). Yea, Esau himself seems to have married one of this family, viz. Aholibamah, whose father and uncle are said to be Hitites (ver. 2), but here plainly called Horites; being descended from Seir the Horrite, though dwelling then among the Hitites.

Ver. 21. These are the dukes of the Horites. The headmen or rulers who governed the country before Esau and his posterity dispossessed them; and settled themselves in the same form of government which they found among these Horites.

In the land of Edom. So it was called in the days of Moses.

Ver. 24. This was Anah that found the mules in the wilderness. Not by accident, but by his art and industry he invented (as we speak) this mixture, and produced this kind of creature. So it is commonly interpreted. But the word found, though used four hundred times in Scripture, never signifies (as Bochart hath observed, par. 1. Hierozoic. lib. cap. 21), the invention of that which was not before; but the finding on a sudden (already in some sense) signifies possesses in Scripture; and therefore others have read the Hebrew word as if it had been written jamin (as St. Jerome observes), imaginating that as Anah fed his father’s asses, he found a great collection of waters (see Vossius, lib. iii. de Idolol. cap. 75), which some fancy to have been hot water, or baths, as the Vulgar Latin interprets it. But then we must read the Hebrew quite otherwise than we do now: and Bochart gives other reasons against this interpretation; and endeavours to establish another opinion: That by jamin we are to understand emin, a gigantic sort of people, mentioned in Scripture, and next neighbours to the Horites. These Anah is said to find, i.e. to meet withal and encounter: or, rather, to have fallen upon a sudden and unexpectedly; as this phrase he shows signifies in Scripture. The Chaldeans both confirmed with a great many reasons; to which another late learned writer (Wagensell) thinks an answer may be given: though he inclines to it, if one thing were not in the way; which makes him think, here is rather meant some herb or plant, called jamus, which word the LXX. retain, not knowing how to translate it, and thus many interpreters of the Scripture have understood it; which seems to be the most probable conjecture of all others

28 The children of Dishan are these: Uz, and Aram.

29 These are the dukes that came of the Horites: duke Lotan, duke Shobal, duke Zibeon, duke Anah.

30 Duke Dishon, duke Ezer, duke Dishan: these are the dukes that came of Hor, among their dukes in the land of Seir.

31 ¶ And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel.

32 And Bela the son of Beor reigned in Edom: and the name of his city was Dinhabah.

33 And Bela died, and Jobab the son of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his stead.

34 And Jobab died, and Husham of the land of Temani reigned in his stead.

35 And Husham died, and Hadad the son of (see Wagensell in his Annot. upon that title of the Talmud called Sots. p. 217, 218, &c.). He fed the asses of Zibeon his father. The sons of princes were wont to follow this employment in ancient times, as Bochart shows out of many authors, particularly the scholiast upon Homer’s Odyssey. The sons of Esau (xxxv. Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44).

Ver. 28. The children of Dishan are these: Uz, &c. From this man the whole country, or a great part of it, is called by the name of Uz (Lament. iv. 31), which was in Arabia Petraea, in the borders of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 30. These are the dukes that came of Hor. This Hor was the ancestor of Seir, by whom this country was first planted.

Among their dukes. Or according to their families, or principalities.

Ver. 31. These are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom. It appears by this, that after several dukes (as we translate it) had ruled the country, the Edomites changed their government into a monarchy. And here follows a catalogue of their kings. For I can find no ground for the opinion of the Hebrew doctors, that allph, a duke, differed in nothing from melakah, a king; but that the latter was crowned, the former not crowned.

Before the king reigned any king. Moses having a little before this (xxxv. 11), mentioned the promise of God to Jacob, that “kings should come out of his loins;” observes, it is a thing remarkable, being a great exercise of their faith, that Esau’s posterity should have so many kings: and there was as yet no king in Israel when he wrote this book, not (as it is commonly interpreted) a long time after. This Moses might well write without a spirit of prophecy; nor is there any reason to say, this passage was inserted by somebody else after the death of Moses. We might rather affirm, if it were needful, that Moses’s meaning is, “All these were kings in Edom, before his own time;” who was the first king in Israel (Dent. xxxiii. 5). For he truly exercised royal authority over them, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1, 2.

Ver. 32. The name of his city was Dinhabah. Of which he was governor, perhaps, before he was made king; and wherein he reigned.

Ver. 33. Of Bozrah. Which was afterward the principal city of the whole country; as we read in the prophet Isaiah, xxxxi. 6, and Jeremiah xlix. 3, and Amos i. 2. It seems, by this list of their kings, that the kingdom at this time was elective; for the son did not
CHAPTER XXXVII.

Bedad, who smote Midian in the field of Moab, reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Avith.

36 And Hadad died, and Samlah of Masrekhah reigned in his stead.
37 And Samlah died, and Saul of Rehoboth by the river reigned in his stead.
38 And Saul died, and Baal-hanan the son of Achbor reigned in his stead.
39 And Baal-hanan the son of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Pau; and his wife's name was Mehetabel, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab.

40 And these are the names of the dukes that came of Esau, according to their families, after their places, by their names; duke Timnah, duke Alvah, duke Jetheth, 41 Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon,
42 Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mizhar,
43 Duke Magdiel, duke Iram: these be the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations in the land of their possession: he is Esau the father of the Edomites.

Ver. 38. Baal-hanan.] This name is the reverse (as I may call it) of Hani-ball.
Ver. 39. His wife's name was Mehetabel, &c.] None of their wives, much less their pedigree, are named besides this alone: which shows she was an eminent woman in those times and that country; either for wisdom, or parentage, or estate, or some other excellence.
Ver. 40. These are—the dukes that came of Esau.] They seem now to have returned to their first constitution; and kings were laid aside for some time. But in future ages we find they changed again, and then kings reigned successively, the son after the father, as they did in Israel. Some think, these were the great men, who ruled in Edom, in Moses's time.

According to their families, &c.] They were the heads of different families, and lived in different places; and, perhaps, reigned at the same time, in several parts of the country: so the words seem to import.

Ver. 43. In the land of their possession.] In their own country; whilst the seed of Jacob sojourned in a strange country, and possessed no land of their own.
He is Esau, &c.] He ends as he began. This is the account of Esau, the father of the people who are now called Edomites.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

2 Joseph is hated of his brethren. 5 His two dreams. 13 Jacob sendeth him to visit his brethren. 18 His brethren conspire his death. 21 Reuben saveth him. 26 They sell him to the Ishmeelites. 31 His father, deceived by the bloody coat, mourneth for him. 36 He is sold to Potiphar in Egypt.

1 And Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a stranger, in the land of Canaan.
2 These are the generations of Jacob. Joseph, being seventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren; and the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives: and Joseph brought unto his father their evil report.

There called a child, ver. 39), with the sons of Bilhah, &c. Which last words are an explication of the former, showing with which of his brethren he was. Not with the sons of Leah, but with the sons of Jacob's handmaids: particularly with Bilhah's, whom we may look upon as a mother to him now Rachel was dead, having waited upon her. And Zilpah's sons are also mentioned in the second place, as those, it is likely, who were thought to have less emulation to him than the sons of Leah. But we see by this, how much our greatest prudence often fails: for Reuben and Judah, the children of Leah, had more kindness for Joseph than any of the rest.

Their evil report.] What evil lives they led.
Ver. 5. Because he was the son of his old age.] Benjamin was more so than he; and the rest were born not many years before him. But he is so called because he had been married a good while to Rachel before he had him: and he was the greatest comfort
3 Now Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age: and he made him a coat of many colours.

4 And when his brethren saw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him.

5 ¶ And Joseph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren: and they hated him yet the more.

6 And he said unto them, Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed:

7 For, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and, lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright; and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf.

8 And his brethren said to him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words.

9 ¶ And he dreamed yet another dream, and of his old age; Benjamin not being yet grown up to give any proof of his future worth.

A coat of many colours.] It is commonly thought to signify a garment wrought with threads of divers colours; or made up of pieces of silk or stuff, which had much variety in them; or wrought, as some think, with figures of fruit, or other things (see Salmasius, De Flam. Vopiscus, p. 396). But Braunius (de Vestub. Sacerd. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 17) hath proved, I think, that the Hebrew word passim here signifies a long garment down to the heels or ankles, and with long sleeves down to the wrists; which had a border at the bottom, and a facing (as we speak) at the hands, of another colour, different from the garment (see ver. 29).

Ver. 4. Could not speak peaceably unto him.] In a kind and friendly manner; but churlishly, and with evident signs of hatred. Aben Ezra fancies they would not so much as salute him, or wish him peace (as the phrase then was, Peace be to thee), or ask him how he did, as our custom is.

Ver. 5. Joseph dreamed a dream.] This was usual among the patriarchs, and others also, as appears by Elisha: who shows that all dreams were not illusions of evil spirits (Job xxxiii. 14, 15, &c.). And long before his time Abimelech was warned by God in a dream, chapter xx. of this book, ver. 3, 6, 7.

Upon which consideration (as Dr. Jackson well observes) we should not mistrust the reports of several ancient historians, who tell us how princes and fathers of families have had forewarnings of future events; either concerning themselves, their kingdoms, or posterity (book i. upon the Creed, chap. 9).

He told—his brethren.] This argues his great innocence and simplicity; that he had not yet understanding enough, to consider how ill this dream might be expounded: or not prudence enough to conceal what might be ill interpreted by them.

They hated him yet the more.] The first ground of their hatred was their father's great love to him; and then, his informing their father of their bad behaviour; which was still increased by the fine clothes his father bestowed on him; and now most of all by this dream, which they interpreted to signify his superiority over them.

Ver. 7. Your sheaves stood round about.] Or, gathered round about mine: which was fulfilled when they came for corn into Egypt; of which these sheaves, some think, were an apt representation.

Ver. 8. Shalt thou indeed reign over us?] It seems they could readily interpret the meaning of a dream, which shows how common they were in those days.

Ver. 9. He dreamed yet another dream.] Which confirmed the former; by repeating the same thing under different figures. For as the former was taken from the earth, so this from heaven; and is more comprehensive than the former; for it concerns his father, as well as his brethren.

Behold, the sun and the moon, &c.] They seemed to descend to him, or he to be carried up to them; where they bowed, and lay at his feet.

Ver. 10. His father rebuked him.] Gave him a check; that Joseph might not grow conceited of himself, and his brethren might not be provoked to hate him.

What is this dream that thou hast dreamed?] What an idle dream is this!

Shall I, and thy mother, and thy brethren, &c.] Who can believe this? Thy mother is dead (which is sufficient to show the vanity of this dream), and thy father sure is not to truce unto thee; no, nor thy elder brethren.

Ver. 11. His brethren envied him.] Though Jacob seemed to slight what he said, it incensed his brethren against him.

But his father observed the saying.] He did not look upon it as a mere fancy; but thought there might be something in it. And therefore, though he thought fit publicly to slight it, yet he took such notice of it privately, that he preserved it in mind, and laid it up in his heart, as the Scripture elsewhere speaks.

And it really was fulfilled, when he went down into Egypt: for no doubt, showed that respect which was due to the viceroy of the country; and so did his mother Bilhah, and all his brethren.

Ver. 12. As their flocks increased, so they enlarged their pasture; and they often removed to find fresh pasture. Besides, he had made a purchase in this place; where they fed his flocks in his own ground.

Ver. 13. Come, and I will send thee unto them.] Make thyself ready, that I may send thee to inquire of thy brethren's welfare. About which he was now the more solicitous, because they were gone to a place where they had, some years ago, given great provocation to the country by their barbarous cruelty.
with the flocks; and bring me word again. So he sent him out of the vale of Hebron, and he came to Shechem.

15 And a certain man found him, and, behold, he was wandering in the field: and the man asked him, saying, What seekest thou?

16 And he said, I seek my brethren: tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks.

17 And the man said, They are departed hence; for I heard them say, Let us go to Dothan. And Joseph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan.

18 And when they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conspired against him to slay him.

19 And they said one to another, Behold, this dreamer cometh.

20 Come now therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit, and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him: and we shall see what will become of his dreams.

21 And Reuben heard it; and he delivered him out of their hands; and said, Let us not kill him.

22 And Reuben said unto them, Shed no blood, but cast him into this pit that is in the wilderness, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.

23 And it came to pass, when Joseph was come unto his brethren, that they strained Joseph out of his coat, his coat of many colours that was on him;

24 And they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it.

25 And they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and, behold, a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt.

26 And Judah said unto his brethren, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood?

27 Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmeelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother and our flesh. And his brethren were content.

28 Then there passed by Midianites merchants: and they drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold him to the Ishmeelites for twenty piece of silver:

Ver. 15. A certain man found him.] Some take this to have been an angel, who took care of him, when he was at a loss which way to go. So Maimonides, and others. Aschachim, cap. 42, where he makes this passage the very same with that xvi. 7, “The angel of the Lord found her,” &c.

Ver. 18. They conspired against him.] The Hebrew word signifies, they took subtle and crafty counsel against him to slay him. Laid their heads together (as we now speak) to kill him, so that the murder might be concealed from their father.

Ver. 19. Behold, this dreamer cometh.] In the Hebrew, This master of dreams, or a frequent dreamer; one that hath dreams at command.

Ver. 20. Cast him into some pit.] Which they were wont to dig frequently in those countries, to hold rain-water for their cattle, when they could not find a spring; or were no river.

Ver. 21. He delivered him out of their hands.] Preserved him from being murdered by them, as they intended; which he did by the following counsel, which seemed to have something of humanity in it, and yet would effect what they resolved.

Ver. 22. Cast him into this pit.] That he might perish with hunger.

Lev. no hand upon him, &c.] Let us not kill him. This he said that he might save his life, intending secretly to draw him out of the pit, and restore him safe to his father. By which piece of good service, Reuben, perhaps, hoped to reconcile his father to him, who was justly angry with him for defiling his bed (xxxv. 25).

Ver. 23. His coat of many colours.] By this it seems he was distinguished from the rest of his brethren; being not yet grown up to such laborious employments as they followed abroad; and therefore indulged to wear a richer sort of garment with his father at home. For, according to the common notion, it was wrought, or embroidered, with flowers; which was accounted noble, as well as beautiful, in ancient times. As appears by Plato, who, comma-} of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites for twenty pieces of silver; and they brought Joseph into Egypt.

29 And Reuben returned unto the pit; and, behold, Joseph was not in the pit; and he rent his clothes.

30 And he returned unto his brethren, and said, The child is not; and I, whither shall I go?

31 And they took Joseph's coat, and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood;

32 And they sent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father; and said, This have we found: now know whether it be thy son's coat or no.

Ver. 28, Midianites.] They are called Ishmaelites just before (ver. 25), and so they are immediately in this very verse [Sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites]; for they were very near neighbours, and joined together in trade, making now one caravan, with a joint stock, as this story intimates. Read Judg. viii. 1, 3, 22, 23, 24, 26, and it will appear the Scripture speaks of them as one and the same people, in aftertimes.

For twenty pieces of silver.] Most understand so many shekels, which was a very small price; but therefore, demanded, and no more, that the bargain might be clapped up the sooner.

Ver. 29. Reuben returned unto the pit;] He, pretending some business, had withdrawn himself from the company, with an intention, when his brethren were gone from the pit, to come privately and take Joseph out, and carry him to his father. Upon that design:

Rent his clothes.] As they used to do, when they mourned for the dead; whereby he expressed his real grief for his brother.

Ver. 30. The child is not;] He is dead, as this phrase commonly signifies.

Whither shall I go?] I know not whither to flee, to hide myself from my father's anger: who might justly expect the eldest son should take the greatest care of him.

Ver. 31.] His brethren it seems persuaded Reuben also to join with them, in concealing the sale of Joseph; and making their old father believe he was deceased by some wild beast.

Ver. 32.] They first sent it by a messenger; and immediately followed themselves, with the tale which is here related.

Ver. 33. An evil beast;] Some wild beast, of which there were great stores in those countries (such as lions and bears), for he could not suspect his brethren would kill him.

Ver. 34. Rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his head;] This was the highest degree of mourning in those days. We read often of putting on sackcloth in future ages, upon such sad occasions; but this is the first time we meet with it, which shows the great antiquity of such customs.

Mourned for his son many days.] Beyond the ordinary time of mourning. Many years (as the word days sometimes signifies); perhaps, till he heard he was alive. So the following verse seems to denote; that he resolved not to cease mourning for him as long as he lived.

Ver. 35. All his sons and all his daughters;] He had but one daughter: therefore the meaning is, his sons' wives, or their daughters.

I will go down into the grave, &c.] If sheol here be expounded grave, then the next words must be thus translated, mourning for my son; as R. Solomon interprets them. For Joseph was not buried in a grave; and therefore he could not think of going down to him this Pharaoh's, and therefore the translation of the dead body, and particularly Isaiah xiv. (where the King of Babylon is expressly denounced the honour of a grave, ver. 19, 20), sheol is said to be moved for him, and to meet him, and to stir up the dead for him (ver. 9).

Thus his father wept for him.] Continued his mourning: not only by wearing sackcloth, but in such passionate expressions for these.

Ver. 36. The Midianites.] In the Hebrew the word is Medanim (a distinct name from those ver. 38), who were a people derived from Medan, one of the sons of Keturah, and brother to Midian (xxv. 2). They and the Midianites lived near together in Arabia, not far from the Ishmaelites: who all joined together in this caravan, and made one society of merchants; consisting of Midianites, Medanim, and Ishmeelites.

Officer] The Hebrew word sars, oftentimes signifies an eunuch, by whom the eastern queens were attended. But it likewise signifies all the great courtiers (as the Chaldee here translates it), such as the bed-chamber-men, the lord chamberlain (as we now speak), and such-like officers of state: and therefore rightly translated here, as Pharaoh had a wife. The truth is, this was the prime signification of the word; till, in aftertimes, the depravation of manners, and the jealousy of the eastern kings, made them set none but slaves, who were castrated, to attend their queens; by whom they were preferred to great officers, and so came to enjoy this name.

Pharaoh's;] This was a common name to all the kings of Egypt (see xli. 15).

Captain of the guard.] The LXX. translate it, master cook; and so Epiphanius calls his wife. Τὸν ἀρχιμαγείουν (Heres. xxxvi. n. 17). Our margin hath it, chief of the slaughter-men, or executioners. But the word tebahem may better be translated soldiery, than butchers or executioners; and here, some think, may denote him whom we call the provost-marshals; others well it have the master of the horse. But I see no more proper translation than ours, captain of the guard; or, rather, chief commander of the king's guard; such an one as Nebuzaradan was (2 Kings xxv. 20); for sohar is more than one whom we now call a captain (see xl. 3). This phrase sohar-kata-bachim is explained by Hottinger, out of the Ethiopic tongue (see Smegmas Orient. p. 56).
CHAPTER XXXVIII.

1 Judah begetteth Er, Onan, and Shelah. 7 Er marrieth Tamar. 8 The trespass of Onan. 11 Tamar slayeth for Shelah. 13 She deceiveth Judah. 27 She beareth twins, Pharez and Zarah.

1 And it came to pass at that time, that Judah went down from his brethren, and turned in to a certain Adullamite, whose name was Hirah.
2 And Judah saw there a daughter of a certain Canaanite, whose name was Shuaah; and he took her, and went in unto her.
3 And she conceived, and bare a son; and he called his name Er.
4 And she conceived again, and bare a son; and she called his name Onan.
5 And she yet again conceived, and bare a son; and he called his name Shelah: and he was at Chezib, when she bare him.
6 And Judah took a wife for Er his firstborn, whose name was Tamar.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Ver. 1. At that time] It is uncertain whether he mean at the time Joseph was sold (which is just before mentioned), or at the time Jacob returned from Mesopotamia to live in Canaan (xxxxii. 18), or when he went to settle with his father at Mamre (xxxv. 27).

Adullamite. A citizen of Adullam; which was a famous town, or city, that fell afterwards to the tribe of Judah, whose king was slain by Joshua (xii. 19), and where there was a famous cave, in which David hid himself (I Sam. xxii. 1).

Ver. 2. Judah saw there So as to fall in love with her. For, according to the old saying, 'Ex tavo opinio tue ipsa.'

Daughter of a certain Canaanite. It was not so bad for a man circumsed to marry the daughter of one uncircumcised, as it was to give their daughters in marriage to an uncircumcised husband (xxxiv. 14).

For an uncircumcised man was accounted unclean, though he had renounced idolatry: but a woman born of uncircumcised parents was not so accounted, if she embraced the worship of the true God. Wherefore, while that custom was observed among the Jews, Rahab was her name.

Whose name was Shuaah.] Her father's name was Shua (ver. 19).

He took her.] To be his wife (ver. 19).

Ver. 5. He was at Chezib when she bare him. Some think this town the same with Achzib, belonging to Judah (Josh. xv. 44). But why Moses mentions his absence when this child was born, and why he sets down the place where he then was, we cannot give an account; though there was, no doubt, some special reason for it. Perhaps it is to shew, why she gave the name to this and her former son (whereas he himself named the first, ver. 3), because he was not at home when they were born.

7 And Er, Judah's firstborn, was wicked in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord slew him.
8 And Judah said unto Onan, Go in unto thy brother's wife, and marry her, and raise up seed to thy brother.
9 And Onan knew that the seed should not be his; and it came to pass, when he went in unto his brother's wife, that he spilled it on the ground, lest that he should give seed to his brother.
10 And the thing which he did displeased the Lord: wherefore he slew him also.
11 Then said Judah to Tamar his daughter in law, Remain a widow at thy father's house, till Shelah my son be grown: for he said, Lest peradventure he die also, as his brethren did.

Ver. 6. Tamar.] She seems also to have been a woman of Canaan; but not an idolater.

Ver. 2. Was wicked] i.e. Exceeding impious; and that notoriously (see Gen. x. 9). What particular sins he was guilty of is but conjectured. Some fancy they were of the same nature with his next brother's (see Benferrre, or Menochius out of him).

The Lord with him.] Cut him off suddenly, by some unusual stroke.

Ver. 8. Go in unto thy brother's wife, &c.] This (say the Hebrew doctors) was an ancient custom, in force before the law of Moses, which only enacted what had been formerly practised (Maimon. par. iii. cap. 49, More Nevoch.,) that when a man died without issue, his next brother should marry his wife (Deut. xxv. 5). Which custom afterwards extended to the next cousin, if no brother remained.

Raise up seed to thy brother.] Preserve thy brother's name and family; by begetting a child, which may be accounted his, and inherit his estate. For so the law was; that the firstborn of such a match was not to be looked upon as the child of him that begat him; but as his brother's, who was the mother's first husband. All the following children were to be his own.

Ver. 9. Onan knew that the seed should not be his.] i.e. The firstborn should be reputed his brother's child.

Levst that he should give seed to his brother.] Or, lest a child should be born in the name of his brother, as the Vulgar Latin interprets it very exactly, according to the opinion of the Hebrerous: as Mr. Selden observes (lib. vii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 3).

Ver. 10. The thing which he did displeased the Lord.] This made his sin the more heinous, that he acted against the Divine promise made to Abram, concerning the multiplying of his seed especially against the belief of the promise of the Messiah; that seed for which all God's covenants (ver. 12) were

Ver. 11. Remain a widow at thy father's house, &c.] It seems the contract of marriage at first was so understood in those days, that if the husband died without issue, the woman must marry his next brother; and as long as any of his brethren remained, they were bound to marry his wife, and preserve their brother's memory; or else solemnly to excuse her, to their great infamy and disgrace. This was so well known, that there is nothing in the law that enjoins any new solemn contract in such a case: because the first husband being dead, she and the next brother...
GENESIS.

And Tamar went and dwelt in her father's house.

12 And in process of time the daughter of Shuaah Judah's wife died; and Judah was comforted, and went up and unto his sheep sheers to Timnath, he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite.

13 And it was told Tamar, saying, Behold thy father in law goeth up to Timnath to shear his sheep.

were man and wife, without any further agreement, by virtue of the original law: until he renounced her. Yet, by the constitutions afterwards made by their elders, it was ordained, that he should espouse and endow her solemnly before witnesses: as Mr. Selden shows in his Uxor Hebr. l. i. cap. 13, and lib. ii. cap. 2 and 10.

But Judah thought Sheelah was too young to perform this contract, and therefore desired her to stay till he was grown up, and to abide in her own father's house rather than in his; that Sheelah might not think of marriage too soon.

For he said, Last peradventure he die also.] This seems to make an argument that he never intended to give her his son. But it is more agreeable to ver. 24, and 26, to think that, according to the custom of those days, he could not refuse it. And therefore he thought it was their youthful folly which made his two other sons perish: which made him resolve to keep this till he had more discretion, and was better instructed in his duty. Or, if we imagine their sin was known to none but Tamar, the meaning may be, that he thought their marrying too young was the cause of their death. And therefore he determined to keep this only remaining son till he was of a riper age.

Ver. 12. In process of time the words are, the days were multiplied, i. e. after some years.

To Timnath, A town not far from Adullam, it is probable, for it was also within the lot of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 57).

He went up to Timnath. Some have made a difficulty about this phrase: for Samson is said to have gone down to Timnath (Judg. xiv. 5). But the three following lines are all connected with Timnath (par. i. Hierozoie, lib. iii. cap. 4), that these were two different places, one called Timnah, the other Timnathah: this in the tribe of Judah, the other in the tribe of Dan. To this they went up, because it was in a mountainous country; to that they went down, because it was in a valley.

To his shea-keepers. It was the custom at such times to make a feast (as we do now), and to invite their kindred and friends to it (as he doth his friend Hirah), which appears sufficiently from the story of Absalom (2 Sam. xiii. 23). For in those countries, where they had vast flocks, sheep shearing was a kind of harvest, which made that time to be observed with such joy as there used to be in harvest: whence it is said, that they were come to him on a good day; for he was shearing sheep (1 Sam. xxv. 8). Accordingly Judah, having finished the time of mourning for his wife, went to recreate himself, with his friends, at this festival season.

Ver. 11. She put her widow's garments off. In which, it seems, such persons continued, till they were married to the next brother. But she, at this time, laid them aside, that he might not have the least suspicion she was the person whom he courted.

Covered her with a vail. As all women did, in the eastern countries, when they went abroad: and there 14 And she put her widow's garments off from her, and covered her with a vail, and wrapped herself, and sat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath: for she saw that Shelah was grown, and she was not given unto him to wife.

15 When Judah saw her, he thought her to be a harlot; because she had covered her face.

16 And he turned unto her by the way, and said, Go to, I pray thee, let me come in unto you. And sat in an open place. Where two ways met, as the Hebrew words seem to import: unless we take it for a proper name, as it is in the margin of our Bibles. Either way it signifies in a public place, where everybody might see her. It is commonly noted, that there was so much modesty left in those ancient days, that harlots both went veiled, and also sat without the cities (see Origen, lib. iv. contra Celsam, p. 206). But, however the latter part of this observation be, the former part of it is not true. For, as Bochart observs (par. i. Hierozoie, lib. ii. cap. 46), Proprium fuit meritum non velari, sed revelari, "it was proper to harlots not to be covered, but to go barefaced;" as appears from Isa. xlvii. 5; Nahum iii. 5, &c. All that can be answered to this is, that it might be otherwise in very ancient times. Which I do not take to be true: for all women, as I observed before, were covered; and therefore harlots were distinguished only by their sitting in the highways, not by their veils.

For she saw that Shelah was grown, and she was not given, &c. She resolved, if she could, to have a child by one of this family: and hoped, perhaps, that Sheelah might come along with his father, and have the same desires his father had; and in those days (as I noted before) there were no such solemnities required, as the Jews afterwards used (though the law did not enjoin it) to the making a marriage with one's brother's wife. Which was to be contracted, they say, before both the parties had given a piece of money, or any writing: but this was ordained only by their elders, not by the original law (see ver. 11). And therefore she thought if she could have sought Shelah by this device, it would have been held lawful; but this plot failing her, she so far transgressed as to admit Judah himself to lie with her.

Ver. 15. Because she had covered her face. This is not the reason why he took her for a harlot: but why he did not know her to be his daughter-in-law (as Mr. Selden observes in the place before named, ver. 14), because he could not see her face; and he thought her to be a harlot, because she sat in trivio, in the highway; where she publicly exposed herself.

Ver. 16. Let me come in unto thee. This was an express law, that there should be no kedeshah (or whore) among the daughters of Israel, i. e. none who should prostitute her body without marriage (Deut. xxii. 18; Levit. xii. 29). But before the giving of the law (saith Maimonides), if a man found a single woman in a public place, and they agreed on certain terms to lie together without being married, they were not punished (see Mr. Selden, lib. v. de Juro N. et G. cap. 4).

What wilt thou give me. That which made such facts not to be punished, was (saith the same Maimonides) because of the contract which passed between unto And but as till even (for the ter was his tion, of she declared, in him. was longed. family her, Ruth. impiety vails) as ivometi-priests nun-priests He Hebrew 20 18 Wilt Ver. 20.

17 And he said, And And thou mayest come in unto me! And and said, What wilt thou give me, the flock. And she said, Wilt thou give me a pledge, till thou send it? And he said, What pledge shall I give thee? And she said, Thy signet, and thy bracelets, and thy stuff that is in thine hand. And he gave it her, and came in unto her, and she conceived by him.

19 And she arose, and went away, and laid by her vail from her, and put on the garments of her widowhood.

20 And Judah sent the kid by the hand of his friend the Adullamite, to receive his pledge from the woman's hand: but he found her not.

21 Then he asked the men of that place, saying, Where is the harlot, that was openly by the way side? And they said, There was no harlot in this place.

22 And he returned to Judah, and said, I cannot find her; and also the men of the place said, that there was no harlot in this place.

23 And Judah said, Let her take it to her, lest we be shamed: behold, I sent this kid, and thou hast not found her.

24 And it came to pass about three months after, that it was told Judah, saying, Tamar thy daughter in law hath played the harlot; and also, behold, she is with child by whoredom. And Judah said, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt.

25 When she was brought forth, she sent to xxiii. 7, made all whombe called kedischim, which was the name for those devoted to such impure minis- (see Mr. Selden, de Dis Syris, Synyg. i. cap. 5, trics (see Mr. Selden, de Dis Syris, Synyg. i. cap. 5, and Synag. ii. cap. 2). But such beastly idolatry, surely, was not so old as the days of Jacob: and it seems more reasonable to me to think, that the original word signifying separation, was applied either to those who were separated unto holiness, or unto uncleanness, as harlots were.

They said, there was no harlot in this place.] They knew of none that publicly professed to be a prostitute: nor had they seen any one sit publicly to invite customers.

Ver. 23. Let her take it to her.] Keep the pledge to herself.

Lest we be shamed.] Though the fact he had committed was in those days lawful (saith Maimonides), that is, was not punished by the judges; yet men did not publicly boast of it, nor were willing to own it; but were ashamed it should be known (which was a sign they were sensible there was a moral turpitude in it), and therefore endeavoured to hide and conceal it; even with the loss of those goods which were of greatest value. For the sense, saith he, of Judah's words, is this: "It is better to lose what she hath of ours, than, by inquisition after it, to divulse the business, and increase our shame?" (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49). Where he bids his reader observe, that it is the natural vice which characterizes the history, together with justice and equity: which appears in his performing the agreement he made of sending a kid; of which he desires his friend to be a witness, that he might not lie under any suspicion of having offered violence to her.

Ver. 24. Bring her forth.] Out of her father's house, into the place of judgment; where he would have her sentenced to the severest punishment.

Let her be burnt.] Not presently (for that had been the highest injustice and cruelty, to burn the child in her belly), but after she was delivered; till which time he would have kept her in such safe custody, that this execution might be done upon her. Some think burning was the punishment for adultery in those days. Others think a separation, was applied either to the will of the supreme governor, whosoever he was; whom some also take to have been Judah himself; as chief in his own family: and that he was so severe against her because she had disgraced his family, and he was glad to be rid of her, that he might not give his son Shelah to her. But there are those, who think by burning is meant no violence done to her, but that he would have her to be a whore (see Mr. Selden, lib. vii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 5). If Judah did mean burning her at a stake (as we now speak), it was a punishment them. This reward which he gave the harlot for the use of her body, being like the dowry a man gave his wife when he put her away; which being paid, it was thought he did her no wrong (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 49). They that would now have their wicked practices warranted by such examples, should consider that every thing not punished by men was not allowed by God: and that we now live under another dispensation, which expressly forbids such uncleanness; and declares, that not only adulterers, but whoremongers, God will judge, i. e. punish (Heb. xiii. 4. See ver. 23).

Ver. 17. A kid from the flock.] Which was looked upon as a valuable present in those days; as I have observed before (xxvii. 9).

Ver. 18. Thy signet] His ring, whereby he sealed.

Thy bracelets.] The Hebrews generally understand by this word his cloak, or some such garment; others, his girdle.

Thy stuff, &c.] Which, it is likely, had something in it to distinguish it from other men's stuffs. And she asks so many things, that by some or other of them (if not by all) it might be certain who was the father, if she proved with child.

He came in unto her.] Not publicly; but in some bye-place, to which they retired.

She conceived by him.] He conceiveth in whom he did not know her. She conceived which aggravated her crime, and made it incest in her, though only fornication in him. Unto which, one would think, she was tempted, by her vehement desire to have a child by one of this family; unto which the promise of the Messiah belonged. For though she seems to have been one of the seed of Canaan (as I said before, ver. 8), yet embracing the religion of Jacob, she renounced the idolatry of the Canaanites: and so is mentioned in the genealogy of our Saviour, as well as Rahab and Ruth.

Ver. 19. Laid by her vail from her, &c.] Retired into her father's house (for within doors they did not wear vails) where she clothed herself again like a widow.

Ver. 21. Where is the harlot?] By this it is apparent that the word harlot signifies a concubina whore (as we speak), who publicly prostituted herself for hire; as the Hebrew doctors observe upon this place, and upon Deut. xxii. 17. But whence this name should be given to harlots is a great doubt; it coming from a root, which signifies that which is sacred. Which hath inclined some learned men to think, that the custom is given to the service of Baalpeor, or Priapus, were no better than whose: and the men-priests who served Ashteroth, mentioned 2 Kings her father in law, saying, By the man, whose these are, am I with child: and she said, Discern, I pray thee, whose these, the signet, and bracelets, and staff.

26 And Judah acknowledged them, and said, She hath been more righteous than I; because that I gave her not to Shelah my son. And he knew her again no more.

27 ¶ And it came to pass in the time of her travail, that, behold, twins were in her womb.

28 And it came to pass, when she travailed, not then commonly used, but inflicted (as his words are, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 12), ex more seu legu aliqua singulari; “by some singular custom or law.”

All this proceeds upon a supposition, that she really was Shelah’s wife, though not solemnly married (as the Jews pretend it was necessary, after the law was given), by virtue of the first contract with his eldest brother: which was the reason of her being kept at her father’s house; that nobody else might pretend to her, but she be reserved for him; otherwise there could have been no ground for proceeding against her as an adulteress.

Ver. 26. She hath been more righteous than I;) These words do not signify that she had in this matter commonly loved him (for she had committed a greater), but that in another matter, which was the occasion of this, he had broken his word with her, when she had, till now, kept her faith with him; and lived a widow honestly in expectation of his son. Besides, she committed this fact out of desire to have a child; he, to satisfy his lust.

He knew her again no more. Which some have translated quite the contrary, and he ceased not to know her, i.e. he solemnly married her, and took her to be his wife: which was unlawful after the law of Moses was given, but as lawful before, as many other things which they practised. And two of the Chaldean paraphrases have feigned a bath-coll to have come from heaven, to countenance the fact (see Mr. Sewell, lib. v. de Juris N. et G. cap. 3, and lib. vii. cap. 5). But it is not likely he would take his son’s wife to be his own. And likewise having known her, though by an error, most think Shelah himself afterward had her not to wife; but she rather did penance (as we now speak) in widowhood all her days. For Shelah, we find, had children by another (Num. xxvi. 19).

Ver. 29. This came out first. Perceiving there were twins struggling in her womb, the midwife, to distinguish this from the other, as the first-born, bound this thread about his wrist.

Ver. 29. How hast thou broken forth?] What is the cause of this? Or, what a violence is this? Speaking as one astonished at his eruption. For it was without example; and therefore the novelty of the thing made the breach the more unpopular. Though, if it be true which a learned anatomist affirms, that where twins are of the same sex, they are wrapped in the very same secundines, as they call them (whereas those that are of a different, are separated by distinct enclosures), the other son being stronger and more vigorous, might force his way the more readily, when his brother was nearer to the birth (Fernellius, lib. vii. Physiolog, cap. 12).

This breach be upon thee. Take thy name from this breach. Be thou ever called eruption or breach; as Bochart interprets it (Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 30).

Ver. 30. Called Zarah.] Which most think signifies as much as he ariseth (being used commonly of the sun’s rising), because this child appeared first, by putting out his hand before the other.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

1 Joseph advanced in Potiphar’s house. 7 He resisteth his mistress’s temptation. 13 He is falsely accused. 20 He is cast in prison. 21 God is with him there.

And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Ishmeelites, which had brought him down thither.

And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian.

And his master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hand.

And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he Ver. 3. His master saw that the Lord was with him, &c.] Found by observation and experience that he was an extraordinary person. It is not likely that Potiphar knew God by the name of Jehovah; but the meaning is, he observed the happy fruits of Joseph’s service; which Moses, not he, ascribes to the Lord’s peculiar blessing.

Ver. 4. He served him.] Found such favour with his master, that he took him to wait upon his person.

He made him overseer.] In time he advanced him to a higher station, to be (as they now speak) his major slave, though he did not make the servants in the family were to be obedient.

All that he had he put into his hand.] Committed all

CHAP. XXXIX.

Ver. 1. Joseph] Having ended this story of Judah, he returns to that of Joseph, which he had begun before in the thirty-sixth chapter; repeating, where he left off, how he was sold to Potiphar.

Brought down] It is a descent from Judea to Egypt: which lies very low.

Ver. 2. The Lord was with Joseph.] To guide him in his deportment, and in the management of all affairs committed to him: so, that, as it follows, “he was a prosperous man.”

He was in the house of his master.] One of his domestic servants.
served him: and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand.

5 And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field.

6 And he left all that he had in Joseph's hand; and he knew not ought he had, save the bread which he did eat. And Joseph was a goodly person, and well favoured.

7 And it came to pass after these things, that his master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph; and she said, Lie with me.

8 But he refused, and said unto his master's wife, Behold, my master wotteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand;

9 There is none greater in this house than I; neither hath he kept back any thing from me but thee, because thou art his wife: how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?

10 And it came to pass, as she spake to Joseph day by day, that he heartened not unto her, to lie by her, or to be with her.

11 And it came to pass about this time, that Joseph went into the house to do his business: and there was none of the men of the house there within.

12 And she caught him by his garment, saying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out.

13 And it came to pass, when she saw that he had left his garment in her hand, and was fled forth,

14 That she called unto the men of her house and spake unto them, saying, See, he has brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us: he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice:

15 And it came to pass, when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out.

16 And she laid up his garment by her, until his lord came home.

17 And she spake unto him according to these words, saying, The Hebrew servant, which thou hast brought unto us, came in unto me to mock me:

18 And it came to pass, as I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled out.

19 And it came to pass, when his master

To do his business. To cast up his accounts, saith the Chaldee interpreters. None of the men—within. In that part of the house where he was.

Ver. 12. Left his garment in her hand. If he had struggled to get the garment away from her, the accusation might have been more specious, that he went about to ravish her. Epiphanius hath made a good reflection upon this example. Kαταλαμασας τον υματος, και το σωμα σω τω φωτις, &c. (vid. Hier. lxxix. n. 9, “He left his garment, that he might not lose his body; and shunned the place, that he might not fall into the snare.”) And indeed it was dangerous to adventure himself in her company; much more to touch her, lest he should fall into temptation.

Ver. 11. She called unto the men. Cried to them who were in their apartment to come and help her.

He hath brought in. In her rage she reflects upon her husband, as accessory to her danger, that she might the more incite him against Joseph. There is something like this in Apuleius’s story, (ib. x. Metamorph.) of the step-mother’s love to her son-in-law, which was turned into hatred, and made her contrive just such a lie as this, when he would not yield to her.

To mock us. To abuse our family.

I cried with a loud voice. An improbable story (for nobody excepted a servant; whom they all, perhaps, envied. If she pretended it was done in Joseph’s apartment, the question might have been asked her, What she did there?

Ver. 17. Came—to mock me. To offer violence to me (as the Hebrew phrase signifies), and rob me of my chastity.

Ver. 18. He left his garment with me. Philo observes, that this was an argument rather that she laid hands on him: for he could have easily taken his garment from her, if he had not fled hastily from her importunity. But her husband’s jealousy made him credulous.
hearing the words of his wife, which she spake unto him, saying, After this manner did thy servant to me; that his wrath was kindled.

20 And Joseph's master took him, and put him into the prison, a place where the king's prisoners were bound: and he was there in the prison.

21 ¶ But the Lord was with Joseph, and shewed him mercy, and gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison.

Ver. 20. Joseph's master took him, &c.] Caused him to be apprehended, and carried to prison. During his anger he would not hearken to the apology, which we cannot but think he offered to make for himself. Unless we suppose (which is not unlikely) that his master would not so much as see him, but ordered him immediately to be hurried to the jail.

A place where the king's prisoners were bound:] Where the king himself caused those who had offended him to be committed. This shows Potiphar was a great man (see xl. 3), and that he looked upon the crime as very great: for this prison, we must think, was most strictly guarded, that they who were thrown into it might not escape punishment. And it appears by what the Psalmist says (vs. 18), that the prisoners were hardly used; and that Joseph (xl. 15) was thrust into the lowest part of the prison, which was the most dismal, as well as of greatest difficulty to make an escape out of it.

CHAPTER XL.

1 The butler and baker of Pharaoh in prison. 4 Joseph hath charge of them. 5 He interpreteth their dreams.

20 They came to pass according to his interpretation. 23 The ingratitude of the butler.

4 And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them: and they continued a season in ward.

5 ¶ And they dreamed a dream both of them, each man his dream in one night, each man according to the interpretation of his dream, the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the prison.

6 And Joseph came in unto them in the morn-

CHAP. XL.

Ver. 1. Had offended their lord] In the Hebrew is a word of the plural number for lord, viz. adonim, "a raionite dignitatis," saith Bochart; because of his high authority. And so it is used not only when he speaks of the king, but of great men; particularly of Joseph's master (xxxix. 2). Interpreters do but guess at their offence; which might as well be an effort upon his life (by poison, or other ways), as any thing else.

Ver. 2. Wrath against two of his officers.] They are called the chief of the butlers (viz. sortis) which we met withal before (xxxvii. 36). For in all courts such officers had a principal place (see ver. 4).

Chief of the butlers] Or, cup-bearer to the king, (ver. 13). He simply named the butler and baker in the foregoing verse: but now the scher (as the Hebrew word is), which in the next verse we translate baker, i.e. the principal officer of those kinds, which would incline one to think, that some under butler and baker were accused of a great fault for which the head butler and baker were to answer: who, perhaps, were discovered to have ordered them to do what they did.

22 And the keeper of the prison committed to Joseph's hand all the prisoners that were in the prison: and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it.

23 The keeper of the prison looked not to any thing that was under his hand; because the LORD was with him, and that which he did, the LORD made it to prosper.

He was there in the prison.] His master proceeded no further against him, but there he left him. Perhaps Joseph found means to let him know the truth; which made him not form any process to take away his life, or inflict any other punishment on him: and yet, to save his wife's credit, he let him lie in the prison.

Ver. 21. The Lord was with Joseph.] The same wisdom and virtue appeared in him, now, he was in prison, that his master discerned, when he came first into his house (ver. 2).

Gave him favour] So that he had more liberty than the rest, after some short confinement.

Keeper of the prison.] The under-keeper it appears from xl. 4.

Ver. 22.] His favour increased so much (as it had done in his master's house, ver. 4) that he, in effect, was the keeper of the prison, not a prisoner.

Chief of the baker's.] Who took care of all baked meats and confections, &c. (ver. 17).

Ver. 3. He put them in ward, &c.] To be kept close prisoners.

In the house of the captain of the guard, &c.] In that prison, of which Potiphar had the chief custody. Who by this appears to have been such an officer as we call lieutenant of the Tower.

The place where Joseph was bound.] Into that very place where Joseph had been bound. For now he was at liberty, in the prison.

Ver. 4. The captain of the guard charged Joseph, &c.] By this it appears Potiphar's anger was mitigated towards him (having heard the truth, it is likely, before this time), and was of the same mind with the under-keeper of the prison: who intrusted all in Joseph's hand.

He served them.] Attended upon them (which shows they were great persons) to provide them what they wanted, &c.

They continued a season.] The Hebrew word is, jaim, i.e. days: which frequently signifies a year; as hath been observed before (xiv. 55).

Ver. 5. Each man according to the interpretation of his dream,] Suitable to the office which he had.

He serv'd them.] They were dealt with in proportion to the magnitude of their dreams.
CHAPTER XL.

ing, and looked upon them, and, behold, they were sad.

7 And he asked Pharaoh's officers that were with him in the ward of his lord's house, saying, Wherefore look ye so sadly to day?

8 And they said unto him, We have dreamed a dream, and there is no interpreter of it. And Joseph said unto them, Do not interpretations belong to God? tell me them, I pray you.

9 And the chief butler told his dream to Joseph, and said to him, In my dream, behold, a vine was before me;

10 And in the vine were three branches: and it was as though it budded, and her blossoms forth set forth ripe grapes:

11 And Pharaoh's cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's hand.

Exod. xxxi. 13). For there being a roll, or catalogue of all the officers of the court, with their several salaries, they were all called over on some certain day (it would seem before the festivals, and when the king was present) and summoned to give their attendance. And then such as the king was offended withal, were struck out, and punished according to their deserts; or pardoned and graciously restored to their places. This exposition best agrees with the event (ver. 20), where the heads of both these officers are said to be lifted up: though one of them only was advanced to his former station.

Ver. 14. But think on me, &c. When my prediction is come to pass, I ask no other reward of thee, but that thou wilt be an instrument of delivering me from my imprisonment. Joseph was not only grown expert in interpreting dreams (which he was not before he came into Egypt, xxxvii. 6, &c.), but fully assured he knew the right meaning of them: as appears by this passage. And such kinds of predictions by dreams were frequently in ancient times, among the heathen as well as among the Hebrews: though in after ages they grew rare in both. For (as Dr. Jackson admirably speaks, in the place before named) the increase of wickedness in the world; multiplicity of businesses; some family matters; and the pride of men, and men's too much depending on politic devices to accomplish their ends; caused the defect of true dreams, and of other Divine admonitions, for the welfare of mankind.

Ver. 15. I was stolen] Carried away by violence, without the knowledge of my father: and sold for a slave. His brethren, in selling him, committed that crime, which the Latins call plagium. For, "Qui hominem liberum vendit, plagiator est." Out of the land of the Hebrews: Some men would have it thought, that these words were added by Joshua, or some other, after Moses's time: because Canaan was not called the land of the Hebrews in his days, much less in Joseph's. But they should have depended, that Joseph did not call all the land of Canaan by this name; but only that part of it where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had very long lived, viz., about Hebron. There Abraham (who was the first that is called a Hebrew) settled with his family when he came out of Chaldea (xiii. 17, 18). There Isaac dwelt also (xxxv. 27), and Jacob (xxxvii. 1, 4), where he first said, indeed, they were strangers or sojourners, in this country: but they were strangers of great note and name (as Jacobus Altingius hath well observed), who were treated as princes (xxiii. 6), lived by their own laws; made leagues, not only with private men, 16 When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good, he said unto Joseph, I also was in my dream, and, behold, I had three white baskets on my head:

17 And in the uppermost basket there was of all manner of bakemeats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head.

18 And Joseph answered and said, This is the interpretation thereof: The three baskets are three days:

19 Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee, and shall hang thee on a tree; and the birds shall eat thy flesh from off thee.

20 ¶ And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, that he made a feast unto all his servants; and he lifted up the head of the chief butler and of the chief baker among his servants.

21 And he restored the chief butler unto his butlership again; and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand:

22 But he hanged the chief baker: as Joseph had interpreted to them.

23 Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgot him.

but with cities and with kings (xxii. 22, 22, xxvi. 28, xxxiv. 4), and the fame of them could not but be spread abroad, both by the victory which Abraham got in a battle, over several kings; and by the sacking of Shechem, which the neighbours durst not revenge. All which might well make that part of the country wherein they had resided for three generations be called the land of the Hebrews: where they were at first planted by the consent of the natives: who were confederated with Abraham (xiv. 13).

That they should put me into the dungeon. Into which he was thrown at the first, as a great malefactor; for this was the lowest and darkest place in the prison, being under ground. So the Hebrew word commonly signifies, a pit either with or without water in it; and thence, this part of a prison; which Bochartus well translates cryptam subterraneam; and sometimes signifies a grave (Psalm xxxviii. 1; Hierozol. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 4).

Ver. 16. The chief baker saw that the interpretation was good.] It was well the chief butler propounded his dream first, which had a good significatio: for it this man had spoken first, the other, it is likely, would not have proposed his dream.

Three white baskets.] Or, as we now speak, three wicker baskets, and (as the margin hath it) the twigs so twisted, that they were full of holes; as ours many times are wrought.

Ver. 17. In the uppermost basket. They were set one upon another: in the lowernest of which, we may suppose, was bread; in the middlemost pieces; and in the highest, the finer sort of pastes of all sorts, biscuit, tarts, &c.

Ver. 19. Lift up thy head. The same phrase, which was used of the other (ver. 13), but with this addition, from off thee. To signify, that his name should be called for another purpose; that he might not only have his name struck out of the roll, but his head struck off from his body. Though there is no necessity so to understand it; but only simply, that he should lose his life.

Shall hang thee on a tree?] They that fancy his head was first cut off, will have the body only hanged on a gibbet. But it is more likely he was hanged by the neck, as malefactors are now among us upon a gallows.

The birds shall eat thy flesh.] He was left there, to be devoured by birds of prey.

Ver. 20. Pharaoh's birthday. Either the day on which he was born, or the day on which he came to the crown: which was natalis imperii, the birthday of his empire. Both of them were wont to be celebrated with rejoicing and great feasts, in ancient times as well as now (see the commentators upon Matt. xiv. 6).

Ver. 31. He gave the cup. His fault, we may suppose, was of a smaller nature; or, there was not evi dent proof against him; or, he had better friends, who interceded for him: so that he was not only pardoned, but restored to his office.

Ver. 32. But he hanged the chief baker.] Ordered him to be hanged, being found guilty of what he was accused, &c.

Ver. 33. Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph. He repeats it, to show how very unmindful he was of him; after the manner of those vain courtiers, who have no value for wisdom or virtue, but are wholly given up to their pleasures. It would have cost him nothing to mention Joseph to Pharaoh; but he seems to have been one of those who will spend their interest, as we now speak, for nobody but themselves. Or, as it may be interpreted, he did not, as soon as he came to his place, call him to mind, who foretold his good fortune; and so, in process of time, he quite forgot him.

CHAPTER XLI.

1 Pharaoh's two dreams. 25 Joseph interpreteth them. 50 He begetteth Manasseh and Ephraim. 54 The famine beginneth.

1 And it came to pass at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed: and, behold, he stood by the river.

2 And, behold, there came up out of the river seven well favoured kine and fatfleshed; and they fed in a meadow.

Pharaoh dreamed.] Had an extraordinary dream, sent from God.

He stood by the river.] Where they were wont to recreate themselves; especially in hot weather, and when they expected its rise to such a degree, as to give hopes of a plentiful year.

Ver. 2. Behold, there came up out of the river.] This
And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill favoured and leanfleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river.

And the ill favoured and leanfleshed kine did eat up the seven well favoured and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke.

And he slept and dreamed the second time: and, behold, seven ears of corn came up upon one stalk, rank and good.

And the seven thin ears devoured the seven rank and full ears. And Pharaoh awoke, and, behold, it was a dream.

And it came to pass in the morning that his spirit was troubled: and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

Then spake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, saying, I do remember my faults this day: 10 Pharaoh was wroth with his servants, and put me in ward in the captain of the guard's house, both me and the chief baker.

And we dreamed each man according to the interpretation of his dream.

And there was there with us a young man, an Hebrew, servant to the captain of the guard; and we told him, and he interpreted to us our dreams.

In Hebrew (or rather Chaldee) for magicians, had a bad signification in aftertimes; but what kind of men they were now, we do not know: whether they professed to interpret dreams and i., by natural observations; or such rules as are now found in the books of Oracolocritics; or by consulting demons; or only by the foolish art of astrology, to which they were much addicted in future ages.

Our learned Nie. Fuller (lib. v. Miscell. Sacr. cap. 11,) thinks the Hebrew word chartummut imports, such as dividing by certain superstitious characters, pictures, images, and figures; which they engraved with magical rites and ceremonies.

All the wise men thereof: these were the same, I suppose, with those who were called philosophers in Greece; from whence several great men went to learn of the Egyptian priests, who were famous for wisdom before it came among the Jews.

Told them his dream: he told them both his dreams, as appears from what follows; but Moses speaks in the singular number, because they were, in effect, but one and the same dream.

But there was none that could interpret them: either they were amazed, and did not attempt an exposition, as beyond their skill; or what they said gave no satisfaction to the king: the seven kine and the seven ears, it is likely, they thought had a great mystery in them; if the worship of the planets was then among them. Which they invoked with secret or unutterable invocation, karies dekstitoys (as the oracle mentioned by Porphyry speaks) which were invented by that most excellent of all magicians (saith the same oracle), the king of the seven sounds, whom all men know," i.e. Ostanes, or Hostanes.

As epe Mavm oX arpeos

By which seven sounds (of which he was the inventor and governor,) Mr. Selden think he meant the harmony, which the ancients supposed the seven planets to make; whom these magicians called upon eptakaphao, with seven invocations to each planet, upon its proper day. As he shows, lib. iii. de Jure Nat. et G. cap. 19. But the more they laboured to find out this mystery, the more they were puzzled and perplexed in their thoughts: nor could their prayers (if they went that way to work) help them to disclose the secret.

Call to mind the offences I committed against Pharaoh: or, as some will have it, my ingratitude to one, who was in prison with me.

Each man according: just according to the event was each of our dreams.

As he interpreted to us, so it was: Re-dreams; to each man according to his dream he did interpret.

13 And it came to pass, as he interpreted to us, so it was; me he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged.

14 ¶ Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they brought him hastily out of the dungeon: and he shaved himself; and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh.

15 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it: and I have heard say of thee, that thou canst understand a dream to interpret it.

16 And Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace.

17 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, In my dream, behold, I stood upon the bank of the river:

18 And, behold, there came up out of the river seven kine, fatfleshed and well favoured; and they fed in a meadow:

19 And, behold, seven other kine came up after them, poor and very ill favoured and leanfleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for badness:

20 And the lean and the ill favoured kine did eat up the first seven fat kine:

21 And when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were still ill favoured, as at the beginning. So I awoke.

peals the thing often, to show how exactly Joseph hit the truth in his interpretation.

Me he restored unto mine office, &c.] He told me, that on such a day I should be restored to my office; and he told the other he should be hanged.

Ver. 14. Brought him hastily.] With all speed; that Pharaoh might not continue in suspense.

Out of the dungeon.] It is reasonable to think, that, though he was thrown into the dungeon at the first (xl. 15), he did not continue there, when he looked after all the prisoners, and did the whole business of a keeper (xxxix. 23, 24). This part therefore, as it is usual, is put for the whole; signifying no more, than that the brought him out of prison, where he had been in the dungeon.

He shaved himself, &c.] It was the custom in most countries, when men were in a mournful condition, to neglect their hair, both of the head and the beard; and not to shift their clothes, as in prosperity; but to continue in a mean dress, whereby they expressed the sense they had of their calamity.

Ver. 16. It is not in me.] A modest answer. I do not pretend to more wisdom than those thou hast already consulted.

God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace.] But God, I doubt not, will direct me to give the king a satisfactory answer: may, an answer that shall be serviceable to him and to his kingdom.

Ver. 17. Well suppose that Joseph desired to know the dream: which Pharaoh repeats in this and the following verses something more fully than it is set down before.

Ver. 21.] An emblem of a very grievous famine, which is represented, not only by the lean kine devouring the fat (as much as to say, the barren years consuming all the growth of the fertile), but by their remaining lean, as if they had eaten nothing: which represents what often happens in famine, that men eat greedily, but are not satisfied, because God breaks the staff of bread (Lev. xxvi. 26): i.e. takes away its nourishing virtue; as Bochart expounds it, Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 41. But this seems to be a straining of that phrase, break the staff of bread, which signifies no more, than want of bread to support man's life. And all that can be gathered from this part of the dream, is, that there should be such exceeding great scarcity, that men should have but just enough to keep them alive.

Ver. 25. The dream of Pharaoh is one.] One and the same thing is represented by two several figures.

God hath shewed Pharaoh what he is about to do.] God hath in these dreams revealed to Pharaoh, what he intends shortly to bring to pass.

Ver. 26.] He represents in this, and in the following verse, how one thing is signified by two dreams. Seven good kine, and seven good ears, representing seven years of plenty; and seven lean kine, and seven empty ears, as many years of scarcity.

Ver. 28.] I have told the king in short, what the Divine providence is about to effect.

Ver. 29.] I will repeat it more at large. Take notice then that, in the next seven years to this, there shall be very great crops of corn, everywhere, throughout the whole country.

Ver. 30. And immediately after they are ended, shall follow seven years as barren as the former were fruitful, the earth bringing forth little or no corn; which will make so great a famine, that there shall be no memory of the foregoing plenty; for there shall be no corn left, but all eaten up, throughout all the land of Egypt.

Ver. 31.] I say, there shall be no mark remaining of the foregoing plenty; by reason of the extreme scarcity in the following years, which will be very heavy.
Pharaoh twice; it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass.

32 Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt.

33 Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years.

34 And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities.

35 And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine.

37 And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his servants.

38 And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the Spirit of God is?

39 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art:

40 Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou.

Ver. 32. The dream was doubled, &c.] The repetition of the dream signifies the certainty of what I say: God having so determined; who will shortly justify the truth of my predictions. Both here and in the foregoing discourse (ver. 25, 28), he directs Pharaoh to look up unto God, as the author of all these events: and, that, not in an ordinary, but extraordinary manner. For such fertility and such famine did not proceed from mere natural causes; but from an overruling Providence. It is observed by Pliny (lib. v. Nat. Hist. cap. 9), that when Nile rose only twelve cubits, a famine followed: when thirteen, a great scarcity: when fourteen, they had a good year; when fifteen, a very good: and if it rose sixteen, it made delicia, luxuriant plenty; and the greatest increase they ever knew, was to eighteen cubits. Now that this dream was doubled, and Pharaoh was bid to double his exercise, both in laying up corn, and in appointing officers, it is therefore a certain thing, to be sure, that God had foretold it, and that he should have it. Therefore, (ver. 33) he is commanded to lay in corn, and to appoint officers; (ver. 34) in order to provide for famine.

Ver. 33. Look out a man discreet and wise.] One fit to manage so great an affair. He that could foretell such events, was fit to advise what was to be done upon the foresight of them; but, it is probable, he did not presume to give such directions, till he was asked his advice.

Ver. 34. Let Pharaoh do this. When this is done. Let him appoint officers.] Let that chief ruler appoint officers under him, in the several provinces of the kingdom: such as the Romans called prefecros, annona.

Take up the fifth part.] Some have asked, why not the half, since there were to be as many years of famine as of plenty. To which such answers as these have been given by interpreters:—that the greater and richer sort were wont in time of plenty to fill their storehouses: as a provision against a scarcher year, which sometimes happened. And, secondly, that, in time of famine, men are wont to live more frugally; and not spend so much as they do in better times. And, thirdly, that even in those years of great plenty, they might be bound to, or at least near the banks of Nile. But the plainest answer is, that ten parts being the tribute due to kings in many countries, and it is likely here (as I observed upon xxviii. ult.) Pharaoh was advised to double this charge, in the years of extraordinary plenty: when the fifth part was not more than the tenth in other years. Or, (as others rather to be supposed from a good king and a good counselor,) to buy as much more as was his tribute; which he might do at an easy rate, when vast plenty made corn very cheap.

Ver. 25. Gather all the food.] The fifth part of the growth of the next seven years.

Lay up corn.] In places provided for that purpose. Under the hand of Pharaoh.] Not to be meddled withal, but kept by Pharaoh's order, to be dispensed hereafter, as need shall require.

Let them keep food in the cities.] Let this food be reserved in the several cities of the kingdom.

Ver. 26. That food shall be for store.] Shall not be spent; but laid up and preserved against the time of famine.

That the land.] The people of the land do not perish.

Ver. 37.] The king and all the court were pleased with this advice. But some may wonder that Pharaoh and his ministers should so readily believe a young man, and a stranger; of a nation whom they did not converse withal, and lately accused of a great crime. But they may be satisfied by considering, that Joseph had cleared himself in the opinion of the keeper of the prison; where he had been known already to have interpreted dreams exactly according to the events in two notorious cases, which the chief butler had reported (ver. 12, 13). And besides, his exposition in the figure which Pharaoh saw in his dream, was so natural, that it was apt to beget belief, if he had not been an expounder of dreams before. And above all it is to be considered, that God who sent the dreams, and made them stick in Pharaoh's thoughts, disposed his mind also to receive the interpretation, with a deep sense of its truth.

Ver. 38. Pharaoh said unto his servants.] The great ministers of the kingdom and officers of the court, who stood about him.

In whom the Spirit of God is?] Without which he could not foresee and foretell such things.

Ver. 39. Pharaoh said unto Joseph.] It seems all his servants were of Pharaoh's mind, and consented to what he said, being amazed at the wisdom which appeared in Joseph.

Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this.] God wrought in him the highest opinion of Joseph, as a man divinely inspired.

There is none so discreet—] Thou thyself art the only person, whom thou advisest me to set over the land (ver. 33).

Ver. 40. Take care of my house.] Be the chief minister in my court: for that is meant by his house.

According unto thy word:] As thou shalt give orders.

Shall all my people be ruled.] The margin translates it armed; as if he put the whole militia of the kingdom into his hands: but this seems too narrow a sense; nor was there any thoughts of war at this time, but of the government of the kingdom in times of peace. And therefore we also translate it kiss, i.e. obey, as the LXX. and Vulgar well translate it; and as it signifies in Psalm ii. ult. Kiss the Son, i.e. submit to him, and obey him.
41 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt.
42 And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph’s hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck;
43 And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him,

Bow the knee: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt.
44 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt.
45 And Pharaoh called Joseph’s name Zaphnath-paaneach; and he gave him to wife Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On.

Only in the throne will I be greater than thou.] Thou shalt have no superior, but only myself.

Ver. 41.] He had advised Pharaoh only to set a man over the chief inspector of the stores of corn, ver. 33 (for which Pharaoh thought none so fit as Joseph himself, ver. 39), but now he constitutes him chief governor, under him, in all affairs of the whole country.

Ver. 42. Took off his ring, &c.] This is well explained by Vossius (lib. i. de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. cap. 9), in these words: ‘Tum ut symbolum dignitatis, tum ad literas et diplomata publica nomine signandas, “both in token of the dignity to which he was preferred, and that he might seal letters and patents in the king’s name.”

Vestures of fine linen,] So the Hebrew word sechesh signifies, rather than silk (as it is translated in the margin), though not the common linen, but that which was more expensive and finer. In such vestures did Solomon, 1 Kings i. 46, and the king of Babylon, 2 Kings ii. 11, dress Pharaoh’s princes, and the Levites signified, Lev. xvi. 40, a sort of linen, very pure, and soft; and very dear; because it did not grow everywhere. Linum tenuissimum et pretiosissimum, as Brunius shows (lib. i. de Vestib. Sacerdot. Hebr. cap. 6). In garments made of this, great men only, not the vulgar people were clothed: kings themselves, it appears by Genesis 41. 42, were not such vestsures.

Put a gold chain about his neck: ] Another token of the highest dignity.

Ver. 43. Made him to ride in the second chariot.] In the best of the king’s coaches (as we now speak) except one, which Pharaoh reserved for himself; and attended, no doubt, with a suitable equipage, of footmen and horsemen, perhaps, for a guard to his person.

Bow the knee:] They that went before his chariot, to make way for him, required all to do him such reverence as they did to the king himself, when he appeared: which was by bowing their knees or their body. The word they used to this purpose, as they went along, was abreh; which we translate bow the knee, deriving it from the Hebrew word barach, which hath that signification. Though others will have it to signify the father of the king: for rach, in the Syrian language, signifies a king, if we may believe R. Solomon. Others translate it, a tender father, of the country which he had preserved (see Vossius, lib. i. de Idol. cap. 29). And Hottinger will have it as much as God save the king, &c.; A blessing light on you (solution, p. 191). But unless we understand the old Egyptian language, I think we had as good rest in the Hebrew derivation as in any other: according to our own translation. He made him ruler over all the land of Egypt.] After this manner he constituted him supreme governor of the whole country, under himself; according to his resolution, ver. 41.

Ver. 44. I am Pharaoh.] This is my will and pleasure; who am king of Egypt.

Without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot, &c.] A proverbial speech. Let no man presume to do the smallest thing, in public affairs, without thy order.

Ver. 45. Pharaoh called Joseph’s name] He gave him a new name; partly, because he was a foreigner; and partly, to honour him; and yet to denote him to be his subject, though ruler of everybody else. We find Nebuchadnezzar did the same in Babylon (Dan. i. 7), and he alluded to the ancient eastern countries; where the Mogul never advances any man, but he gives him a new name; and that significant of something belonging to him. As, not long ago, he called his brother-in-law Aushp-Chan, the gathering, or the rich lord; and his physician Muero Chan, the lord of my health, &c., as Peter de la Valle relates in his travels, p. 465, where he observes the same of his wives, p. 470.

Zaphnath-paaneach; ] Which St. Jerome interprets, the Saviour of the world. But the whole stream of interpreters carry it for another signification, which is, the interpreter of secrets, or the revealer of future things. See Sixt. Amama, and Athan. Kircher’s Prodro- mus, cap. 5, and our countryman, J. Gregory, cap. i. of his Observ. If he interprets this word, “On颇有帕娜依之义” (Observ. Sacr. lib. i. cap. 5), an interpreter of dreams, and a finder out of things hidden. But as Jacobides observes upon Daniel i. 7, that the Egyptian and Persian kings gave names, for honour and glory (in token of their supreme greatness and authority), so it was most for their glory, to give them out of their own language. And therefore if this be the meaning of Zaphnath-paaneach, the Egyptian tongue and the Hebrew had a great affinity one to the other.

He gave him to wife] Either the king then disposed of the great noblemen’s daughters, when their parents were dead (as our kings lately did of their wards), or Asenath was of Pharaoh’s kindred, and so he provided her a husband, and gave her a portion. And the meaning simply is, he made this match for him.

The daughter of Poti-pherah] This is a different name from his who was captain of the guard; and was of a different quality. And therefore there is no reason, from some likeness in their names, to think that Joseph married the daughter of him who had been his master: for he would have abhorred to match with one that was born of so low a woman as his mistress; as Vossius well observes in the place forenamed.

Priest of On.] Or, prince of On (as the margin hath it); for the word cohen signifies both priest and prince (see 2 Sam. vii. ult.), priests being anciently the prime men of the kingdom; for kings themselves were priests.

On was a famous city in Egypt, called afterwards Heliopolis, which gave name to one of the Nume, i.e. provinces of Egypt; whereof this Poti-pherah was governor, or lieutenant. Concerning which province, and Asenath, and Poti-pherah, see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedris, p. 406.

Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt, ] To see what places were fittest for stores.
And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt.

46 § And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt. And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt.

47 And in the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfulls.

48 And he gathered up all the food of the seven years, which were in the land of Egypt, and laid up the food in the cities: the food of the field, which was round about every city, laid he up in the same.

49 And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbering; for it was without number.

50 And unto Joseph were born two sons before the years of famine came, which Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On bare unto him.

51 And Joseph called the name of the firstborn Manasseh: For God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house.

52 And the name of the second he Ephraim: For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction.

53 ¶ And the seven years of plenteousness, that was in the land of Egypt, were ended.

54 And the seven years of dearth began to come, according as Joseph had said: and the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread.

55 And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do.

56 And the famine was over all the face of the earth: And Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt.

57 And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands.

Ver. 46. Joseph was thirty years old] So he had been out of his country thirteen years; for he was but seventeen years old (xxxvii. 2), when he was sold into Egypt. In which time, we may well think, he had learned the language of that country, and gained much experience; but never sent to his father; in which there is visibly a special providence of God; for his father might have used means for his deliverance, and then he had never come to this greatness.

When he stood before Pharaoh] When Pharaoh made him his prime minister. For the great counsellors and ministers alone were admitted into the king's presence (in the eastern countries, and it is likely, the same state was kept here), and are said to stand before the king (Dan. i. 19), and to see the king's face (Esther i. 14).

And went throughout all the land] He seems to have only taken a general view of the country before (ver. 45), but now a more particular; to give orders for the building of storehouses, against the plenteous years came.

Ver. 47. Brought forth by handfulls.] Such large ears that a few of them would make a sheaf: which our translation seems here to mean by handfulls: for sheaves are bound up with men's hands. And so it may be interpreted, it brought forth sheaves, or heaps; or, it is truly a handfull, i.e. vast abundance. Some conceive the corn was laid up in sheaves, heaped up very high: and not threshed out: for so it would keep the longer.

Ver. 48. He gathered up all the food.] The fifth part, as he had proposed (ver. 34), i.e. he bought it: which he might do at a small price, when there was unusual plenty.

Laid up the food in the cities.] It is very probable he laid it up, as it was gathered, unharvested: that there might be food for the cattle also. So the Vulgar, "In manipulos reducte segetes congregato sunt in horren." And what was laid up in the first year of plenty, it is reasonable to think was dispensed in the first year of famine, &c.

Building about every city.] This was very wisely ordered: for it was less charge to Pharaoh for the present, and more easy to the country when they wanted provision.

Ver. 49.] The following words explain this hyperbolical expression. And the reason of his heaping up so much was, that there might be sufficient to supply the necessities of other countries, as well as of Egypt.

Ver. 50. God—hath made me forget all my toil.] The great affliction and hard labour he endured in prison.

All my father's house.] The unkindness of his brethren, who were the cause of all his trouble. By imposing this name on his firstborn, he admonished himself in the midst of his prosperity of his former adversity, which he now thought of with pleasure.

Ver. 52. In the land of my affliction.] In the country where I have suffered much affliction.

Ver. 53.] It was beside the intention of Moses to relate any of the affairs of that country, but what belonged to this matter; and therefore he passes over all other transactions of these seven years; as he doth all the things that happened in Jacob's family, over since Joseph came from it.

Ver. 54. The dearth was in all lands.] In all the countries thereabouts, Canaan, Syria, &c. It seems there was a general want of rain.

But in—Egypt there was bread.] They did not feel the famine presently, because they had much to spare from the former years of plenty.

Ver. 55. When all the land—was famished.] When they had eaten up all their own stores, which, we may suppose, failed in two years' time.

The people cried to Pharaoh, &c.] Made earnest petitions to the king, for relief of their necessities.

Ver. 56. The famine was over all—the earth.] Grew still greater in all the neighbouring countries. The famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt.] For the Egyptians themselves, having spent all their own stores, were sorely pinched.

Ver. 57. All the countries came—to buy corn, &c.] i.e. The neighbouring countries, as was said before (ver. 54). For if the most distant had come, the storehouses had been soon emptied.

Because that the famine was so sore.] It increased more and more, in those countries before named, which were grievously afflicted by it.
CHAPTER XLII.

1 Jacob sendeth his ten sons to buy corn in Egypt. 16 They are imprisoned by Joseph for spies. 18 They are set at liberty, on condition to bring Benjamin. 21 They have remorse for Joseph. 14 Simeon is kept for a pledge. 25 They return with corn, and their money. 29 Their relation to Jacob. 36 Jacob refuseth to send Benjamin.

1 Now when Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his sons, Why do ye look one upon another? 2 And he said, Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt; get ye down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die. 3 ¶ And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt. 4 But Benjamin, Joseph's brother, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mishief befal him. 5 And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan. 6 And Joseph was the governor over the land, and he it was that sold to all the people of the land: and Joseph's brethren came, and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth.

7 And Joseph saw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himself strange unto them, and spake roughly unto them; and he said unto them, Whence come ye? And they said, From the land of Canaan to buy food. 8 And Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not him. 9 And Joseph remembered the dreams which he dreamed of them, and said unto them, Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. 10 And they said unto him, Nay, my lord, but to buy food are thy servants come. 11 We are all one man's sons; we are true men, thy servants are no spies. 12 And he said unto them, Nay, but to see the nakedness of the land ye are come.

CHAP. XLII.

Ver. 1. When Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt, &c. He saw, perhaps, some pass by laden with corn, which they had bought there. Or, one sense (as is frequent in Scripture) is put for another: seeing for hearing; as it is expressed, ver. 2. Why do ye look one upon another? As idle people use to do, while none of them will stir to seek relief. Or, rather, as men that know not what course to take, expecting who would begin to advise for their preservation.

Ver. 2.] He excites them to make no further delay, by the great necessity wherein they were; no less than danger of perishing.

Ver. 4.] He being, as yet, but young, and not used to travel, Jacob was afraid the journey might be hazardous to him. Besides, he could not but desire to have sure to see his company: though this was not his principal reason.

Ver. 5.] People came from all parts thereabout, upon the same business; and Jacob's sons among others; whom, perhaps, they met withal upon the road.

Ver. 6. Joseph was the governor.] The Hebrew word signifies, sometimes, one that hath absolute power: and seems to be used here to set forth the high authority which Joseph exercised under Pharaoh.

It it was that sold to all the people.] Appointed at what rates corn should be sold, in every part of the country. For it is not to be supposed that he in person could treat with every man that came to buy; but he by his deputies, who observed his orders.

Joseph's brethren came.] It should seem by this, that all foreigners were ordered to come to him; in the royal city, where he resided; or, at least, their names were brought to him, that he might speak with such as he thought fit; and thereby get the better intelligence of the state of their several countries; and bow to his brethren, who, he knew, would be constrained to come thither.

Bowed down themselves before him.] Unwittingly fulfilled his dream. This seems to have been done after the manner of their own and other eastern coun-tries; not of Egypt, where they only bowed the knee (xli. 40).

Ver. 7. Spake roughly unto them.] Gave them hard words, as we speak. Or, spake in a harsh tone to them, and with a stern countenance.

Ver. 8. But they knew not him.] They had not seen him in twenty years: in which time a youth alters far more than grown men do; so that though he knew them, they might not know him; who appeared also in such pomp and state, that it made them, not think of him; and he spake also to them by an interpreter (ver. 25), which represented him as a stranger to them.

Ver. 9. Ye are spies.] He did not think they were such persons, but said this to provoke them, to give an account of themselves, and of his father. Nor is there any reason to look upon this as a lie. For they are not words of affirmation, but of probation or trial: such as judges use, when they examine suspected persons, or inquire into a crime, of which men are accused. And therefore have the force of an interrogation: Are ye not spies? or, I must take you for spies till you prove the contrary.

To see the nakedness of the land.] The weak places of the country, which are least defensible. Or, as others will have it, the secrets of the land; for it is the same word that is used to express the privy parts.

Ver. 11. We are all one man's sons.] There needed no more than this to take off his suspicions. For no man would have sent his sons, but rather his servants, if they had come upon an ill design: or, at least, not all his sons: or not all of them together in a company: but dispersed them rather about the country. Nor was it probable, that one man could have a design upon Egypt; but all the great men of Canaan must have joined in it: and then they would have sent men of different families, not all of one alone.

We are true men.] This was a good argument that they said, when they told him (ver. 10), they had no other business in Egypt but to buy corn.

Ver. 12.] Unless you have better arguments than this, I must take you for spies. He slights their argument, as great men sometimes do, when they know
CHAPTER XLII.

13 And they said, Thy servants are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and, behold, the youngest is this day with ourfather, and one is not.

14 And Joseph said unto them, That is it that I spake unto you, saying, Ye are spies:

15 Hereby ye shall be proved: By the life of Pharaoh ye shall not go forth hence, except your youngest brother come hither.

16Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, and ye shall be held in prison, lest your words be verified, and ye shall be put to death. So it shall be that, when we hear that your words are verily true, and that ye are in good faith, 17 And he put them all together into ward three days.

18 And Joseph said unto them the third day, This do, and live; for I fear God:

not presently how to answer it. He had a mind also to have them give a further account of their family, that he might be informed what was become of his brother Benjamin.

Ver. 13.] They enforce their former argument, by redescribing the case more fully and distinctly. But still it amounts to no more than this; that it was not likely a parent would venture all his children, in such a design, as they were suspected to come about.

The youngest is this day with our father.] This was the thing he desired to know.

One is not.] Is dead. So they thought, because they had heard nothing of him in twenty years' space.

Ver. 14.] This confirms what I said, and justifies me just ground for suspicion, that ye are spies; because you pretend to have another brother, which is not likely; for why should not your father send all, as well as so many! This was but a cavil; but served to compass his end, which was to see his brother.

Ver. 15. Hereby ye shall be proved.] By this very thing shall you be tried: whether you be honest men, or no.

By the life of Pharaoh, &c.] As sure as Pharaoh lives; or, in salvo sit, so let Pharaoh be safe and in health, as I will keep you here, till I see your younger brother. Others expound it, If Pharaoh have any authority here, i.e. be king of this country, you shall not have the old you came hither on. But take it for an oath: the original of which is well explained by Mr. Selden, in his Titles of Honour, p. 45, where he observes, that the name of gods being given to kings very early, de deos invocationes (as Aristotle speaks, lib. vi. Ethic. cap. 1), from the excellence of their heroic virtue, which made them anciently great benefactors to mankind, thence arose the custom of swearing by them, which Aben Ezra saith continued in his time (about 1170) when Egypt was governed by caliphs. If any man swore by the king's head, and was found to have sworn falsely, he was punished capitally. And when Sennach Ismael, the first sothi, got the Persian empire, no oath was held so sacred (as Leunelavius reports), as to swear by his head, i.e. in a view of his life.

But St. Basil will not have this to be an oath: but a solemn asservation, to persuade belief. For saith he (tom. 1. Hom. in Ps. xv. p. 155), Ecce tenuis lingua scrutatorius, et vocis, et voce dei et umtis &c. “There are certain speeches which have the fashion of oaths, and yet are not oaths!’ But Scripture saith, that any condition only to perjure the auditors.” Such he takes this to be; and that of St. Paul, Nè òntopathan xaiçutiv, by our rejoicing, 1 Cor. xv. 31, where he saith the apostle was not unmindful of the evangelical commandment, not to swear; but by a speech, in form of an oath, he would have them believe that his glorying in them (or rather in Christ) was dearer to him than anything else. And the truth is, Judah seems to have taken these words of Joseph only for a solemn protestation (xliii. 3), wherein he expressed the fear of Pharaoh (which was most dear to him) unto execution, if he was not equal to his word. So G. Calixtus understands it.

Ver. 16.] At first he proposed that only one of them should return home, to bring their brother to him; and all the rest remain, in the mean time, prisoners in Egypt.

Ver. 17. He put them all together into ward.] That they might consult one with another, which of them should go to fetch Benjamin; about which, it seems, they could not agree; every one fearing to be the messenger of such sad tidings to their father; who might suspect they were all lost.

Ver. 18.] I have no mind to destroy you: for I know there is a God, who will punish all injustice and cruelty. Therefore I make this new proposition to you.

Ver. 19.] This shall be the proof of your honesty. Instead of sending one of you to your father, you shall all go but one, who shall remain bound in prison, till you bring your younger brother; and in the mean time carry provision for your families.

Ver. 20.] Fail not to let me see your youngest brother: and when you have justified yourselves to be no spies; and suffer nothing.

They did so.] They consented to this proposal.

Ver. 21. They said one to another.] They that had the chief hand in the conspiracy against Joseph, began upon this occasion to make the following reflections on it.

We are verily guilty.] See the power of conscience, which flies in their face, and reproaches them for a fact committed above twenty years ago.

In that we saw the anguish of his soul.] We would have no pity, when he besought us with tears; and now nothing that we can say will move this man. They observe their guilt in their punishment. For, as they had thrown Joseph into a pit, so they had then thrown him into prison themselves; and as nothing he could say would incline them to spare him, so now they found Joseph inexorable to them. This anguish of his soul and his entreaties are not mentioned before (chap. xxxvii.), but could not but be supposed, if they had not been mentioned here.

Ver. 22. Reuben answered them, &c.] You should have hearkened unto me, and then you had not come into this distress.

His blood is required.] You killed him, and now you must pay for it with the loss of your lives. For he thought him to be dead.
And he turned himself about from them, and wept; and returned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes.

Then Joseph commanded to fill their sacks with corn, and to restore every man's money into his sack, and to give them provision for the way: and thus did he unto them.

26 And they laded their asses with the corn, and departed thence.

And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money; for, behold, it was in his sack's mouth.

And he said unto his brethren, My money is restored: and, lo, it is even in my sack: and their heart failed them, and they were afraid, saying one to another, What is this that God hath done unto us?

And they came unto Jacob their father unto the land of Canaan, and told him all that befell unto them; saying,

The man, who is the lord of the land, spake roughly to us, and took us for spies of the country.

And we said unto him, We are true men: we are no spies:

This shows the Egyptian tongue and the Hebrew were different; though in some words they might agree.

Ver. 24. He turned himself about from them.] And went into some other room.

And wept.] Natural affection was too strong for the person he put on: and would not suffer him to comterfeit any longer.

When he had vented his passion, and composed himself to his former temper, he repeated to them what he had told them before: but added withal, that if they brought Benjamin with them, they might traffic in the land (ver. 34).

Who, the Hebrews say, was an old man, and lay in the pit: and therefore was now served in his kind. This, I think, may be fairly conjectured, that Reuben being resolved to save him, and Judah also inclined to favour him, if Simeon had joined with them, their authority might have prevailed to deliver him.

Bound him before their eyes.] Caused him to be bound in their presence; to strike the greater terror into them.

Ver. 25. To give them provision for the way.] That they might carry what they bought entire, for the use of their families.

Thus did he unto them.] Thus the person, to whom Joseph gave that command, did unto them.

Ver. 26.] It is not said how many asses they laded; but one would guess, by what follows, only each man one. For they went only to fetch a present supply: not thinking of providing against a long famine.

Wherein was their provision for the way (ver. 25).

Ver. 28. He said unto his brethren, &c.] Who all presently opened their sacks and found their money there. For so the story is told by Judah at their return into Egypt (xliii. 21). And both by that place and this, it appears this happened to them when they came unto their inn, to rest themselves, in their first day's journey.

Ver. 27. As one of them opened his sack, &c.] Their guilt made them so afraid; otherwise they would have rejoiced. But all things terrify an evil conscience: which made them think some design was laid to undo them all.

Ver. 32. We be twelve brethren, sons of our father; one is not, and the youngest is this day with our father in the land of Canaan.

And the man, the lord of the country, said unto us, Hereby shall I know that ye are true men; leave one of your brethren here with me, and take food for the famine of your households, and be gone:

And bring your youngest brother unto me: then shall I know that ye are no spies, but that ye are true men: so will I deliver you your brother, and ye shall traffic in the land.

And it came to pass as they emptied their sacks, that, behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack: and when both they and their father saw the bundles of money, they were afraid.

And Jacob their father said unto them, Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me.

And Reuben spake unto his father, saying, Slay my two sons, if I bring him not to thee: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again.

And he said, My son shall not go down afraid; otherwise they would have rejoiced. But all things terrify an evil conscience: which made them think some design was laid to undo them all.

What is this that God hath done unto us?] Now God was in all their thoughts, as the chief governor of all things: whoseover was the instrument.

Ver. 30. Who is the lord of the land.] By this it appears Joseph was little less than a king, i.e. in his authority and sway, which he bare in that country.

Ver. 31. Took us for spies.] In the Hebrew it is, he gave us, i.e. treated us as spies; by delivering us to be put in prison.

Ver. 34. Ye shall traffic in the land.] Buy corn, or any thing else the country affords; without any let or impediment.

Ver. 35. When both they and their father saw the bundles of money, &c.] They had seen the same before: therefore this is set down to express the fear which Jacob himself was in, at the sight of the money; though we may well suppose their fear was increased, when they perceived him to have the same apprehensions which they had, of some design that might be laid against their lives, when they returned to Egypt, though they brought their younger brother with them.

Ver. 36. Simeon is not.] He looked upon him as dead; being in the power of so rough a man, as they described the lord of the land to be, especially if he did not send Benjamin thither; as, for the present, he was resolved not to do.

Ver. 37. All these things are against me.] Or, upon me, as the Hebrew words carry it. These are heavy burdens which lie upon me, not upon you; who can be content to have Benjamin go, after I have lost two of my sons already.

Ver. 38. Slay my two sons if I bring him not to thee.] Nothing could be more foolishly said; for what good things are done to Jacob (may what an increase of his affliction would it have been), to lose two grandchildren, after he had lost another son? But it was spoken out of a passionate desire to redeem Simeon, and to make more provision for their family: being confident that Joseph (who professed to fear God, ver. 18) would be as good as his word.
with you; for his brother is dead, and he is left alone: if mischief befall him by the way in the which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

Bring down my gray hairs] You will make me, who am worn away already, die with grief.

CHAPTER XLIII.

1 And the famine was sore in the land.
2 And it came to pass, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt, their father said unto them, Go again, buy us a little food.
3 And Judah spake unto him, saying, The man did solemnly protest unto us, saying, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you.
4 If thou wilt send our brother with us, we will go down and buy thee food:
5 But if thou wilt not send him, we will not go down: for the man said unto us, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you.
6 And Israel said, Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me, as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother?
7 And they said, The man asked us straitly of our state, and of our kindred, saying, Is your

CHAP. XLIII.

Ver. 1. The famine was sore, &c.] Still increased to a greater scarcity.
Ver. 2. When they had eaten up the corn] So that they had nothing to live upon but only the poor crop that their own country produced, which could not long sustain them.
Buy us a little food.] He hoped, it is likely, the next year would be better; and so only desired a supply of their present necessity.
Ver. 3. And Judah spake unto him.] Reuben had spoken to him in vain (xlii. 37, 38), and Levi, perhaps, had not recovered his interest in him, since the barbarous action at Shechem: and therefore Judah took upon him to persuade his father; being next in birth, and of no small authority among his brethren.
Ye shall not see my face, &c.] But be taken for spies; and so lose their lives.
Ver. 5. We will not go down.] Because it would not only have been of no purpose, but also endangered their lives.
Ver. 6.] It was unkindly done of you, to tell him of another brother. For what need was there to say any thing of one who was not with you?
Ver. 7.] They having told him, they were all one man's sons (xlii. 11), he might well ask them, what man's? And whether there were any more of them? And whether their father and brother were yet living?
We told him according to the tenor of these words:] Answered every question as truth required.
Ver. 8. Send the lad with me.] Trust him with me. He calls him lad, because he was the youngest of them all; and one, of whom his father was as tender as if he had been a little child, though indeed he had children of his own (xlii. 21).
That we may live, &c.] These were very moving arguments; the preservation of a whole family, Benjamin and all; who, if he went, might return in father yet alive? have ye another brother? and we told him according to the tenor of these words; could we certainly know that he would say, Bring your brother down?

8 And Judah said unto Israel his father, Send the lad with me, and we will arise and go; that we may live and not die, both we, and thou, and also our little ones.
9 I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him: if I bring him not unto thee, set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever:
10 For except we had lingered, surely now we had returned this second time.
11 And their father Israel said unto them, If it must be so now, do this; take of the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds:

safety; but, if he stayed at home, must perish with all the rest.

Ver. 9. I will be surety for him.] Be bound in what penalty thou pleasest, to bring him back.
Of my hand shalt thou require him.] Punish me (who will be answerable for him) if he miscarry.

Bear the blame for ever:] Lie under thy displeasure, as long as I live. All this signifies only, that he would do his utmost to secure him: and rather suffer the heaviest thing himself, than lose Benjamin.
Ver. 10. If thou hadst not hindered us by these scruples about Benjamin, we had been there and at home again, by this time.

Ver. 11. Take of the best fruits] The Hebrew word mazzimrath signifies of the most praised; or, as Bochart more literally interprets it, que in hae terra sunt maxime decantata (par. ii. Hierozol. lib. v. cap. 9), "those fruits which are most celebrated in the land of Canaan:" which was as famous for the things following, as Egypt was for corn. And it seems at this time did not want them; which might make them more acceptable in Egypt, where they grew at no time. For Egypt being a low and plain country, and Canaan a hilly, it made their products very different.

Balm.] Rather resin, as was observed on xxxvii. 25.
Honey.] For which this country was famous; especially in some parts of it, about Tekoa, as Bochart also observes. And therefore was a fit present for a king, as we see in the story of David (2 Sam. xiii. 29). And was carried from hence to the marts of Tyre (Ezek. xxxvii. 17).

Spices.] The word necoth signifies storax; as was also observed before (xxxvii. 25).

Myrrh.] Which Bochart translates mastich.

Nuts.] He also proves, by many arguments, the word botnith signifies those nuts we call tachinos; which may well be numbered among the best fruits of the land: being very friendly 12 And take double money in your hand; and the money that was brought again in the mouth of your sacks, carry it again in your hand; peradventure it was an oversight:
13 Take also your brother, and arise, go again unto the man:
14 And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother, and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved.
15 ¶ And the men took that present, and they took double money in their hand, and Benjamin; and rose up, and went down to Egypt, and stood before Joseph.
16 And when Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay, and make ready; for these men shall dine with me at noon.
17 And the man did as Joseph bade; and the man brought the men into Joseph's house.
18 And the men were afraid, because they were brought into Joseph's house; and they said, Because of the money that was returned in our sacks at the first time are we brought in; that he may seek occasion against us, and fall upon us, and take us for bondmen, and our asses.
19 ¶ And they came near to the steward of Joseph's house, and they communed with him at the door of the house,
20 And said, Sir, we came indeed down at the first time to buy food:
21 And it came to pass, when we came to the inn, that we opened our sacks, and, behold, every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight: and we have brought it again in our hand.
22 And other money have we brought down in our hands to buy food: we cannot tell who put our money in our sacks.
23 And he said, Peace be to you, fear not: your God, and the God of your father, hath given you treasure in your sacks: I had your money. And he brought Simeon out unto them.
24 And the man brought the men into Joseph's house, and gave them water, and they washed their feet; and he gave their asses provender.
25 And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon: for they heard that they should eat bread there.
26 ¶ And when Joseph came home, he brought him the present which was in their hand into the house, and bowed themselves to him to the earth.
27 And he asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? Is he yet alive?
28 And they answered, Thy servant our father is in good health, he is yet alive. And they bowed down their heads, and made obeisance.
29 And he lifted up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother, of whom ye spake unto me? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son.
30 And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother: and he sought where to weep; and he entered into his chamber, and wept there.

31 And he washed his face, and went out, and refrained himself, and said, Set on bread.

32 And they set on for him by himself, and for them by themselves, and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themselves: because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

33 And they sat before him, the firstborn according to his birthright, and the youngest according to his youth: and the men marvelled one at another.

God be gracious unto thee, my son.] He blessed him, as superiors were wont to do those below them: whom they called their sons, with respect to themselves, as fathers of the country.

Ver. 30. His bowels did yearn.] He felt a great comotion within himself, which he was not able to keep from him, but therefore he made haste out of the room where they were, as if some other business called him away.

Ver. 31. Set on bread.] Set the dinner upon the table.

Ver. 32. And they set on for him by himself, &c.] There seems to have been three tables. One where he sat alone in state, another where his brethren sat, and a third where the great men of Egypt were entertained.

Because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, &c.] Because the Hebrews (saith Jonathan) did eat those beasts which the Egyptians worshipped. And to the same purpose writes Onkelus. In which regard the Egyptians were as scrupulous to eat with a Greek in aftertimes, as now with a Hebrew. So Bochart observes out of Athenaeus, lib. viii. Deipnos, where Annastridues, a comedian, jeers the Egyptians for worshipping an eel, as a great god, whom we, saith he, think to be most excellent meat. And out of Herodotus, who, in his Euterpe (cap. 41), saith, no Egyptian man or woman would kiss the mouth of a Greek; nor make use of a knife, a spit, or a pot, belonging to them; nor take a bit of beef cut with a Greek's knife (see Bochart's Hierozoic, par. vi. lib. ii. cap. 53. And Dr. Spencer, de Rit. Heb. p. 125). But though it appear by such passages, that, in the time of Herodotus and other forenamed writers, several animals were held so sacred among the Egyptians that they would not eat them, yet it may well be questioned, whether it were so in the days of Joseph.

For there is not the least sign of it in this story; much less of their worshipping such creatures: the worship of the famous ox, called Apis, being a much later invention, as many learned men have demonstrated: and some of them having given probable reasons that Joseph himself was the person at first represented by that figure under the name of Ab, i. e. Father of his country (see Ger. Vossius, lib. i. de Idol. cap. 29).

Therefore it is most likely, that this abhorrence is to be resolved only into the very different manners of the Hebrews from the Egyptians: particularly at their meals, in the way of dressing their meat, or in their eating. For we know some of the Jews themselves afterwards scrupled to eat with those who had unclean hands; and several nations have avoided such familiarity with others, merely on the account of their different customs; of which the Egyptians were exceeding tenacious, as Herodotus himself informs us, particularly in their eating. For he concludes his discourse about their feasts with this observation (in his book before mentioned, cap. 29). 'Haraqon et poenae negator, ab eo, quod non comedunt, &c. Nor the use of their own country customs, they receive no other. And in the ninety-first chapter of the same book he saith, that as they would use no Greek customs, so (to speak all in a word) μηδε διαυτα μηδειμα, &c. "Neither would they use the customs of any other men in the world whatsoever." Nay, one part of Egypt differed extremely from another: for in the Theban province they abstained from sheep, and sacrificed goats; but, in the Mendesian, quite contrary, they abstained from goats, and sacrificed sheep: as he tells us in his Euterpe (cap. 42). And the wisest of them were so nicely superstitious, that some of them thought it unclean to eat the head of a way not living creature; others the shoulder-blade; others of some like part. So Sextus Empiricus tells us (lib. iii. Pyrrh. Hypot. cap. 21). "Αιγυπτιοι δι' των σωφρων εμοι τομε- μενων, α μεν μεσημδων ζων φοροντες αμερος εννουμενοι, &c. Upon which score I do not know but such kind of people might be so whimsical as to refuse to eat with one another.

Ver. 33. They sat before him.] For that was the custom before the way of lying upon beds was invented (see xxvii. 19, xxxvii. 25).

The men marvelled one at another.] That they should be so exactly disposed, according to the order of their birth: and so kindly treated by one that had lately used them very roughly.

Ver. 34. They took and sent messes, &c.] Ordered those that waited to take and carry messes from his own table unto theirs. For such was the ancient custom, for great men to honour such as were in their favour, by sending dishes to them, which were first served up to themselves: from whence they were called missa, messes, things sent. The ancient way of eating also is to be observed, which was not like ours: as appears by Plutarch in his Symsops. lib. ii. Q. ult., where he disputes, which was the better custom, to eat out of one common dish, or every one to have a dish to himself, as the manner was in old time; when, all the meat being set on the table, the master of the feast distributed to every one his portion.

Benjamin's mess was five loaves of bread (see much.) He had five dishes to their one: which was intended as a peculiar respect to him. Or, as others understand it, there was five times as much meat in his mess, as in one of theirs. Which might well be part of the cause of their wonder (ver. 35).

They drank.] After they had dined, plenty of wine was brought in, for every one to drink as much as he pleased. For such is the custom of the Abyssines at this day, not to drink or talk at dinner, but after the meat is taken away; as Ludolphus assures us from Telezus; who takes it to have been the ancient custom among other nations, particularly the Romans; for which he alleges those verses of Virgil, Æneid. i.

"Postquam prima quæs quis epulis, mensaque remotae, Craterus magnus attintat, et vina coram." I mention wine here in Egypt: for though Herodotus saith in his days they had no vines, but used drink made of barley, i. e. such as ours (lib. ii. cap. 77), yet in the time of Joseph it seems to have been otherwise. For it is not likely the chief butler would have dreamed of a mess of grapes, and pressing them into Pharaoh's cup (xl. 9, 10, 11), if he had never seen them in Egypt.

They were merry with him.] So we well translate the last words of this chapter; which signify their drinking plentifully; more liberally than at home: not till they were drunk (as R. Solomon saith some 34 And he took and sent messes unto them from before him: but Benjamin’s mess was used to abuse this place, to countenance that vice), but till they were very cheerful. For they could not be so senseless, as, before so great a man in a strange place, where they were also full of fear, to make themselves drunk.

CHAPTER XLIV.

1 Joseph’s policy to stay his brethren. 14 Judah’s humble supplication to Joseph.

1 And he commanded the steward of his house, saying, Fill the men’s sacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put every man’s money in his sack’s mouth.
2 And put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack’s mouth of the youngest, and his corn money. And he did according to the word that Joseph had spoken.
3 As soon as the morning was light, the men were sent away, they and their asses.
4 And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joseph said unto his steward, Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them, Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good?
5 Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he doth divineth? ye have done evil in so doing.

CHAP. XLIV.

Ver. 1. Fill the men’s sacks with food, as much as they can carry: that seems to be an order to load them more liberally than at their first coming (xlii. 23).
Ver. 2. Put my cup, &c.] The Hebrew word ga’bîah signifies an embossed cup (as we now speak), or a bowl; or goblet with a great belly: which St. Jerome translates scyphus. This he ordered his steward to put in Benjamin’s sack, that he might make a trial of his brethren’s concern for him, and affection both to him and to their father: and whether they would discover any envy to Benjamin, because of his extraordinary kindness to him.
Ver. 3. The men were sent away.] Had a pass, we may suppose, from Joseph; to carry so much corn out of the country, as their asses were loaded withal.
Ver. 4. Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good?] Being entertained so kindly at my master’s table, why have ye stolen his cup?
Ver. 5. Is not this it in which my lord drinketh?] Did you not think this would be presently inquired after?
Whereby indeed he divineth?] The Hebrew word nachash, which we translate divine, it is very likely was anciently of an indifferent signification. And therefore Grotius thinks that Joseph meant by this speech, that he used this cup in his drink-offerings; when he sacrificed to prepare himself to receive Divine presages. But, I think, we had better say, there was a kind of divination by cups (though we know not what it was), as we are certain there was by many other things among the Greeks (who borrowed much of their religion from the Egyptians), than give this or other such-like interpretation of these words: particularly, their observing the sparkling of the wine in their libations. For it seems plain to me, that Joseph speaks of the cup he used at his own table; and it is not probable that he used the same in sacrifices to God. Such vessels as were used in Divine service

6 ¶ And he overtook them, and he spake unto them these same words.

7 And they said unto him, Wherefore saith my lord these words? God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing:
8 Behold, the money, which we found in our sacks’ mouths, we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan: how then should we steal out of thy lord’s house silver or gold?
9 With this moreover of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord’s bondmen.
10 And he said, Now also let it be according unto your words: he with whom it is found shall be my servant; and ye shall be blameless.
11 Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, and opened every man his sack.

were not used in their own: being held sacred; and therefore separated from common use; and kept so safe, no doubt, that it was not easy to steal them.

Ye have done evil?] You have rendered yourselves very criminal by this fact. Or, you have done very foolishly in stealing a thing of this nature; which being in continual use, would be soon missed.

Ver. 7.] They disclaim the charge, with the greatest vehemence.

Ver. 8.] And bring a very good proof of their honesty.

Ver. 9.] Sometimes innocence makes men too confident; and less cautious than, in prudence, they ought to be. For their money having been put into their sacks, they knew not how, it was reasonable to have suspected this also might prove true.

Ver. 10. Now also let it be according unto your words, &c.] I desire not so much; but only that he with whom the cup is found be my bondman, as you proposed.

My servant:] He speaks in the name and place of
And he searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest: and the cup was found in Benjamin’s sack.

Then they rent their clothes, and laded every man his ass, and returned to the city.

And Judah and his brethren came to Joseph’s house; for he was yet there: and they fell before him on the ground.

And Joseph said unto them, What shall we do? wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?

And Judah said, What shall we say unto my lord? what shall we speak? or how shall we clear ourselves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants: behold, we are my lord’s servants, both we, and he also with whom the cup is found.

And he said, God forbid that I should do so: but the man in whose hand the cup is found, he shall be my servant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

Then Judah came near unto him, and said, Oh my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord’s ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh.

My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother?

And we said unto our lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him.

12 And he searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest: and the cup was found in Benjamin’s sack.

13 Then they rent their clothes, and laded every man his ass, and returned to the city.

14 And Judah and his brethren came to Joseph’s house; for he was yet there: and they fell before him on the ground.

15 And Joseph said unto them, What deed is this that ye have done? wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?

16 And Judah said, What shall we say unto my lord? what shall we speak? or how shall we clear ourselves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants: behold, we are my lord’s servants, both we, and he also with whom the cup is found.

17 And he said, God forbid that I should do so: but the man in whose hand the cup is found, he shall be my servant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

18 ¶ Then Judah came near unto him, and said, Oh my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord’s ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh.

19 My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother?

20 And we said unto our lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him.

Ver. 11.] They were desirous to have their innocence cleared, without delay.

Ver. 13. • Rent their clothes.] As the manner was, when any sad thing befell them (xxxvi. 29, 34).

Ver. 14. Judah and his brethren came, &c.] He is mentioned by name, though not the eldest son; because he was chiefly concerned for Benjamin (xliii. 9); and, as the Jews fancy, stood to him in this distress, when the rest would have delivered him up as a bondman: resolving either to set him free, or to be a bondman with him.

For he was yet there.] Not gone from home, since he gave order to his steward to pursue them.

They fell before him on the ground.] The dream of Joseph was again fulfilled (see xlii. 6).

Ver. 15. Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?] Could not I who foretold this grievous famine discover such a theft as this, which you have committed?

Ver. 16. Judah said,] He standing bound, as I said (ver. 14), for Benjamin to his father, took upon him to plead his cause; which Benjamin, being young, could not do so well himself. And indeed Judah seems to have been a man of the best sense, courage, and eloquence, among them.

What shall we say to my lord? what shall we speak? or how, &c.] A most pithetical beginning, and very apt to move compassion!

God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants, &c.] Having made some pause, after those words, How shall we clear ourselves? he proceeds to an ingenious acknowledgment, that he and his brethren had been guilty of many sins; for which God had now brought them hither to suffer the punishment of them. Yet he neither confesses this particular guilt, nor denies it, nor excuses it: but, acknowledging God’s justice, cast himself and his brethren upon Joseph’s mercy.

Ver. 18. Then Judah came near unto him.] The equity which appeared in Joseph (expressed in the words foregoing) emboldened Judah to approach nearer to him. For he seems to have spoken the former words as soon as he entered the room: when he and his brethren cast themselves down on the ground (ver. 14).

Speak a word in my lord’s ears,] Have a favourable audience for a few words more. For he doth not mean to speak to him privately: and by a word he means all the following speech, which he makes as short as it was possible.

Let not thine anger burn against thy servant.] And be pleased to hear me out, with patience.

For thou art even as Pharaoh.] I know before whom I speak: and therefore will not impertinently trouble thee; but barely lay the state of our case before thee.

Ver. 20. A little one.] So Benjamin was, in comparison with themselves.

He alone is left of his mother, &c.] We do not read, that they had said this to Joseph before; but only that the youngest was with their father (xliii. 13, 32). But no doubt, Judah remembers him now of nothing, but what had been then delivered; but related more briefly than it is here.

Ver. 27. My wife bare me two sons.] He called Rachel his wife, as if he had no other, because she was the only person he designed to marry, and was by consequence his principal wife.
CHAPTER XLV.

1 Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all them that stood by him; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from me. And there stood no man with him, while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren.

2 And he wept aloud: and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard.

3 And Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; doth my father yet live? And his brethren could not answer him: for they were troubled at his presence.

4 And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And they came near. And he said, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt.

5 Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life.

6 For these two years hath the famine been in the land: and yet there are five years, in the which there shall neither be earing nor harvest.

7 And God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance.

1 Joseph made himself known to his brethren. 5 He comforteth them in God's providence. 9 He sendeth for his father. 16 Pharaoh confirmeth it. 21 Joseph furnisheth them for their journey, and exhorteth them to concord. 25 Jacob is retrieved with the news.

CHAP. XLV.

Ver. 1. Could not refrain himself] Tears began to run down his cheeks; or, were ready to burst out with such violence that he could not hinder them. Cause every man to go out] He would not have the Egyptians to be witnesses of his brethren's guilt; nor did it become his dignity to be seen by them in such a passion; and therefore he commanded those that attended him to leave him alone with his brethren.

Ver. 2. He wept aloud.] Which we express very properly in our language, he cried. For tears having been long suppressed, are wont, when they break out, to be accompanied with some noise.

The Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard.] They whom he sent forth, being in the next rooms, heard him cry, and reported what a passion he was in to the whole court.

Ver. 3. I am Joseph.] This word made them start; as appears by the next verse.

Doth my father yet live?] May I believe what you have told me? (xlii. 28.) He saith not this because he doubted of it: but to express his joy at that good news. His brethren could not answer him.] Being astonished, as it follows, at his presence. For they could not but reflect upon their cruel usage of him: and now saw him in full power to punish them.

Ver. 4. Come near to me.] This, I think, signifies, that they had started back, as men affrighted: and therefore he invites them kindly to approach him. I am Joseph your brother.] This word brother, added to what he said before (ver. 3), was a comfort to them. For it showed that his greatness did not make him forget his relation. Whom ye sold into Egypt.] Nor their unkindness alienated his affection from them.

Ver. 5. Now therefore be not grieved, &c.] Do not afflict yourselves too much for your sin, because God hath turned it into good. God did send me before you, &c. When you thought only to be rid of me, God intended another thing, 8 So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God: and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt.

9 Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say unto him, Thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt; come down unto me, tarry not:

10 And thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me, thou, and thy children, and thy children's children, and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all that thou hast:

11 And there will I nourish thee; for yet there are five years of famine; lest thou, and thy household, and all that thou hast, come to poverty.

12 And, behold, your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you.

13 And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that ye have seen; and ye shall haste and bring down my father hither.

14 And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck, and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck.

15 Moreover he kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them; and after that his brethren talked with him.

16 ¶ And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's house, saying, Joseph's brethren are come: and it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants;

17 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Say unto thy brethren, This do ye; lade your beasts, and go, get you unto the land of Canaan;

18 And take your father and your households, and come unto me: and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land.

19 Now thou art commanded, this do ye; take you wagons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come.

20 Also regard not your stuff; for the good of all the land of Egypt is your's.

21 And the children of Israel did so: and Joseph which is now come to pass. For he hath made me an instrument of preserving all your lives. Almost happy event of a most wicked deed!

Ver. 6. Neither be earing nor harvest. Or, no ploughing, sowing, or harvest. For to what purpose should they sow, when they knew, (if they believed Joseph,) that nothing would come of it?

Ver. 7. God sent me before you, &c.] He repeats what he had said (ver. 3), concerning the hand of God in this business; that, by fixing their thoughts upon his providence, they might be less oppressed with the weight of their own guilt.

To save your lives by a great deliverance. In a wonderful manner.

Ver. 8. It was not you,—but God, &c.] He mentions this a third time, that they might see he did not think so much on their unkindness, as on God's great goodness; and therefore be confident, he would not remember what they had done to him; but what God had done for them all.

Hath made me a father to Pharaoh.] Given me the authority of a father with him; so that he honours me, and doth nothing without my advice and counsel. And this he does with a reason, for his wisdom was so great and experienced, Ut non ab homine sed Dea responsa daria viderentur (as Trogus, an ancient historian among the heathen, observes), "that his answers seemed not to be given by a man, but by God." Which made him regi percharum, "very dear to the king," as the same author relates, who tells also the story of his being sold by his brethren, who envied his excellent wit (see Justin, lib. xxxvi. cap. 9). Lord! The principal person in his court.

A ruler.] Chief governor of the whole country, in which were several provinces, which had distinct governors, who were all under the government of Joseph.

Ver. 10. Land of Goshen.] This was that part of the lower Egypt which lay next to Africa and Palestine, abounding with fair pastures, being watered by many streams from the Nile. Certain it is, it lay next to Canaan; for Jacob went directly thither when he came into Egypt, and stayed there till Joseph came to him (xli. 25).

Thou shalt be near unto me.] Therefore the royal city, where Joseph resided, that he might be always near to Pharaoh, was at this time in the lowest Egypt, at Zoan (Ps. lxviii. 43), which other authors call Tanis; which was situated not far from that mouth of the Nile which Plutarch calls rursum orium. For that part of Egypt is called the higher Nile, because Nile runs only in one stream; that the lower where it divides into many; and from its triangular form is called by the Greeks Διπλα. In the eastern part of which, or very near it, towards the Red Sea, was this country, called the land of Goshen.

This argues the great authority of Joseph, that he makes such promises as these, before he had asked the consent of Pharaoh.

Ver. 12. Behold, your eyes see, &c.] You cannot but be convinced, by the lineaments you see in my face, and by the language which I speak, and by all the things which I have related concerning the state of our family, that indeed it is your brother Joseph who speaks to you. Or, more simply, you have it not by hearsay, which might deceive you; but are eye-witnesses that I am alive, and say these things to you.

Ver. 13. Tell my father of all my glory.] Of the great honour which is done me in Egypt.

Ver. 15. After their fright was over, and he had so affectionately embraced them, they conversed freely and familiarly with him; acknowledging, it is likely, their error, and repenting for it; and overlooking what had passed in their family since they committed it.

Ver. 16. All the court rang (as we speak) with the news of Joseph's brethren being come; and that they were to fetch their father and settle in Egypt. For Joseph (it appears by the next verse) went and acquainted Pharaoh with his desire.

It pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants.] No wonder that Pharaoh, who had raised Joseph so high, was pleased to be kind to his father and family; and the court follows the pleasure of the king.

Ver. 17. Pharaoh said unto Joseph, &c.] This no doubt was the answer Pharaoh made to Joseph's petition wherein he grants him not only what he asked, but all concerning it.

It pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants.] That Pharaoh, who had raised Joseph so high, was pleased to be kind to his father and family; and the court follows the pleasure of the king.

Ver. 19. Now thou art commanded.] Now that thou hast my warrant for it, go about it presently.

Ver. 20. Regard not your stuff.] If there be not wagons enough to bring all your stuff, do not matter it; you shall have better here. But the Vulgar seems to take it in a quite contrary sense, as if he had said, Leave nothing behind you; but bring all you have with seph gave them wagons, according to the commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them provision for the way.

22 To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment; but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver, and five changes of raiment.

23 And to his father he sent after this manner; ten ass laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she ass laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way.

24 So he sent his brethren away, and they departed: and he said unto them, See that ye fall out by the way.

you, if you think good: though whatsoever the land of Egypt affords is all yours.

The good of all the land] You shall not want when you come hither, if it be to be had in Egypt.

Ver. 21. Gave them wagons.] And horses, no doubt, to draw them; with which Egypt abounded.

Ver. 22. To each man changes of raiment.] Two vestas, or robes, as St. Jerome translates it; otherwise there would not have been a change. These were part of the ancient riches, as much as money.

Ver. 23. After this manner.] The Hebrew word εικος signifies, according to that which he had given to Benjamin, i. e. money, and several changes of raiment: besides what follows, “ten ass laden with the good things of Egypt,” &c.

Bread and meat] i. e. All manner of provision.

Ver. 24. See that ye fall not out, &c.] About what you have formerly done to me, or any thing else that I have said to you. But when you reflect upon your selling me, adore the providence of God, which by that means brought about your happiness and mine.

CHAPTER XLVI.

1 Jacob is comforted by God at Beer-sheba: 5 Then he with his company goeth into Egypt. 8 The number of his family that went into Egypt. 28 Joseph meeteth Jacob. 31 He instructeth his brethren how to answer to Pharaoh.

1 And Israel took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices unto the God of his father Isaac.

2 And God spake unto Israel in the visions of the night, and said, Jacob, Jacob. And he said, Here am I.

3 And he said, I am God, the God of thy father; fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation:

4 I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes.

his attention; and he calls him Jacob rather than Israel (as he is called in the beginning of the verse), to remember him what he was originally, and that by his favour he was made Israel.

Ver. 3. Fear not to go down into Egypt.] He was afraid, perhaps, that if Joseph should die, his family might be made slaves; for which he had some reason, from what was said to Abraham, in a like vision (xx. 13).

I will there make of thee a great nation.] He reneweth the promise, which at the same time was made to Abraham, that his seed should be as numerous as the stars of heaven (xx. 5).

Ver. 4. I will go down with thee, &c.] Take care of thee in thy journey, that no evil shall befall thee; and preserve thee and thy family there.

Bring thee up again.] i. e. His posterity, who should multiply there: for the Scripture speaks of parents and children as one person.
CHAPTER XLVI.

5 And Jacob rose up from Beer-sheba: and the sons of Israel carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the wagons which Pharaoh had sent to carry him.

6 And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt, Jacob, and all his seed with him:

7 His sons, and his sons' sons with him, his daughters, and his sons' daughters, and all his seed brought he with him into Egypt.

8 ¶ And these are the names of the children of Israel, which came into Egypt, Jacob and his sons: Reuben, Jacob's firstborn.

9 And the sons of Reuben; Hanoch, and Phallu, and Hezron, and Carmi.

10 ¶ And the sons of Simeon; Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar, and Shaul the son of a Canaanitish woman.

11 ¶ And the sons of Levi; Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.

12 ¶ And the sons of Judah; Er, and Onan, and Shedah, and Pharez, and Zarah: but Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. And the sons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul.

Put his hands upon thine eyes.] Be with thee when thou leav'st this world; and take care of thy funeral, when thou art dead. For this was the first thing that was done, when one expired, to close his eyes; which was performed by some among the Egyptians (as many authors inform us) by the nearest relations, or dearest friends (see Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synod. cap. 7. n. 12; and Menochius de Repub. Heb. lib. viii. cap. 4. qu. xi.).

In short, by these words God assures him that Joseph should not die while he lived (as Mr. Selden observes out of Baal-haturim, in his additions to the forenamed chapter, p. 737), and that he should die in peace, having his children about him.

Ver. 7. His daughters.] He had but one daughter, and therefore the plural number is used for the singular (as ver. 23, sons is put for son) or, else he includes his granddaughter, who in Scripture language is called the daughter of her grandfather. But the first sense seems to be that of what is said ver. 13, he considered. Where the whole number of his descendants from Leah being summed up, Dinah (under the name of daughters) must be taken in, to make up three-and-thirty; reckoning Jacob himself also for one of them.

Ver. 9. Hanoch.] From whom came the family of the Hanochites, as we read Numb. xxvi. 5. Phallu.] From whom, in like manner, sprung the family of the Phalluites, as Moses there notes; and says the same of the rest of Reuben's sons, that they were the fathers of families, when they came into Egypt.

Ver. 10. Jemuel.] This son of Simeon is called Nemuil in Numb. xxvi. 12, and 1 Chron. iv. 24, where he is both among the sons of Simeon, when Moses was sent to bring them out of Egypt (Exod. vi. 15). But either he had no posterity, or they were extinct: for shortly after there is no mention of him, in Numb. xxvi. 12. Nor is he to be found among his sons in 1 Chron. iv. 24.

Jachin.] Is called Jarib in 1 Chron. iv. 24, and is thought by some to have been the grandfather of Zimri, whom Phinehas slew in his combination with the Midianitish woman.

Ver. 12. Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan.]

Vol. 1. — 29

13 ¶ And the sons of Issachar; Tola, and Phuvah, and Job, and Shimron.

14 ¶ And the sons of Zebulun; Sered, and Elon, and Jahleel.

15 These be the sons of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob in Padan-aram, with his daughter Dinah: all the souls of his sons and his daughters were thirty and three.

16 ¶ And the sons of Gad; Ziphion, and Haggi, Shuni, and Ezbon, Eri, and Arodi, and Archi.

17 ¶ And the sons of Asher; Jemini, and Ishuah, and Isuah, and Beriah, and Serah their sister: and the sons of Beriah; Heber, and Malchiel.

18 These are the sons of Zilpah, whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter, and these she bare unto Jacob, even sixteen souls.

19 The sons of Rachel Jacob's wife; Joseph, and Benjamin.

20 ¶ And unto Joseph in the land of Egypt were born Manasseh and Ephraim, which Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On bare unto him.

21 ¶ And the sons of Benjamin of Belah, And therefore are not to be numbered among them that went down into Egypt; but, instead of them, the two sons of Pharez are set down, though, perhaps, not now born; to supply the place of Er and Onan.

The sons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul.] When Jacob went down into Egypt, Pharez was so young, that one can scarce think he had two sons at that time; but they were born soon after, before Jacob died. And St. Austin seems to have truly judged, that Jacob's descent into Egypt comprehends all the seventeen years which he lived after it. Or, we may conceive it possible, that their mother was with child of them when Jacob went down into Egypt. For then Pharez is thought to have been fourteen years old; at which age it is so far from being incredible that he might have two sons, that, in these later ages, some have begotten a child when they were younger. Jul. Scaliger, a man of unquestionable credit, assures us that in his memory there was a boy, not quite twelve years old, who had a daughter by a cousin of his, who was not quite ten. Rem nonam maro, et curus memoria adhuc recens est in Aquitania. "This was a known thing, the memory of which was then fresh in Aquitania."

Ver. 13. The sons of Issachar; Tola.] Some have wondered that he should give his eldest son a name that signifies a worm. Perhaps it was (as Bochart conjectures) because he was a poor shrivelled child when he was born, not likely to live. And yet it pleased God, that he became a great man, from whom sprung a numerous offspring (Numb. xxvi. 23), and so fruitful, that in the days of David, there were numbered above two-and-twenty thousand of them (1 Chron. vi. 2), who were men of might and valour.

Ver. 15. Which she bare unto Jacob in Padan-aram.] She bare the fathers of them there; but the children were born in Canaan.

All the souls, &c.] See ver. 7.

Ver. 19. Rachel, Jacob's wife.] She was his only choice, as was noted before, on xliv. 27.

Ver. 21. The sons of Benjamin.] He being now but about twenty-four years old, we cannot well think he had all these sons when he went down into Egypt: but some of them were born afterward, be-of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten.

28 ¶ And he sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen; and they came into the land of Goshen.

29 And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while.

30 And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive.

31 And Joseph said unto his brethren, and unto his father's house, I will go up, and shew Pharaoh, and say unto him, My brethren, and my father's house, which were in the land of Canaan, are come unto me:

fore Jacob died, as was said before (ver. 13). Yet they are all here mentioned, because they were most of them now born, and all became the heads of families in their tribe. It is possible he might begin so early as to have made all these before they went into Egypt (see ver. 19).

Ver. 26. Came out of his loins.] In the Hebrew, out of his thigh. A modest expression: the parts serving for the propagation of mankind being placed between the thighs.

All the souls were threescore and six:] i. e. Leaving out Joseph and his two sons (who did not come with Jacob into Egypt, but were there already) and Jacob himself (who could not be said to come out of his own loins), they made just this number.

Ver. 27. All the souls—which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten.] There is a remarkable difference between this verse and the foregoing. There (ver. 26), they only are numbered who came with Jacob into Egypt: which were no more than threescore and six. But here are numbered all that came into Egypt (viz. first and last), which plainly comprehend Jacob, Joseph, and his two sons; and make up threescore and ten.

Ver. 28. He sent Judah before him.] Who seems by the whole story to have been the most eminent among Jacob's children before Joseph was gone; as was named before (xlv. 14).

To direct his face, &c.] To give Joseph notice of his coming; and to receive directions from him, in what part of Goshen he should expect him.

They came into the land of Goshen.] Into that part of it which Joseph had appointed.

Ver. 29. Presented himself unto him;] With such reverence as a son owes to his father, who embraced him most tenderly. For some refer the next words to Jacob, he fell on his neck, &c.; which expresses the highest affection.

Wipt on his neck a good while.] We read before how Joseph fell upon Benjamin's neck, and wept; which was answered by the like endearments on Benjamin's part (xlv. 1). But the Shew, who has where Joseph embraced Jacob (as Maimonides understands it), or (as R. Solomon Jarchi) Joseph embraced his father, far surpassed that. For they continued longer enfolded in one another's arms; where tears of joy flowed so fast, that for a good while they could not speak.

Ver. 30. Israel said unto Joseph.] Some make this an argument that it was Joseph, who, lighting out of his chariot, threw himself into his father's arms and wept, &c., which made Moses now more distinctly mention who said the following words.

Now let me die, &c.] These words signify that he now enjoyed the utmost happiness he could desire on earth; which therefore he was willing to leave, because nothing could he added to it. These were the first thoughts which his passion suggested to him; though to Joseph it was, And when Joseph had communed with his brethren, and informed them of his father's last words, &c., his conversation, was far more than barely to see his face.

Ver. 32. The men are shepherds, &c.] He seems to have been afraid, lest Pharaoh should have preferred his brethren, and made them courtiers, or commanders in the army, &c., which might have procured them the envy of the Egyptians: and, besides, have separated them one from another. Wherefore, by explaining themselves shepherds, and traders in cattle, they kept all together in a body, separate from the Egyptians. Which two reasons are suggested by Josephus.

Ver. 33. What is your occupation?] Your way of living: for men did not live idly in those days.

Ver. 34.] He tells them to justify what he told them he would inform Pharaoh.

That ye may dwell in the land of Goshen:] A rich country, abounding with pastureage, and also next adjoining to Canaan (as was noted before, xlv. 10), unto which, when the time came, they might the more easily return.

For every shepherd] Not universally, without limitation, but every foreign shepherd. For a considerable part of the Egyptians were shepherds. And therefore, Siculo tells us (lib. i. § 2, p. 17, edit. Steph.), where he saith, the country being divided into three parts, the priests had one, their king a second, and the soldiers a third: and there were three other ranks of men under these, viz. shepherds, husbandmen, and artificers. The husbandmen, he saith, served their king, and priests, and military men, in tilling their ground, for small wages, and spent all their time in it. And the like account, he saith, is given of their shepherds, who, from their forefathers, followed that way of living. Which makes it plain they could not abominate those who were so serviceable to them: though they might condemn them as mean people, who never rose to any higher employment. But we need not go to him for the proof of this: it being apparent from this very book, that the Egyptians had sheep and oxen, as well as horses and asses, which they sold to Joseph for corn in the time of famine (xlvii. 17), and that Pharaoh spake to Joseph to make such of his brethren as were men of skill, rulers over his flocks (xlvii. 6), which is a demonstration they bred cattel as well as other nations. And therefore, if we will understand this to be true of all shepherds, without exception, then, by Egyptians (to whom shepherds are said to be an abomination), we must not understand all the people of the country of Egypt (shepherds being a part of them), but only the courtiers 32 And the men are shepherds, for their trade hath been to feed cattle; and they have brought their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have.

and great men, as in xlv. 2, the Egyptians are said to have Joseph weep, i.e. those that belonged to the court: who, it is likely, despised shepherds (as Ru- pertus Tuitionensis long ago expounded this passage); but that is far short of abominating them, which the Hebrew word imports. But after all this, I do not see how they could be contemptible, if it be true which the same Diodorus said, p. 86. That when they buried their dead, and made the funeral ceremonies, they then mentioned the parentage of the deceased;

†σαλαµαδινας ὀφυσας δυοσευς εν γενεις ενδει χους κατ' Ἀγγελον, “making account that all the people of Egypt were alike well-born.”

We must confine therefore this assertion to foreign shepherds; and it is not easy to give the reason why they were an abomination to the Egyptians, who were shepherds themselves. One for Jos. and Jonathan, with many great others, think that they would not converse (for that is meant by abomination) with the Hebrew shepherds; because they had no greater regard to those creatures which the Egyptians worshipped, than to breed them up to be eaten. But there is no good proof that they worshipped sheep or oxen in those days; and that which seems to be the case was by the Egyptians in the time of Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, that they sacrificed such creatures in their days, and also ate of the sacrifices when they had done (see Herodot. in Euterpe, cap. 40, 41). And therefore the reason given by others for this abhorrence is not solid; that the Egyptians did eat no flesh, and upon that score could not endure those that did. For the case in which Aben Ezra gives of this matter; who fancies they did not like the sight of these domingo, who abominated shepherds, because they drank milk; contrary to their manners, who tasted nothing that came from any living creature. But, as it cannot be proved that this superstition was so old as Jacob’s time: so the contrary is evident from this very book (xlii. 16), where Joseph bids his steward go home and shepherd the cattle; and he did not intend to entertain after the Hebrew, but after the Egyptian fashion; that he might not be known by them. And so Herodotus informs us, that in his days, though they abstained from some animals, yet they ate of others, both fish and birds (Euterpe, cap. 78). And Diodorus, giving an account after what manner the Egyptians were robbed, tells us how they did in their day, as we read of now, eating veal and geese, &c. (lib. i. p. 45, edit. Steph.). Jos. Scaliger therefore thinks this sort of men were abominable, because they had often raised rebellion in Egypt, and made a king of their own; who erected that which is called the pastoral kingdom. This is embraced by many great men, who have only the authority of Manetho for it; who says, these were Phenician shepherds (as Joseph Scaliger, lib. i. conjectures); whom who reigned in Egypt, burnt their cities, and threw down their temples; in short, omitted no sort of cruelty. Upon this account the famous Bochartus (lib. iv. Canaan, cap. 4) thinks it possible the Egyptians hated shepherds, who had done so much mischief; and, I may add, the Hebrew shepherds Joseph might think would be more abominable, because they came out of that very country, from whence those Phenician rovers made their invasion. But as it doth not appear that they who did the forenamed mischief, were all foreigners; so the time which is assigned for this pastoral kingdom doth not agree with the Scripture story. For it is said to have been in the one thousand one hundred and twelfth year before the Israelites going out of Egypt; in the fifteenth 33 And it shall come to pass, when Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What is your occupation?

34 That ye shall say, Thy servants’ trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we, and also our fathers: that ye the Egyptians, who were a more civilized people, habiting certain and known places, &c. Which shows that their manners were very different; which easily bred hatred. Which appears by what Plutarch saith (in his book de Isid, et Osir.) that the Egyptians avoided the conversation of black people; which was the complexion of the Ethiopians. And for some such reason, he saith, in the same book, they avoided all mariners (of other nations, that is), as here Moses says they did shepherds, upon some or other of the accounts before mentioned.

CHAPTER XLVII.

1 Joseph presenteth five of his brethren, 7 and his father, before Pharaoh. 11 He giveth them habitation and maintenance. 13 He geteth all the Egyptians’ money, 16 their cattle, 18 their lands to Pharaoh. 22 The priests’ land was not bought. 25 He leteth the land to them for a fitful part. 29 Jacob’s age. 33 He sweareth Joseph to bury him with his fathers.

1 Then Joseph came and told Pharaoh, and said, My father and my brethren, and their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have,
are come out of the land of Canaan; and, behold, they are in the land of Goshen. 2 And he took some of his brethren, even five men, and presented them unto Pharaoh. 3 And Pharaoh said unto his brethren, What is your occupation? And they said unto Pharaoh, Thy servants are shepherds, both we, and also our fathers. 4 They said moreover unto Pharaoh, For to may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

It looks like a piece of great generosity in Joseph, ot to conceal from Pharaoh the quality of his family:
though such kinds of men were under a very ill character. He hoped they would distinguish themselves from such vile shepherds as had made the name odious: and if they did not gain the love of the Egyptians, they would be the more secured in the love of God, by not learning their evil manners and superstitions: from which they would be preserved by having no conversation with them.

CHAP. XLVII.

Ver. 1. Joseph came and told Pharaoh, &c.] He had his warrant some time ago, to send for his father and his family (xv. 17, &c.) But it was good manners to acquaint him they were come; and to know his pleasure, how he should dispose of them.

Behold, they are in the land of Goshen.] They stop there (which was the entrance of Egypt) till they know their pleasure.

Ver. 2. He took some of his brethren, &c.] The Hebrew word mikhto (which we translate some) signifies in common language, de extremitate, from the fag-end, as we speak, of his brethren: which hath made some imagine, he presented the meanest of his brethren to Pharaoh; that he might neither be afraid of them, nor think of advancing them to employments in the court or camp. But this is a mere fancy; the word here denoting only, that he took from among all his brethren five of them: as Bochart observes, who translates it, ex omnibus fratribus suis; taking it to be like that phrase (xix. 4), where we translate it from all quarters (par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 31).

Ver. 3. Both we, and also our fathers.] It is not an employment we have lately taken up, but were bred to it by our ancestors; who followed the same profession. For this was the most ancient way of living, as Columella observes in his preface. In rusticatone antiquissima est ratio pascedendi, eademque quaedam suscisimissim.

In country business, the most ancient, as well as most gainful, is the way of feeding cattle.” From whence he thinks came the name of pecunita for money, and peculum, for riches, a pecoribus, from cattle; because the ancients had no other possessions, sojourn in the land are we come; for thy servants have no pasture for their flocks; for the famine is sore in the land of Canaan: now therefore, we pray thee, let thy servants dwell in the land of Goshen.

5 And Pharaoh spake unto Joseph, saying,
Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee:
6 The land of Egypt is before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell; in the land of Goshen let them dwell:
and if thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle.

Et adhuc apud quasdam gentes unum hoc reperitur divitiarum genus. “And to this day (saith he),
there is no other riches to be found among some nations.” Which is still true of the Abyssines, especially of the Bekleness, as Ludolphus assures us (lib. i.
Hist. Ethip. cap. 10, § 5, and Comment in Histor.
lib. iv. cap. 4, n. 13).

Ver. 4. To sojourn] We do not desire to settle, but only to sojourn here, during the famine.

For the famine is sore in the land of Canaan.] It was a high country, in comparison with Egypt; and the grass sooner burnt up there than in Goshen, which being a very low country, they found some pasture in it for their flocks, and therefore besought him to suffer them to dwell there. For, as St. Austin observes, from those that knew the country, there was more grass in the marshes and fenny parts of Egypt, when the Nile did not overflow enough to make plenty of corn (Quest. cl. in Gen.).

Ver. 6. The land of Egypt is before thee.] It is all in thy power: dispose of them as thou pleasest.

Any men of activity.] Vigorous and industrious;
and that understand their business.

Make them rulers over my cattle.] Such as Doeg was to Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 7), and those great officers, mentioned i Chron. xxvii. 29, 30, 31, were to king David. For the eastern kings raised part of their revenue from cattle; and so did the Egyptian (it appears by this place) who had some prime officers, to oversee the lower sort of shepherds. This shows that all shepherds were not an abomination to the Egyptians, but only those of other neighbouring nations (the Arabians, Phenicians, and Ethiopians), who were either an ill sort of people, or forbidden by the
CHAPTER XLVII.

7 And Joseph brought in Jacob his father, and set him before Pharaoh: and Jacob blessed Pharaoh.

8 And Pharaoh said unto Jacob, How old art thou?

9 And Jacob said unto Pharaoh, The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years: few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage.

10 And Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh.

11 ¶ And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded.

12 And Joseph nourished his father, and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families.

13 ¶ And there was no bread in all the land; for the famine was very sore, so that the land of Egypt, and all the land of Canaan, was fainted by reason of the famine.

14 And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house.

15 And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph, and said, Give us bread: for why should we die in thy presence, for the money faileth.

16 And Joseph said, Give ye your cattle; and I will give you for your cattle, if money fail.

17 And they brought their cattle unto Joseph: and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for horses, and for the flocks, and for the cattle of the herds, and for the asses: and he fed them with bread for all their cattle for that year.

18 When that year was ended, they came unto him the second year, and said unto him, We will not hide it from our lord, how that our money is spent; my lord also hath our herds of cattle; there is not ought left in the sight of my lord, but our bodies, and our lands:

19 Wherefore shall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? buy we and our land for bread; and we and our land shall be servants unto Pharaoh: and give us seed, that we may live, and not die, that the land be not desolate.

20 And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them: so the land became Pharaoh's.

21 And as for the people, he removed them to cities from one end of the borders of Egypt even to the other end thereof.

law of Egypt (which abounded with cattle) to traffic with the same.

Ver. 7. Jacob blessed Pharaoh.] Gave him thanks for his favour; and prayed for his health and safety: for that is the blessing of an inferior to a superior. Thus Naaman prays Elisha, "Take a blessing of thy servant," i.e. an acknowledgment of my obligations to thee.

Ver. 9. Pilgrimage.] So good men are wont to call their life; though they never stir from their native soil: looking upon it as a passage, not a settlement. But Jacob had reason to call his life so more literally: having been tossed from place to place, ever since he went from his father's house in Mesopotamia, and returned from thence into Canaan: where he dwelt a while at Succoth; and then at Shechem; and after that removed to Bethel; and so to Hebron unto his father Isaac; from whence he was now come into Egypt.

Few and evil have the days, &c.] They had been few, in comparison with his forefathers; and evil, because full of labour and care, grief and sorrow, upon many occasions.

Ver. 10. Jacob blessed Pharaoh.] At meeting and at parting. Their salutations were usual (see ver. 7).

Ver. 11. In the land of Rameses.] In that part of Goshen which in the days of Moses was called Rameses; from the name of the city which the Hebrews built there for Pharaoh. Unless, perhaps, the city was called so from the country of Rameses, wherein it stood.

Ver. 12. Joseph nourished his father, &c.] Though there was some pasture in this country for their cattle, yet not food enough for themselves; which Joseph therefore took care to supply them with.

According to their families.] According as their children were more or fewer, so he proportioned their allowance.

Ver. 13. There was no bread in all the land; &c.] This was the third year of the famine (xliv. 6), in which all the corn, which men had stored up in their several families, was wholly exhausted.

Ver. 14. Joseph bought up all the money, &c.] As long as the Egyptians had any money left, they bought corn of Joseph, which supported them all the third, and, it is probable, the fourth and fifth years of the famine.

Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house.] Into the treasury; which he filled, and not his own coffers, as Philo observes.

Ver. 15. And when money failed] This, we may probably conceive, was in the sixth year of the famine, when they were forced to sell their cattle for food.

Ver. 18. They came—the second year,] i.e. the next year after the sale of their cattle; which was the last of the famine, as appears from the next verse.

Ver. 19. Wherefore shall we die—&c.] The land is said to die (as Bochart observes, in the beginning of his Hierozoicon), cum inculsus jacet et desolata, "when it lies untillled and desolate:" as he shows by examples out of some poets.

We and our land will be servants unto Pharaoh.] We that were free will become the king's bondmen: and our land, which was our own, we will hold of him.

Ver. 21. As for the people, he removed them to cities.] Remote from those wherein they had formerly dwelt. Under the word cities, are comprehended all the villages about them.

From one end of the borders of Egypt, &c.] Trans-22 Only the land of the priests bought he not; for the priests had a portion assigned them of Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them: wherefore they sold not their lands.

23 Then Joseph said unto the people, Behold, I have bought this land for Pharaoh: lo, here is seed for you, and ye shall sow the land.

24 And it shall come to pass in the increase, that ye shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts shall be your own, for seed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your households, and for food for your little ones.

25 And they said, Thou hast saved our lives: let us find grace in the sight of our lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants.

26 And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part; except the land of the priests only, which became not Pharaoh's.

27 And Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the country of Goshen; and they had possessions therein, and grew, and multiplied exceedingly.

28 And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years: so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years.

29 And the time drew nigh that Israel must die: and he called his son Joseph, and said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me: bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt:

30 But I will lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry me out of Egypt, and bury me in their

Ver. 23.] We owe our very lives to thee: and therefore let us but have thy favour, and we shall willingly submit to be thy servants. This is a high expression of their thankfulness, for such good terms as he offered them; which they readily accepted, with professions of their obligations to be Pharaoh's bondmen.

Ver. 26. Joseph made it a law.] By his advice this law was enacted; whereby the power of the Egyptian kings was mightily increased; for we read not of the like consent at any previous occasion. Thus the Scripture indeed relates that the people of Attica paid to Pisistratus the twentieth part of their corn; and Appianus Alexander, says, the old Romans paid the tenth of their corn, and the fifth of their fruit: but it was the peculiar prerogative of the Egyptian kings to have the fifth of all the increase of the field: which Joseph procured them by his admirable management.

Ver. 27. Israel dwelt in the land, &c.] Ver. 11. They had possessions therein.] They could have no land of their own (for all the country was become Pharaoh's), but the meaning is, they farmed (as we speak) land of the king, to whom they became tenants, and grew, and multiplied exceedingly. And consequently enlarged their habitation beyond the territory they first possessed, into other parts of Goshen. Which we must not fancy to have been a country now empty of people: for though, perhaps, about Rameses there might be some vacant ground, sufficient for Jacob's family, when they came first to plant there; yet, when they increased very much, no doubt they lived among the Egyptians, where they could find admission. This plainly appears from their going from thence (Exod. xii. 32, 33), where God commands them to sprinkle their doorsposts with the blood of the paschal lamb, to secure them from the destruction which was coming upon their neighbours, who wanted this mark of safety.

Ver. 29. If now I have found grace in thy sight.] This is a phrase used by a little more than a fifth, in a little different sense. For there it signifies the favour shown to another: but here is as much as, If thou love me.

Put—thy hand under my thigh.] i. e. Swear to me, as it is explained in ver. 31 (see xxiv. 2).

Deal kindly.] Show me true kindness, in promising and performing what I desire (see xxiv. 27, 40).

Ver. 30. I will lie with my fathers, &c.] So all men naturally desire to do: but he had a peculiar reason for it. Which was his belief that the country where their bodies lay, was his in reversion; and that God, in due time, would put his children into possession of it. For which time they could not but the more earnestly buri"ng-place. And he said, I will do as thou hast said.

31 And he said, Swear unto me. And he swore unto him. And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head.

signifies also to fall down upon the earth; and therefore might be here translated lie down. But the apostle, as I said, hath overruled all such conceits, if we suppose him to translate this passage, Heb. xi. 21.

Which to me indeed doth not seem evident. For the apostle is there speaking of another thing; not of what Jacob did now, when Joseph sware to him; but of what he did after these things (xlviii. 1), when he blessed Joseph his sons. Then the apostle says, “he worshiped upon the top of his staff.” Which is not the translation of Moses’s words in this place; but words of his own, whereby he explains the following story; and shows how strong his faith was, when his body was so weak that he was not able to bow himself and worship without the help of his staff. This clearly removes all the difficulty, which interpreters have done, about making the words of Moses here in this verse, to the apostle’s words in that.

But however this be, Jacob’s bowing here, I doubt not, signifies worshipping; as the Vulgar Latin takes it; where the word God is added (which is not in the Hebrew), and these words thus translated, Israel worshiped God, turning himself to the bed’s head.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

1 Joseph with his sons visiteth his sick father.  2 Jacob strengtheneth himself to bless them.  3 He repeateth the promise.  5 He taketh Ephraim and Manasseh as his own.  7 He taketh Joseph of his mother’s grave.  9 He blesseth Ephraim and Manasseh.  17 He preferreth the younger before the elder.  31 He propheseth their return to Canaan.

1 And it came to pass after these things, that one told Joseph, Behold, thy father is sick: and he took with him his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

2 And one told Jacob, and said, Behold, thy son Joseph cometh unto thee: and Israel strengtheneth himself, and sat upon the bed.

3 And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me.

CHAP. XLVIII.

Ver. 1. After these things.] Some time after, though not long (for Jacob was nigh his end, when he sent for Joseph to make him swear he would bury him with his fathers), he grew so weak, that he concluded he could not live long.

One told Joseph.] A messenger was sent from his father’s house, to acquaint Joseph with his weak condition. So the next verse teaches us to understand it.
He took with him.] Immediately he went to receive his blessing, and took with him his two sons, that he might bless them also.

Ver. 2.] Joseph sent a messenger before him, to let his father know he was coming to visit him.

Israel strengthened himself.] This message revived him; and made him stir up all his spirits to receive him cheerfully.

And sat upon the bed.] Leaning, it is likely, upon his staff, for the support of his feeble body (see xlvi. ult.).

Ver. 3.] Appeared unto me at Luz.] He appeared twice to him in this place. First, when he went to Padan-aram (xlviii. 13), upon which he gave this place the name of Bethel (ver. 19), and when he re-6 And thy issue, which thou begettest after them, shall be thine, and shall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance.

7 And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath: and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath; the same is Bethlehem.

8 And Israel beheld Joseph's sons, and said, Who are these?

9 And Joseph said unto his father, They are my sons, whom God hath given me in this place. And he said, Bring them, I pray thee, unto me, and I will bless them.

10 Now the eyes of Israel were dim for age, so that he could not see. And he brought them near unto him; and he kissed them, and embraced them.

11 And Israel said unto Joseph, I had not thought to see thy face: and, lo, God hath shewed me also thy seed.

12 And Joseph brought them out from between his knees, and he bowed himself with his face to the earth.

13 And Joseph took them both, Ephraim in his right hand toward Israel's left hand, and Manasseh in his left hand toward Israel's right hand, and brought them near unto him.

14 And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the firstborn.

15 ¶ And he blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, 16 The Angel which redeemed me from all his legs hanging down, they kneeled between his knees: from whence Joseph took them. And then seems to have placed himself in the same posture, "showing himself with his face to the earth" (as the following words seem to give his father thanks for his kindness to his children. Or, rather, we may conceive, that while Jacob embraced them in his arms, and kissed them with more than ordinary affectation, Joseph was afraid that they might lie too long, or press too hard, upon his father's breast, and create some trouble to a feeble old man: and therefore he withdrew them from thence, and dispossessed them to receive his blessing.

Ver. 13. Joseph took them both, &c. Made them kneel down by himself, before Jacob; placing Ephraim toward Jacob's left hand, &c.

Ver. 14. Stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head.] Laying hands on the head of any person, was always used in this nation in giving blessings, and designing men to any office; and in the consecration of public and solemn sacrifices. This is the first time we meet with the mention of it; but in aftertimes we often read of it; particularly when Moses constituted Joshua to be his successor, God orders him to do it by laying his hands on him (Numb. 27. 28. 29.); Deut. xxxiv. 9. When children were brought to our blessed Saviour, that he might lay his hands on them and bless them; and so he did (Matt. xix. 13, 15). And the right hand being the stronger, and that wherewith we commonly perform every thing, the laying on that Ephraim's head was giving him the pre-eminence.

Ver. 15. He blessed Joseph.] It is observed by Theodoret upon 1 Sam. xvi., that God was wont from the beginning to prefer the younger before the elder; as Abel before Cain; Shem before Japheth; Isaac before Ishmael; Jacob before Esau; Judah and Joseph before Reuben; and here Ephraim before Manasseh, as afterwards Moses before Aaron; and David, the youngest of all, before his elder brethren. Which was to show that the Divine blessing was not tied to the order of nature; but dispensed freely according to God's most wise goodness.

Guiding his hands wittingly.] He did not mistake by reason of his blindness; but foreseeing, by the spirit of his prophecy, how much Ephraim would excel the other, he designedly and on purpose thus laid his hands on the head of the eldest, and therefore placed the right hand upon the head of Ephraim, who was next to his left, &c.
17 And when Joseph saw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it displeased him: and he held up his father's hand, to remove it from Ephraim's head unto Manasseh's head.

18 And Joseph said unto his father, Not so, my father: for this is the firstborn; put thy right hand upon his head.

All my life long] The Hebrew word meho dét signifies à sed quod ego sumus (as Bochart interprets it, Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 14), "ever since I had a being." Ver. 16. The Angel which redeemed me] Who, by God's order, and as his minister, preserved me in all the dangers wherein I have been. Many of the ancient fathers (as Athanasius, lib. iv. contra Arianos, Cyril upon this place, Procopius Gazeus, &c.) understand hereby an uncreated angel, viz. the Second Person, as God and himself by me, and hence it is concerning the sending of the Son of God in our flesh to redeem mankind, but only concerning the preservation and prosperity of one man; and therefore I do not know whether it be safe to call him an angel, i.e. a minister or messenger, lest we detract from his Divinity. For in conferring blessings, he is not a messenger of one, but a principal agent and co-operate together with the Father. They are the words of that famous divine, Georg. Calixtus, who follows St. Chrysostom: who takes this angel to be one properly so called: and thence proves the heavenly ministers take care of pious people. And so doth St. Basil in no less than three places of his works: which show it was his settled opinion (but it did not enter into their thoughts that Jacob here prayed to an angel; but only wished these children might have the angelic protection, by the special favour of God to them. For it is just such an expression as that of David, to a contrary purpose (Psalm xxxv. 6), "Let the angel of the Lord persecute them," where nobody will say he prays to an angel; though his words are exactly like these of Jacob.

Let my name be named on them.] Here he plainly adopts them to be his children, as he said before he would (ver. 5). For to be called by one's name (which is the same with having his name named on them), is as much as to be one's children. For thus they are said to be called by God's name, became his peculiar people. Therefore Tostatus well interprets it, Sint duo capita tribuum inter filios Jacob: "Let them be the heads of two tribes among the sons of Jacob." But none so plainly as David Chytraeus, whose words are these, Vera et simplicissima sententia haec est; Isti pueri a me adoptati, &c. "The true and most simple sense is, These youths, Manasseh and Ephraim, were adopted by me, so that not only after they may be called the sons of Joseph, but my sons; and he beirs, and, in the division of the inheritance of the land of Canaan, receive an equal portion with my sons."

Grow into a multitude] The Hebrew word, as Onkelos interprets it, signifies increase like fishes (as we also in the margin translate it), which are the most fruitful of all creatures, as authors commonly observe (see Bochart, par. i. lib. i. cap. 6, Hierozoic). Ver. 19. His younger brother shall be greater than he.] His family multiplied faster, according to the signification of his name: as appears from Numb. i. 33, 35. And the kingdom was afterwards established in him: and all the ten tribes called by the name of Ephraim.

Shall become a multitude of nations.] In the Hebrew, the words are fulness of nations, i.e. of families. As much as to say, his seed shall replenish the country with numerous families: for that which replenishes the earth, is called "the fulness of the earth" (Psalm xxiv. 1), and that which replenishes the sea, "the fulness of the sea" (Psalm xcvii. 11; Isa. xlvii. 14). See xlvii. 14.

Ver. 20.] He concluded with a solemn benediction upon them both: and when he pronounced it, worshipped God (as the apostle tells us, Heb. xi. 21), leaping upon the top of his staff. Whereby he was supported from falling: of which he would have been in danger, when he bowed, if he had not leaned on it. In this short discourse, viz. his benediction, after his postyery would wish all happiness to others, they shall use this form of speech; God make you like Ephraim and Manasseh. Which continues, they say, among the Jews to this day.

Ver. 21.] Bring you again unto the land of your fathers.] Where your fathers sojourned: and which God bestowed upon them in reversion.

Ver. 22.] Which I took out of the hand of the Amorite, &c.] He doth not mean the city of Shechem; which his sons took unjustly and cruelly (and not from the Amorites, but the Hivites), without his knowledge, and contrary to his will: but that piece of land which he bought of Hamor the father of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 19, compared with St. John iv. 5). Which he was to be possessed of, which was really his, be buried in his own ground, given him by his father (Josh. xxiv. 32), and not in the cave of Machpelah. The only difficulty is, how he could say, that he took this land from the Amorite by his sword and by his bow (which comprehend all warlike instruments), when he bought it for a hundred pieces of silver of Hamor the Hivite. It is to be supposed therefore that he bought it, i.e. recovered it from the Amorites, who had seized on it, after his removal to another part of Canaan; and would not restore it, but constrained him to drive them out by force. We read nothing indeed in the foregoing history, either of their invading his possession, or his expelling them thence: but the Scripture relates many things to have been done, without mentioning the circumstances, the time and the persons who observes. And among other instances, gives that in xxxvi. 24, where Anah is said to have met with the Emims (so he understands it) in the wilderness: of which encounter we find no mention in any other place (see his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 15). And, as I take it, we have a plainer instance in the place a little before mentioned (Heb. xi. 31), where the apostle says, Jacob, when he was dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph, "and worshipped, leaping upon the top of his staff." Of which there is not a word in this history, but only of his blessing them (ver. 20). There are those who, with St. Jerome, understand,
CHAPTER XLIX.

1 Jacob calleth his sons to bless them. 3 Their blessing in particular. 29 He chargeth them about his burial.

And Jacob called unto his sons, and said, Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days. Gather yourselves together, and hear, ye sons of Jacob; and hearken unto Israel your father.

Ver. 1. Jacob called unto his sons.] When he had done speaking with Joseph, perceiving his end approaching, he sent one to call the rest of his sons to come to him. Gather yourselves together.] Come all in a body to me. Let me see you all together before I die. That which shall befall you in the last days.] The condition of your pesterly in future times. Jacob is the first that we read of, who particularly declared the future state of every one of his sons when he left the world. But it hath been an ancient opinion, that the souls of all excellent men, the nearer they approached to their departure from hence, the more divine they grew; and had a clearer prospect of things to come. Whence Xenophon (lib. viii.), makes his Cyrus say, when he was near his end, that "the souls of men, at the point of death, become prophetic." Which never was universally true; for prophecy is not a natural thing; nor were all excellent men partakers of it: and God communicated it in what measures he pleased to these who had anything of it; and to Jacob more than had been bestowed upon his great ancestors. For these last words of his may be called prophesies rather than benedictions: some of them containing no blessing in them; but all of them predictions.

Ver. 2. Gather yourselves together.] This is repeated to hasten them; as the two next words, hear and hearken, are used to excite their attention. It was the manner of good men among the Hebrews to call all their children before them, and give them good counsel, together with their blessing, when they drew near to their end: the words then spoken being likely to stick fast in their mind.

Ver. 3. Reuben, &c.] It is commonly observed, that the style wherein he speaks to his sons is much more lofty than that hitherto used in this book. Which hath made some fancy that Jacob did not deliver these very words; but Moses put the sense of what he said into such poetical expressions. But it seems more reasonable to me, to think that the spirit of prophecy now coming upon him, raised his style as well as his understanding: at it did Moses's also; who delivered his benedictions (in Deut. xxxiii.) in a strain more sublime than his other writings.

Ver. 4. Unstable as water.] The Hebrew word prophets signifying haste, and in the Chaldee, having the signification of leaping, the interpretation of St. Jerome seems most reasonable; which is, poured out like water, out of a vessel upon the ground. And then it denotes Reuben's falling from his dignity, and losing his pre-eminence as water suddenly disappears, when it is poured out on the earth, and sucked the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow.

seem harsh, it is not hard to give an account why he calls those Amorites, who before were called Hivites: for Amorites seems to have been the general name of all the seven nations of Canaan, they being the chief; just as all the people of the seven United Provinces are now commonly called Hollander, who are the most potient of all the rest.
5 Simeon and Levi are brethren; instruments of cruelty are in their habitations.

6 O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united: for in their anger they slew up into it. Many refer it, particularly Ca. Vitringa in his late Sacred Observations (lib. i. cap. 12), to his unbounded lust: but that is taken notice of in the latter part of this verse, and given as a reason of his being degraded. Others therefore translate the Hebrew word pachax by the Latin word proles, that is, brethren (some speak at this day), and then the meaning still is, Water is not more prone to flow, when it is poured out, than thou wert to lose thy dignity. So Georg. Calixtus.

Thou shalt not excel;] There is nothing great said to be done by this tribe in Scripture. And they were not so numerous (to which the Vulgar Latin refers this by means of anaphora) as the families and the tribes (to whom God gave part of Reuben's prerogative), when Moses by God's command took the sum of all the congregation (Numb. i. 21, 27).

Because thou wentest up to thy father's bed,] Committed incest with my wife (xxxv. 22).

Then defiled thou it; he went up to my couch.] Or rather, When thou defiledst my couch, it vanished, i.e. his excellency departed. For the word khaloth, which is here translated to go up, signifies often in Scripture, to vanish or perish. As in Ps. cii. 25; Isa. v. 24; which makes the easiest sense of this place, in this manner: Ex quo pollutior thorum meum, ascendit et vapor aut fumus excellentia et dignitas tua, i.e. di-ligamus et extinguitur, etc. Even thou defledst my couch, thy excellency and dignity went up like a vapour or smoke, i.e. it slid away, it was extinct, it vanished. They are the words of the forenamed Calixtus; who well observes that this is explained in 1 Chron. v. 1.

Ver. 5. Simeon and Levi are brethren.] So were all the rest; but the meaning is, they are alike in their disorderly lives: generally the tribe of Judah designs: for so the word brother sometimes signifies, a companion, or associate, that agrees in the same inclinations or undertakings with others. As Prov. xviii. 9.

Instruments of cruelty are in their habitations.] The word mechereth (which we translate habitations) is never found before in the Hebrew language from whence it may derive that signification. Therefore Lud. de Dien, from the Ethiopic language, translates it counsels: for so the word signifies in that tongue; and in an ill sense, conspirations, machinations, or mischievous devices. This Job Ludolphus approves of, and translates this sentence after this manner, Corne illa eorum nihil sunt nisi vis armis: Their counsels are nothing but force and arms (vid. Comment. in Histor. Ethiop. lib. i. cap. 15, n. 106).

Aben Ezra is not much different, who translates it, their compacts: as G. Vorstius notes upon Pirke Elezer, cap. 38, where there are other various interpretations, with which I shall not trouble the reader, because I have given that which I think most probable.

Ver. 6. O my soul, come not thou, &c.] He utterly disallows all knowledge of their wicked fact beforehand, or approbation of it afterward. For by soul is meant himself; and so the word honour or glory seems to mean, in the following words; which are but a repetition of this. Or, else it signifies the tongue, as its many places of Scripture (particularly Ps. xix. 12) and the meaning is, he never in thought, much less in word, asented to what they did. They gloried in a man, and in their self-will they digged down a wall.

7 Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel.

the slaughter they made; but God forbid that I should so much as approve it.

Secret signifying with the same assembly, is, in reason, to be interpreted a secret place, or closet; where cabals (as we now speak) are wont to be held.

Slew a man, i.e. Schechem; a great man: or, the singular number is put for the plural.

In their self-will: The Hebrew word rutan may well be translated humour. When they were in a fit of rage, They digged down a wall.] Broke into Hamor's house, where Shechem was. In the margin we translate it houghed oxen: and indeed the Hebrew word shor signifies a herd, or innumerable company, of many, as the Vulgar, the Syriac, Arabic, Chaldee, and a great number of the Hebrew authors, interpret it a wall. And though the LXX. translated it Ιηνεωτης της έκ τοπιος, & they undermined a wall. The truth is, we read of neither in the story, but only of their taking their sheep and their oxen (xxix. 29), which signifies not their houghing them, but their driving them away. Perhaps, they both broke down a wall to come at their flocks; and also houghed those, which they were afraid would otherwise have escaped their hands, and got away.

Ver. 7. (Cursed be their anger,) Their fury was most execerable and detestable: and brought a curse upon them.

For it was fierce.] Outrageous; or, as the Vulgar translates it, pertinaciously. Not a sudden, impetuous passion, that was soon over; but a settled, inlexible rage. So he condemns them upon a double account. First, that they had such an implacable desire of revenge; and then, that they were wavering (for let the Vulgar, the Syriac, Arabic, Chaldean, and a great number of the Hebrew authors, interpret it a wall. So many, and so near, and so near the congregation, Nebrum, schol. 'They undermined a wall.' The truth is, we read of neither in the story, but only of their taking their sheep and their oxen (xxix. 29), which signifies not their houghing them, but their driving them away. Perhaps, they both broke down a wall to come at their flocks; and also houghed those, which they were afraid would otherwise have escaped their hands, and got away.

Ver. 7. (Cursed be their anger,) Their fury was most execerable and detestable: and brought a curse upon them.

For it was fierce.] Outrageous; or, as the Vulgar translates it, pertinaciously. Not a sudden, impetuous passion, that was soon over; but a settled, inlexible rage. So he condemns them upon a double account. First, that they had such an implacable desire of revenge; and then, that they were wavering (for let the Vulgar, the Syriac, Arabic, Chaldean, and a great number of the Hebrew authors, interpret it a wall. For their fury was most execerable and detestable: and brought a curse upon them.)
did in falling upon the worshippers of the golden calf; and thereby concerating themselves unto the Lord (Exod. xxxii. 26, 29). Upon which account Moses blesses this tribe a little before he died (Deut. xxxiii. 9), whereas he gives no blessing at all to the tribe of Levi. It is lawful, however, under this auspice, to call this curse a grand ringleader of the idolatry with Baal-peor, being a prince of this tribe; whom Phinehas, of the tribe of Levi, slew in his zeal for the Lord (Numb. xxv. 11, 14).

Ver. 8. Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise: thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy son's children shall bow down before thee.

Ver. 9. Judah is a lion's whelp: from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he crouched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?

Ver. 10. The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, neither a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.

&c.] That the first word shebet is rightly translated sceptre, we have the unanimous testimony of the three Targums of the ancient book Rabbith, with a great many of the modern rabbins (such as Casskuni, Beehal, Abarbanel, &c.), who all think the word signifies a sceptre, and not a rod, or wand, as with whom some Christians follow; particularly Jac. Altingius hath lately asserted it in his Schilo; but, in my judgment, against the clearest evidence for the other signification. For, as shebet doth not originally signify a tribe, but a rod, or wand, shooting from the root of a tree (from whence it was translated to signify the sceptre,

Ver. 8.] He sets forth in this verse the warlike temper of this tribe; and their undaunted courage, and terribleness to their enemies. And he seems to express the beginning, increase, and full growth, of their power; by a young lion, a praise thee. The name of Judah signifies praise, unto which his father alludes. It was given him by his mother, in thankfulness to God for him (xxxix. 39), and now his father gives another reason of his name: because all his brethren should applaud his worthy acts, and praise God for them. Which is not spoken of Judah's person, but of his family, or tribe; who in future times were very famous.

Thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; to overthrow them, and bring them under: which was eminently fulfilled in David, as he himself acknowledges (Ps. xviii. 40). And so were the foregoing words: when all the daughters of Israel came forth of their cities singing his praise in such a high strain, as 1 Sam. xvi. 6, 7.

Bow down before thee.] Acknowledge thee their superior.

Ver. 9.] He sets forth in this verse the warlike temper of this tribe; and their undaunted courage, and terribleness to their enemies. And he seems to express the beginning, increase, and full growth, of their power; by a young lion, a praise thee. The name of Judah signifies praise, unto which his father alludes. It was given him by his mother, in thankfulness to God for him (xxxix. 39), and now his father gives another reason of his name: because all his brethren should applaud his worthy acts, and praise God for them. Which is not spoken of Judah's person, but of his family, or tribe; who in future times were very famous.

A lion's whelp:] This tribe gave early proof of their valour; being the first that went to fight against the Canaanites, after the death of Joshua (Judg. i. 1, 2). And David, who was of this tribe, when he was but a youth, killed a lion, and a bear, and the great gite Goliath (1 Sam. xviii. 2, 3). From the prey, my son, thou art gone up:] He speaks as if he saw them returning in triumph, with the spoils of their enemies: alluding unto lions, who, having gotten their prey in the plain, return satiated to the mountains. As Bochartus observes (Par. i. lib. iii. cap. 3, Hierozoic.).

He stooped down, he crouched as a lion.] The Hebrew word signifies a grown lion, come to his full strength. By whose stooping down (bending his knees, the Hebrew word signifies) and crouching to take his rest (which all four-footed beasts do, but the lion is observed to sleep whole days in his den, or in thickets, that he may be fresher for his prey in the night); Jacob sets forth the ease and quiet that Judah should enjoy after their victories, without any fear of disturbance. So in an old place, I think Bochart hath plainly demonstrated that laba signifies a leonas: which is rather fiercer than a lion; as he observes out of Herodotus, and other authors (Par. i. Hierozoic, lib. iii. cap. 1).

Who shall rouse him up?] Having overcome his enemies, he shall live in secure peace; free from their incursions: none daring to invade him, no more than to stir up a sleepy lion.

Ver. 10. The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, made of them at the birth of our Saviour; which was a public testimony of Augustus's sovereignty over them. So that the meaning of this prophecy is, "There shall be either kings or governors among the Jews till Christ come." So J. Christoph. Wagenseil (who hath discussed this place with great exactness) gives the sense of these words; and it is literally true: till the captivity they had kings; after their return they had governors, under the Persians, Greeks, and Romans (see his Confut. Carm. Memorialis Libri Nitzachon. R. Lipmanni, p. 293, &c.).

To strengthen which interpretation he makes this judicious remark, in another place of the same book (p. 373). That the whole time, from the beginning to the end of Judah's authority, was well nigh equally divided between kings and governors. For, according to Josephus (ib. xi. Antiq. cap. 4), they lived under kings, from David's time to the captivity, five hundred years; and under the sons of Zerubabel, who is called king or governors, after the captivity, much about the same number of years. For there being five hundred eighty and eight years from the captivity to our Saviour's birth; if seventy years be deducted (which was the time their captivity lasted) and ten be added (in which, after the birth of Christ, Herod and his son Antipas reigned for thirty-two years), there were just five hundred twenty and eight years; that is, the space in which they were under kingly authority, and under subordinate governors, was in a manner of the same length. Which makes it the more wonderful, that Jacob should so many ages before exactly divide the time of the captivity and of his posterity in Judah, between them that wielded a sceptre, and those who were only subordinate governors.

That the letter re before the word we translate laurelier hath the force of a disjunctive, and is not a mere copulative, all allow: and there are many examples of it in other places, particularly in the tenth commandment (Exod. xx. 14). The greatest objection that I can find against the interpretation of those verses, is, that though Zerubabel, the first governor after the captivity, was of the tribe of Judah; yet the Maccabeans, who were their governors most of the time after the captivity, were of the tribe of Levi. But it is to be considered, that the prophecy doth not say these rulers or governors should be of the tribe of Judah; nor does it say, of the tribe of Levi, which hath a government of its own, till the coming of Christ. Besides, by Judah is not to be understood merely the people of that tribe; but all those that were called Jews, consisting also of the tribes of Benjamin and Levi; who were incorporated with them: and were all called Judah, in opposition to the kingdom of Israel. For Benjamin, it is evident, was so near to Judah, that Hophni and Phinehas were numbered among their tribe. And though it be said, that Moses called Benjamin and Judah the two sons of Jacob, as he had received the law from his father, and that they were the heads of the tribes of Judah, they are indeed the father's name and son's name assigned to the two tribes, yet there is no reason to think that the tribe of Judah was descended from Judah only; whereas the tribe of Benjamin was descended from Benjamin only. For the tribe of Benjamin is twice said to have been divided from Judah; the one part of the tribe being divided from Judah by the policy of Saul, who had a design upon them, (I Chron. xi. 32); and the other part being divided from Judah by the policy of Joab, who had a design upon them, (2 Sam. xvi. 15). So that the tribe of Benjamin was more divided from Judah than the tribe of Judah was from Benjamin. But Wagenseil indeed thinks the most literal interpretation to be this, to him shall be the obedience of the people; which is the interpretation of Onkelos and the Jerusalem paraphrase. Kimchi also (ib. Radie.) so expounds it, the people shall obey him; taking upon them to observe, what he shall command them. And in Prov. xxx. 17, which is the only place besides this where the word jikkach is found, it seems to signify obedience. See Confut. Carm. R. Lipmanni, p. 225, where Wagenseil, after the examination of every particular word in this verse, sums up the sense of it in this paraphrase.

"That royal power and authority which shall be established in the posterity of Judah, shall not be taken from them; or, at least, they shall not be destitute of rulers and governors, no, not when the arc in their declining condition: until the coming of the Messiah. But when he is come, there shall be no difference between the Jews and other nations; who shall all be obedient unto the Messiah. And after that the posterity of Judah shall have neither king nor ruler of their own; but the whole commonwealth of Judah shall quite lose all form, and never recover it again.

The truth of this exposition appears exactly from the history: of which it will be useful here to give an account. For from David to the captivity of Babylon they held the sceptre, for five whole ages and more, as I observed above. After which, when seventy years were finished in that captivity, they lived by their own laws in their own country; but had no absolute authority of their own, independent upon others; nor ever enjoyed a full liberty. For they were at first under the present monarchs; afterwards, upon the conquest made by Alexander, under the Greeks: and then under the kings of Asia Minor and Egypt; till the Roman yoke was imposed upon them. Yet all this time, while they were under the empire of others, they enjoyed governors or rulers of their own, who administered their affairs under those monarchs. The first was Zerubbabel, called the captain, or prince of Judah (Hag. i. 1). After him Ezra and Nehemiah. And before them it is likely there were some others, as Jos. Scaliger gathers from Neh. v. 15. After the death of Nehemiah the government came into the hands of the high priests, as appears from Josephus, lib. xi. cap. 8, where he shows how Jaddua the last high priest had the government in Persia: which power was confirmed in that order, by the Maccabees, as we commonly call them. It began in Mattathias; and was continued in his sons. The third of which, Simon, raised it to such a splendour, that he looked like a prince, as the reader may see it described in 1 Mac. xiv. From whence his grandchild, Judas Maccabaeus, seems to have taken occasion to affect the name of king; though he had but the shadow of that power. Yet his posterity kept that name to the time of Herod, who stripped them of all their power, and destroyed their family. After his death the kingdom was divided by Augustus into tranches: Archelaus being made tetrarch of Judea; and two others appointed by Augustus in Ptolemais and Antipas. But Archelaus misbehaving himself, he was deprived of his government, and banished to Vienne in France; and then Judea was reduced into the form of a province, and ruled by Roman governors. After which there was no king, nor etharch of Judea; so that after this time we may safely conclude, the Jews lost even their mechokhim, or governors, as they had long ago lost the sceptre; and had no power remaining among them of administering the affairs of their commonwealth.

Now at this time our blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, the true Shiloh, came; who was the founder of a new and heavenly kingdom. And nothing more was left to be done for the fulfilling of this prophecy, but, after his crucifying, to destroy Jerusalem and the temple; and thereby with the whole form of their government, both civil and sacred. Then all power was entirely taken from Judah, when Christ had erected his throne in the heavens, and brought many people, in several parts of the earth, unto his obedience, and made them members of his celestial kingdom. Till which time this prophecy was not completely fulfilled; and thereby with the reason, possibly, that it is not alleged by Christ and his apostles; because the Jews might have said, We have still a government among us: which could not be pretended after the destruction by Titus. But which is now above sixteen hundred years ago; and we cannot find the least sign of their restitution. Which so perplexed R. Samuel Moracanus, that it made him write thus to a friend of his, above six hundred years since: "I would fain learn from thee, out of the testimonies of the law, and the prophets, and other scriptures, why the Jews are thus smitten in this captivity? For if in this present age the whole of the people is to be punished, as which may be the reason of their perpetual anger of God, because it hath no end. For it is now above a thousand years, since we were carried away captive by Titus; and yet our fathers, who worshipped idols, killed the prophets, and cast the law behind their back, were only punished with a seventy years' captivity, and then brought home again; but now there is no end of our calamities, nor do the prophets promise any." If this argument was hard to be answered then in his days, it is much harder now in ours, who still see them pursued by God's vengeance; which can be for nothing else but rejecting and crucifying the Messiah, the Saviour of the world.

Ver. 13. This verse sets forth the great fertility of Judah's country (abounding with vineyards and pastures) by two hyperbolical expressions. First. That vines should be as common there, as thorn hedges in other places; so that they might tie assers with their colts thereon: or, as some will have it, jade an ass with the fruit of one vine. Secondly. That wine should be as common as water; so that they might wash their clothes in it. Which doth not imply, that they made it serve for that use, but only denotes its plenty; which was so very great, that in treading the grapes, and pressing out the juice, their garments were all sprinkled with wine, which one might wring out of them.

[Choice vine.] The vine of Serek (which we here translate choice, and in Jer. ii. 31, noble vine) was the most excellent in all that country. For Serek was a place not above half a mile from the valley of Eschol; from whence the spies brought the large bunches, as a sample of the fruitfulness of the country (see Bochart, par. i. Hierozoe. lib. iii. cap. 13).

Ver. 12.] This verse sets forth the healthful and vigour of the Roman governors of the country. But Dr. Castell thinks this not to be a good translation: because it can be said of none but a drunkard, that his eyes are red with wine. And therefore it ought to be translated, his eyes (or his countenance, for so eyes sometimes signifies) shall be brighter and more shining than wine. So the word we render red signifies in the Arabic tongue, as he shows in his Oratio in Schol. Theolog. p. 31, and in his Lexicon. Yet the same word in the Proverbs (xxii. 29), cannot have any other signification than red; and the red colour of the eyes answers very well here to the whiteness of the teeth, which follows; and there is no more reason to think he means, they should make their eyes red with drinking wine, than that they should wash their clothes in it; but rather from the great abundance of wine; to serve not only their necessity, but excess.

[And his teeth white with milk.] Milk doth not make the teeth white: but gives such an excellent nourishment, that they who live upon it are healthy and strong, and their teeth not so apt to rot, as theirs who feed upon greater dainties. So the meaning of the rich pasture in this place should be, they should feed great flocks, and consequently they should have abundance of milk, so good and nourishing, that the teeth of the ships; and his border shall be unto Zidon.

14 ¶ Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens:

15 And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.

countrymen who lived upon it should be as white as the milk they drank. Or, if the foregoing words be translated, His eyes shall be brighter than wine; these shall be translated, His teeth whiter than milk.

Out of these three verses foregoing, Bochartus thinks the whole story of Silenus was forged by the poets (see his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 18, p. 482).

Ver. 13. The haven of the sea;] Near the lake of Tiberias; called in Scripture the sea of Gallilee.

He shall be for an haven of ships;] The lot that fell to him extended from the Mediterranean, where there were ports for ships.

His border shall be unto Zidon;] He doth not mean the city of Zidon; for the tribe of Zebulon did not extend themselves beyond Mount Carmel, which is forty miles at least from thence, but the country of Zidon, i.e. Phoenicia (as Bochart observes in his Phaen. lib. ii. cap. 34), which the Zebulonites touched. For as the Phenicians were called Syrians from Sur, i.e. Tyre: so they were called Sidonians from Sidon, as Hesychius tells us, who interprets Συριαίοις, by Φοινίκες. Whence the LXX, have Phenicians for Sidonians (Deut. iii. 9), and Phenelce for Sidon (Isa. xxiii. 2).

It is very much to be admired, that Jacob should forecast, many years beforehand, the situation of his posterity in the land of Canaan; when their several portions fell to them by lot, and not by their own choice (Josh. xix. 10, 11). This could not have been but by the spirit of prophecy. And it is remarkable also, that he mentions Zebulon before Issachar, who was his eldest brother (xxx. 11), for no other reason, that I can discover, but because Zebulon's lot was to come up before Issachar's, in the division of the land, his being the third, and Issachar's the fourth (Josh. xix. 17). By this they were taught that their habitation in the land of Canaan was the gift of God; and did not come by chance: their forefather having so long before predicted the very portion they should have.

Ver. 14. Issachar is a strong ass;] As he compared Judah to a lion, because of his valour, so he compares Issachar to an ass, and a strong ass, because he foresaw they would be very patient and unwearied in rustic labours, in which asses were principally employed in those countries.

Couching down between two burdens;] There are various opinions about the signification of that word which we translate burdens. But none seem to come so apt as that to express the great strength of an ass; which lies down, with its load hanging down on both sides. Whence a she-ass is called ăthôn (as Bochart observes), from the word ăthom, which signifies strength; because no beast of that bigness can carry such a burden.

Ver. 15. He saw that rest was good;] Or, as some will have it, their resting-place; the country that fell to their share in the land of Canaan, no part of which was more fruitful than some parts of Issachar's portion. Which way soever we take it, he seems to foretell they would choose to follow husbandry rather than merchandise (as Zebulon did), and love quiet and peace, as husbandmen do; especially when they live in a rich soil, as this tribe did. For so it follows,

The land that it was pleasant;] The famous valley of Jezreel was in this tribe: whose border extended as far as Jordan; where there was a very pleasant country (Josh. xix. 18, 22).

47 And said, I will let them live upon this mountain, and they shall be mine people, and I will be their God.

48 And said, I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and they shall be mine, saith the Lord God.

49 And said, I will let them dwell upon this mountain, and they shall be mine people, and I will be their God.

50 And said, I will let them dwell upon this mountain, and they shall be mine people, and I will be their God.

51 And said, I will let them dwell upon this mountain, and they shall be mine people, and I will be their God.
CHAPTER XLIX.

23 The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him;

24 But his bow abode in strength, and the arrows of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel:)

25 Even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, 4, 5, 11). Some refer it also to Potipher's wife, who wickedly slandered him; and others to the whole tribe of Ephraim, who were encompassed with enemies (who in general are meant by archers), when the kingdom was settled in them, over the ten tribes.

Have sorely grieved him.] By their unkind, or rather choleric behaviour towards him; "for they could not speak peaceably to him" (xxxvii. 4), and it is likely they reviled him, and threw out bitter words against him: which are properly compared to arrows (Ps. lxxv. 3).

Shot at him.] Designed to destroy him; and did actually throw him into sore afflictions (xxxviii. 23, 24). Hated him.] Which arose from their hatred to him. Ver. 24. But his bow abode in strength.] He armed himself with invincible patience; having nothing else to oppose unto their malicious contivances. It seems to be a metaphor from those soldiers, who have bows so well made, that though often, never so often bent, they neither break, nor grow weak. Such was the temper of Joseph's mind.

The arms of his hands were made strong] i.e. He was strengthened and supported: being like to a strenuous archer, the muscles and sinews of whose arms are so firm and compact, that though his hands draw his bow continually, he is not weary.

By the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.] Which fortified he had not from himself, but from the Almighty; who had supported Jacob in all his adversities; and made all that Joseph did (when he was sold and imprisoned) to prosper in his hands (xxxix. 3, 22, 23). The Hebrew word abir, which signifies potent or powerful, and we translate mighty One, is as much as the Lord of Jacob. For from power it comes to signify power, authority and dominion also, as Bochart observes.

From thence] From the Divine Providence over him, before mentioned.

Is the shepherd.] Joseph became the feeder and nourisher of his father, and of his family, and of their flocks and herds: preserving them all from being famished.

The stone of Israel.] Who upheld them all, and kept them from being mined. Or, shepherd may signify his being made governor of all the land of Egypt; and the stone of Israel, the support of his family. For shepherd is a name of dignity and authority: and stone signifies the foundation (as Abarbinel here expounds) upon which the whole building relies: as Jacob and all his children did upon Joseph for their sustenance.

Some I find (particularly D. Chytreus) refer the words from thence unto Joseph: and then by the shepherd and stone of Israel, understand those excellent men, who by their wisdom and valor supported the commonwealth of Israel. Such as Joshua, the captain of the Lord's host, and of the judges, who were of the tribe of Ephraim: and Gideon, Jair, and Jophthah, who were of the tribe of Manassesh. But the following words incline rather to the former sense.

Ver. 25. Even by the God of thy father.] Or from him that blessed me; and advanced thee to be the blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts, and of the womb:

26 The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills: they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren.

27 Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf: in the support of my family. For it refers to all that went before.

Who shall help thee?] Having said what God had already done for him; he now foretells what he would do hereafter: which relates to all his posterity; whom God would protect and defend.

By the arms of the mighty God of Jacob who is all-sufficient; by which name he revealed himself unto Abraham, when he entered into covenant with him and with his seed (xxvii. 1).

Bless thee with the blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under.] The meaning seems to be, that his posterity should be planted in a very fertile soil: watered from above with the dew of heaven and with showers of rain: and watered beneath with springs and rivers. As G. Vossius well interprets it, lib. i. de Idolol. cap. 77.

Blessings of the breast, and of the womb.] A promise of a numerous and thriving progeny. Or, of a vast increase of cattle, so well fed, that they should bring up their young prosperously, as well as bring them forth abundantly.

Ver. 26. The blessings of thy father.] Either the blessings bestowed by God upon Jacob; or the blessings Jacob conferred on his son Joseph.

Have prevailed.] Are greater.

Above the blessings of thy progenitors.] Than the blessings God bestowed upon Abraham and Isaac; who had not so many sons as God had blessed him withal: upon every one of whom also he conferred a share in the inheritance of the land of Canaan; whereas Ishmael was excluded by Abraham, and Esau by Isaac. Or, the meaning may be, I have done more for thee, than for them, i.e. thou shalt be happier than I. For Jacob led an unsettled life: but Joseph flourished in great splendour in Egypt, to the end of his days.

Unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills.] As long as the world shall last. For perpetuity is expressed in Scripture by the durability of mountains ( Isa. liv. 10). And here he seems to allude to the noble mountains, which fell to be the portion of Joseph's children, viz. Bashan and Mount Ephraim. But there are those who think he hath not respect to the durability of these mountains, but to their fruitfulness; translating the Hebrew word tawat not bounds, but desires, as the Vulgar Latin doth. And then the sense is, Unto all that is most desirable in those ancient hills, which abounded with the most excellent fruit. And this translation is grounded on Moses's blessings, which seems to be an interpretation of Jacob's, Deut. xxxiii. 15, where he blesses him: "for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills."

Of him that was separate from his brethren.] The word nazir, which we translate separate, signifies one that is separated from others, vel voto, vel dignitate (Bochart observes, par. ii. Hierozol. lib. v. cap. 6), "either by a vow, or by his dignity." And in the latter sense Joseph is called nazir, because of his eminent dignity; whereby he was advanced above all his brethren; being the viceroy of Egypt.

Ver. 27. Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf.] This morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.

28 But all these are the twelve tribes of Israel: and this is it that their father spake unto them, and blessed them; every one according to his blessing he blessed them.

29 And he charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite,

30 In the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Ca-sets forth the warlike temper of this tribe: a wolf being both a strong and undaunted, and also a very rapacious creature; and thence in after-times dedicated to Mars. From whence wolves are called Martii and Martiaæ in Virgil and in Horace: and warlike men are called by the Greeks ἀνδροφόνοι, "of a wolf-like temper." And the history justifies this character: the tribe of Benjamin alone maintaining a war with all the other tribes; in which they overcame them in two battles, though they had sixteen to one against them. And they killed then more men of Israel than they had in their whole army (see Benjamin's narration, ch. li. ii. p. 10).

In the morning he shall devour the prey, &c.] This doth not signify (as the forenamed author observes, in the same place) the whole day, but the whole night: one part of which is the evening, and the other the morning. And therefore the particle and signifies here as much as after: and this is the sense: the tribe of Benjamin shall be like a ravenous wolf: who shall have his prey to eat till morning-light; after he hath divided it in the evening. For the division of the prey goes before the eating of it. This passage is like that Josh. vii. 25, "They burnt them with fire, and stoned them with stones," i. e. burnt them, after they had stoned them; as we there rightly translate it. And this applied to Benjamin, signifies such success in their wars, that they should come home loaded with the spoils of their enemies.

I omit the fancy of the Talmudists, who imagine Benjamin is compared to a wolf, because the altar of burnt-offering, where the morning and evening sacrifices were daily consumed, stood in this tribe. They that would know what they say of them, may look in Codex Middath, cap. iii. § 1, and L'Empereur's Annotations there.

Ver. 28. All these are the twelve tribes of Israel.] From these sprang the twelve tribes of Israel: or, these are the blessings of the twelve tribes: for these words plainly show, that what he had said was not to be fulfilled in their persons, but in their posterity.

naan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite for a possession of a burying-place.

31 There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah.

32 The purchase of the field and of the cave that is therein was from the children of Heth.

33 And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people.

Blessed them; every one according to his blessing, &c.] He did not give them a new blessing after all this: but the meaning is, he blessed them (in the manner foregoing) every one according to the blessing designed for them. There seems indeed to be no benediction bestowed on the first three tribes; but that is to be understood only comparatively: for he provided for them all a portion in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 29. I am to be gathered unto my people:] Must die shortly.

Bury me with my fathers, &c.] The reason of this injunction is well explained by Mercer: to whom refer the reader.

Ver. 30.] He describes the place so particularly, in this and the two next verses, because he would not have them mistake it when they went to bury him; and that he might show his title to it, if the inhabitants of Canaan (from which he had been absent some years) should dispute the laying his body there.

Ver. 33. When Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons,] Concerning his burial; which he briefly added to his prophecy.

He gathered up his feet into the bed.] The Hebrews think that out of reverence to God he sat up when he pronounced a blessing on his sons: his feet hanging down upon the ground. And indeed it is very probable he endeavoured to put himself into a posture of authority at least: and therefore sat on his bed-side while he spake. And now the prophetic spirit, which had raised his natural spirits above their ordinary pitch, departing from him, they presently sunk so much the lower; and in a short time he expired.

Yielded up the ghost.] The Hebrews will have it to express an easy death.

Was gathered unto his people.] To his ancestors. From whence there are some (particularly Theodoret) who infer the belief they had, in those days, of another life, in society with those who were departed out of this life. For brutes are never said to be gathered to those of their kind that died before them.

CHAPTER L.

1 The mourning for Jacob. 4 Joseph gateth leave of Pharaoh to go to bury him. 7 The funeral. 15 Joseph comforteth his brethren, who weaved his pardon. 22 His age. 23 He seeth the third generation of his sons. 24 He prophesieth unto his brethren of their return. 25 He taketh an oath of them for his bones. 26 He dieth, and is chested.

1 And Joseph fell upon his father's face, and wept upon him, and kissed him.

2 And Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalm'd Israel.

3 And forty days were fulfilled for him; (for sions of it: though he was a man in great dignity and authority.

Kissed him.] It is likely he first closed his eyes, as God promised he should do, xlvi. 1 (and as the cusso are fulfilled the days which are emblazoned: and the Egyptians mourned him three score and ten days.

And when the days of his mourning were past, Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh, saying, Now if I have found grace in your eyes, but it is likely, in future times (when Diodorus lived) they might have attained to a greater perfection in this art; and made their spices penetrate the whole body in less than forty days, but more than thirty. And Herodotus doth not really differ from this, when he saith, in the place before named, τὰ τούτα περάτων ἐτηκαί, "when they had done these things" (stuffed the body with myrrh, cassia, and other spices, except frankincense), ἀπορεύοντας τοῖς ντοροῖς κεφαλῆς ἔφεσεν ἐβαλόμενος, they pickled it in nitre, where it lay soaking seventy days." That is, thirty days more: till the forty were made up seventy: longer than which neither the bodies of the better nor the meaner sort were to be embalmed. But they should have considered how much more perversely it is not to follow the decent customs of the country where we live; and that dead bodies, especially of the faithful, are not to be neglected, but treated (as St. Austin speaks, lib. i. de Civ. Law, cap. 12.) as organs of the body of Christ, by which the ancients, he thinks, did well to carry to their funerals, officiosa pietate. The Egyptians mourned for him three score and ten days.] i. e. All that time they were preparing his body in the manner before related, for its funeral: which Herodotus says, was just seventy days. He and also Diodorus describe their manner of mourning; and say that they defiled their heads with wax (as the Jews sprinkled ashes on their heads), and went about lamenting till the corpse was buried: abstaining from bathing and from wine, and from all delicate food, or fine clothes. Which latter part of their mourning, it is likely, might be in use in Joseph’s time; but very different from what is now the Egyptian practice. In the following chapters, Herodotus, in three distinct chapters, shows how the Egyptians embalmed their dead, and his account of the business is so exact, that it is a valuable book on that subject, (all the time the body was embalming), which was very various in different times and places: and continued in some countries a great many days longer than in others. This time of seventy days may seem to some too long: but Jacobus Capellus proposes this to their consideration (Hist. Exc. et Saur. ad a. 2310), that Joseph being next to their king, the Egyptians honoured his father with a royal funeral, and a mourning of seventy days: which he thinks is a round number for seventy-two: for Diodoros says so many were the days of mourning for their king. “It seems reasonable to them, that as they gave the fifth part of the increase of their land to their king when he was alive; so they should bestow the fifth part of the year upon him in mourning for him when he was dead: which was just seventy-two, not reckoning the five odd days, which did not come into their account. As to those who object that this was inconsiderate mourning, having more of ambition than piety in it, his answer is, That (granting it to be true) Joseph did not bring in this custom; and had peculiar reason to follow what he found in use there: that they might be the more condemned who vexed the innocent posterity, on whose parent they had bestowed royal honours. Besides, there is something due to kings and great men, to distinguish them from the dregs of the people.”
Ver. 4. When the days of his mourning were past,
That is, the seventy days before named.
Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh. [To the great officers of the court; unto whom, it is most probable, he spake by a messenger: see the history of such Joseph was) using to keep close in their chambers, and not to appear in public, or make visits. At least it was against the custom to appear in the court (if the same usage was there in those days, which was in the Persian court in Macedon's time;
and such rational customs one cannot but think were very ancient) in the habit of mourning. For which reason Joseph did not himself make to himself the following request to Pharaoh: they who were in the state of mourning being looked upon as defiled.
Ver. 5. My father made me swear, &c. See xlvii.
29, 30, where Jacob engaged him by an oath to carry his body into Canaan, to be buried there; that he might keep up some claim to that country, by virtue of his royal family which he had there purchased;
and where his father Isaac lay buried.
Which I have digged for me. In the cave that Abraham had bought, Gen. xxiii. (which was a large place), Jacob it seems had taken care to have a grave digged for himself. From which and such like examples St. Austin argues (in the place quoted above) that the bodies of the dead, especially of good men, are to be treated with such a regard, as they themselves thought was due to them.
Ver. 6. According as he made thee swear. The religion of an oath, it appears from hence, was in those days so sacred, that the king, who had not sworn himself, would not have another man violate it, for his sake: which was a great honor to the king, and would ot have been so long from his business, being his chief minister in the land of Egypt. Such heathen kings as these will rise up in judgment against those Christian princes who make a jest of their oaths.
Ver. 7. The servants of Pharaoh. This seems to be explained by the next words, the elders of his house; the principal officers of court. For the word house must be understood with some limitation, as usually in Scripture: some being left behind, no doubt, to wait upon the king. Thus in Matt. iii. 5, all Judea is said to have gone out to John's baptism, i. e. a great many.

The elders of his house, &c.] I have observed before on xxiv. 2, that elder is a name of dignity; as the Jerusalem Targum renders it; instead of my servant the elder of his house, having these words, his principal servant, who was set over all the rest, as their governor. And it appears by this place that this was used not only by the Hebrews, but by the Egyptians long before Moses's time, as a title of honour and dignity: as it hath since been by all nations whatsoever their state (as Selden, lib. 1. de Synagogis, cox. 14,
There they served, &c.
The elders of the land of Egypt.) The principal persons in authority and dignity, throughout the whole country, as well as those of the court: such as were governors of provinces, and cities, and counsellors, &c.

Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt.
8 And all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house: only their little one, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen.
9 And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company.
10 And they came to the threshing-floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan, and there they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation:
Which honour they did to Jacob, in all likelihood, by Pharaoh's command: for how well soever they might stand affected to Joseph, they could not of their own accord desert their charge.
Ver. 9, 10. Their whole family; except such as were necessary to look after their little ones and their flocks, &c. This verse also shows the word all must have a limited sense.
Ver. 9, 10. They went up with him both chariots and horsemen. As a guard to him; which, it is likely, always attended him, as viceroy of the kingdom; but more especially probably to guard him in his journey through the deserts, in case he should meet with any opposition when he came to challenge his burying-place. Though it is probable, that matter was settled beforehand with the Canaanites; who were in no condition to oppose the kingdom of Egypt, which was grown very rich, and they very poor, by the late plundering.

It was a very great company.] That he might appear in greater state, at such a solemnity.
Ver. 10. They came to the threshing-floor of Atad.
Some take Atad for a place, and translate the word before it in the same sense, as if he had said they came to Goreen-atad. But Forsterius in his Lexicon thinks Atad was the proper name of a man, who was eminent in that country for his threshing-floor.
Though there are those who take it for a bramble, with which that floor was fenced in: for so the word signifies, Judges. ix. 14. And the Africans called a bramble atadim (as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 15), which is the plural number of Atad. But the Talmudists are so fanciful, that, not satisfied with such reasons, might have pretended he could not have Joseph so long from his business, being his chief minister in the land of Egypt. Such heathen kings as these will rise up in judgment against those Christian princes who make a jest of their oaths.
Ver. 10. They came to the threshing-floor of Atad.
Some translate it, On this side Jordan. Both are true, with respect to several places:
for it was on this side Jordan with respect to those in Canaan; but beyond Jordan with respect to those who came unto Canaan, through the deserts: as Joseph did now, and the Israelites afterward. Why Joseph passed this way, which was very much about which was a great deal shorter, is hard to tell. Perhaps it was a better way for chariots; for it is not probable they feared any opposition from the Philistines, or Edomites; with whom the matter might have been concerted (as we now speak) beforehand, if they had apprehended their passage would meet with any hinderance from them.
Ver. 10. They came to the threshing-floor of Atad.
Such is the case with some of the persons whom we have described. Wherein this great and sore lamentation consisted, we are not able to give a certain account: but in aftertimes they sat with their faces covered; having ashes sprinkled on their heads; crying out with a mournful voice, sometimes wringing and he made a mourning for his father seven days.
11 And when the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning in the floor of Atad, they said, This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians: wherefore the name of it was called Abel-mizraim, which is beyond Jordan.
12 And his sons did unto him according as he commanded them:
13 For his sons carried him into the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, which Abraham bought with the field for a possession of a burial-place of Ephron the Hittite, before Mamre.
14 And Joseph returned into Egypt, he, and his brethren, and all that went up with him to bury his father, after he had buried his father.

sometimes clapping their hands together: smiting their breasts, or their thighs; with many other expressions of grief and sorrow. But why they made this lamentation at the floor of Atad, rather than at the grave, is harder to resolve. Perhaps it was a more convenient place to stay in seven days, than that where he was to be buried: and the mourning being made in the country where the body was laid, was the same as if it had been made at the grave.
Or, it was the fashion, perhaps, at the very entrance of the country, where they carried a corpse to be buried, to fall into a lamentation: and they made the same again, when they came to the place where it was interred: though there is nothing of that here mentioned.

[The days.] That was the time of public mourning among the Jews in succeeding ages, it appears from many instances: particularly 1 Sam. xxxi.
13; Ecclus. xxii. 13; Judith xvi. 29. And just so long their joy lasted at solemn weddings; as we read in ch. xxix. of this book, ver. 27.

Ver. 11. This is a grievous mourning to the Egytips. By this it appears this was a solemn public mourning, in which the Egyptians themselves were joined, though not related to him. And therefore, it is likely, consisted in such wallings, and outward expressions of sorrow, as were made even by those who had no inward grief. For in following times there was a sort of men called πνείας, lamenters, (from the Hebrew word אֶבֶן, enson; the following verse,) who had a public office, as our bearers have, to attend upon funerals and make doleful lamentations (see Buxtorf. Lex.
Talm. f. 1524).

Abel-mizraim.] This shows the lamentation was exceeding great, that it changed the very name of the place where it was made: or, at least, gave a name to it.

Ver. 14.] They had a prosperous journey: and there is no ground for what some Jews bid us here note; that not one man was lost, though they had a battle with the Edomites in their way to Canaan.

Ver. 15.] Their guilt was so great, that it continued to make them suspicious.

Ver. 16. They sent a messenger unto Joseph.] The same guilt made them fearful to go themselves; but they first tried how he would answer a messenger they sent to him (for it doth not appear there was more than one) in all their names; with a letter, perhaps, confirming what he delivered by word of mouth.
Some think this message was sent before they went to bury their father; while the time of mourning lasted;
when Joseph's heart, they thought, was tender, and his father fresh in memory. But this is not a sufficient reason to make us think it was not done in order of time as it is here placed in the story.

Thy father did command before he died.] This was a feigned story; for we do not find that Joseph had acquainted his father with their usage of him. Or, if he did, it would have been more proper to have left this charge with Joseph, than with them; or rather, had he needed not to command him to take no revenge.

Ver. 17. Forgive—the trespass.] So we well translate the Hebrew phrase, take away the trespass: which is used elsewhere in this book, xviii. 24, 36, and in Hosea xiv. 2. And by forgive is meant, Remitte penam, quam ab illis possis jure exigere proper pecatum in commissions; as Bochart well explains this passage (par. i. Hierozoe. lib. ii. cap. 41); 'Remit the punishment which thou mayest justly exact of them, for the offence they committed against thee.'

Of the servants of the God of thy father.] They urge besides the command of their father, and the relation they had to him as his brethren, that they were of the same religion with him; which makes the greatest conjunction of minds and affections, if it be rightly understood and practised. For how can the worshippers of the same God hate one another?
There are those who think they call themselves the servants of God, not merely upon the account of their worshiping the true God, but because they were teachers also of the true religion; for this weave them, above other Israelites, to be the servants of God.
Joseph went when they spake unto him.] By their messenger. Which shows he was so far from being angry at them, that he pitied them, and had a tender affection to them.

Ver. 18. His brethren also went, &c.] The messenger acquiring them how he stood affected to them; and, it is likely, carrying back a kind message from him, and an invitation to come to him; they went to his house, and humbled themselves at his feet. In which Joseph's dream was still further fulfilled.

We be thy servants.] They had not yet overcome their fear (so close did their guilt stick to their conscience), and therefore call themselves his servants, not his brethren. They had sold him to be a servant;
and now they offer themselves to be so to him.

Ver. 19. For am I in the place of God?] His father Jacob had said the same to Rachel (xxx. 2), to persuade her to submit to Divine Providence: which seems to be the scope of the words here. Shall I presume to oppose myself to what is come to pass; as 20 But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive.

21 Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them.

22 ¶ And Joseph dwelt in Egypt, he, and his father's house: and Joseph lived an hundred and ten years.

23 And Joseph saw Ephraim's children, the third generation: and the children also of Machir the son of Manasseh were brought up upon Joseph's knees.

24 And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.

25 And Joseph took an oath of the children of a second, as we read 1 Chron. vii. 16. All which were born before Joseph died; and, perhaps, by children he means the children of his grandchildren.

Joseph's great authority, and his children's great increase, overawed his brethren so that they never durst dispute their father's will; in which he gave a double portion unto them. Which one would guess by their temper, was as displeasing to them, as their father's kindness to Joseph anciently had been; but they durst not oppose it; nor do we find they quarrelled at it.

Ver. 25. God will surely visit you.] He explains his meaning by what follows: and bring you out of this land, &c. For the word visit is used indifferently either for bestowing good things, or inflicting evil. Thus he died in the same faith with his ancestors; that God would make good his promises to them.

Ver. 25. Joseph took an oath.] As his father had done of him (xlvii. 30, 31).

26 Of the sons of Joseph.] Not only of his brethren mentioned before (ver. 24), but of all their family, who were to succeed them; and might live (when his brethren were dead) to carry his body out of Egypt; which he desired, for the same reason his father had done.

27 Carry up my bones from hence.] He did not desire to be carried immediately after his death, as his father was when his embalming was finished; but that they should carry him when they themselves returned to Canaan: by which time he knew his flesh would be quite dried up, and nothing left but bones. The reason why he did not desire to be carried away presently, was, that his body remaining with them, they might look upon it as a pledge and security of the same visitation which they expected. It was the custom of the Israelites to carry away with them the bodies of all their dead: thus Joseph desired to be carried back to Canaan, as his father's was: and therefore desired them not to think of laying him there, till that time came, when they should make a solemn and universal departure thither.

We read nothing what became of the rest of his brethren, but Josephus saith they were all carried into the land of Canaan to be buried: for they had the same desire, in all likelihood, and gave the same charge concerning their bodies; to keep postery in hope, that God would certainly bring them thither. Which the words of St. Stephen also may seem to import, when he saith (Acts vii. 15, 16), "Jacob died, and our fathers, and were carried over into Sychem," &c. Though we read of none of their fathers besides Joseph; yet it seems the tradition was, that they were all carried thither, after his example. And so St. Jerome saith, that he saw at Sychem the sepulchres of the twelve patriarchs (Epitaph. Paulæ. cap. 6).

Ver. 26. So Joseph died.] After he had taken the forenamed oath of them, and assured them again of CHAPTER L.

Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence.

26 So Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.

...
THE SECOND BOOK OF MOSES,

CALLED

EXODUS.

This Book hath its name from the principal subject of it, viz. the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt. For so the Greek word ἐξῆλθεν signifies, going out, or departing from one place to another. It contains a history of about a hundred forty and five years (some make it two or three years less) from the death of Joseph, to the building of the Tabernacle. For it treats of several things which went before their departure, and which followed after it: but they all relate to that, and depend upon it.

CHAPTER I.

1 Now these are the names of the children of Israel, which came into Egypt; every man and his household came with Jacob.

2 Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah.

3 Issachar, Zebulun, and Benjamin.

4 Dan, and Naphtali, Gad, and Asher.

5 And all the souls that came out of the loins of Jacob were seventy souls: for Joseph was in Egypt already.

6 And Joseph died, and all his brethren, and all that generation.

7 And the children of Israel were fruitful.

Ver. 1. Now these are the names, &c.] Being to relate the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, it was very proper first to set down the number of those who came into it; and the heads of them: whereby it might the better appear also how God had fulfilled his promise to Abraham, of multiplying his seed: which Moses had recorded in his first book (Genesis), where he shows this promise was made at that very time, when he declared, after a long affliction in Egypt, he would conduct his posterity to Canaan (Gen. xv. 5, 13, 18).

Ver. 2, 3, 4. Reuben, Simeon, &c.] He doth not set down their names (in these three verses) according to their birth: but first the children of Leah; then one of Rachel's; and then those of his handmaids; and last of all (in the next verses) Joseph, who was in Egypt before.

Ver. 5. And all the souls] i. e. Persons. That came out of the loins. In the Hebrew out of the thigh, which signifies that part whereby mankind is propagated: as was observed upon Gen. xlvi. 26. And so the author of the Tripartite history uses the word femur, when he speaks of the martyrdom of Benjamin (as Bochart observes, par. ii. Hierozol. lib. v. cap. 15); Alum nura rum acutum calamum in ejus femur, unde humana origo descendit, jussit immittit.

For Joseph was in Egypt already.] In the Hebrew the particle vau (which we commonly translate and, and here for) sometimes also signifies with (see Gen. iv. 20). And so it doth in this place: which should be translated seventy souls, with Joseph; who was in Egypt already. For Joseph is not to be added to the seventy, but reckoned among them; to make up that number: as appears from Gen. xlvi.

and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them.

8 Now there arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph.

because when more than one are born at a birth, they are frequently very weak, and not long-lived; therefore he adds, Multiplied.] Which signifies, that they grew up to be men and women; and lived to have children of their own. And those not feeble, but lusty and strong; as the next words, he thinks, import, waxed exceeding mighty; of which more presently.

Now their number being taken, they were found to be six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty men, from twenty years old and upward; as we read, Numb. i. 45, 46. And therefore, reckoning women, children, and youths under the age of twenty, we cannot but think they were three times as many: or perhaps two millions. Which is not incredible, by way of illustration, when we consider how this number might spring from seventy persons in the space of two hundred and fifteen years (which the foregoing sums make), as Bonfierius, and several others from him in our own language, have been at the pains to demonstrate.

Waxed exceeding mighty.] This is commonly thought to signify, that they were not only numerous, but robust and strong. And it may as well denote, that their vast numbers made them very formidable to the Egyptians: who began, it appears by the sequel, to be jealous of their power, if they should have a will to attempt any thing against them.

The land was filled with them.] i.e. The land of Goshen; and perhaps some other parts of the lower Egypt.

Ver. 8. Now there arose up a new king over Egypt.] Some by a new king understand a king of another family, or race (as Josephus interprets it), nay, a stranger of another nation: just as new gods are strange gods in Scripture language. Thus Sir John Marsham; and we must doubt that he knew not Josephus, if he be followed. But this is not certain, and the conceit whereby Aben Ezra justifies it (which is, that the word rose up implies as much, is justly censured by Ababinel as frivolous; it being the common word, which is used everywhere, when a new king succeeds his predecessor. It is most likely therefore that Moses means no more, but that the king in whose time Joseph died, being dead likewise (whom many may take to have been Nephthaphus), and another after him, whom they call Thuthmosis; the next successor in the throne (Amenophis) either had heard nothing of Joseph, or did not mind what was said of him. Our great prince of Ireland gives a different account of the succession of the Egyptian kings; and takes this king to have been Ramasse Miamum: but

9 And he said unto his people, Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we;

10 Come on, let us deal wisely with them; lest they multiply, and it come to pass, that, when there falleth out any war, they join also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and so get them up out of the land.

11 Therefore they did set over them taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses.

12 But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew. And they were grieved because of the children of Israel.

13 And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigour:

14 And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service, wherein they made them serve, was with rigour.

That when there falleth out any war, [With the Arabsians, Ethiopians, or other neighbouring nations. For I see no reason to believe that he means the ancient Egyptians (with whom the Israelites had lived in great friendship, but now were expelled by the shepherd kings of Syria and the people of their cities; who, when they weakened their bodies. For the Hebrew word mitzam coming from mas, which signifies tribute, it may be reasonably thought, that these taskmasters (as we call them) exacted great sums of money of them, as well as afflicted them with their burdens, i. e. hard labour of all sorts, as the eastern writers expound it.

Ver. 11. Therefore they did set over them taskmasters, &c.] This was the result of the council; that they should be brought low by laying heavy taxes upon them, to squeeze them of their money: and by making them work at hard labour to strengthen them, so as to weaken their bodies. For the Hebrew word mitzam coming from mas, which signifies tribute, it may be reasonably thought, that these taskmasters (as we call them) exacted great sums of money of them, as well as afflicted them with their burdens, i.e. hard labour of all sorts, as the eastern writers expound it.

Treasure cities.] Fortified cities, wherein he had his magazines (as we now speak) of all sort of ammunition, and stores of corn, and public provisions, as well as treasures of money. For so we translate this word. Ver. 11. And the Egyptians; rather therefore.] The Egyptians resolved to take a more severe course with them.

Made the children of Israel to serve with rigour.] Used them more tyrannically and cruelly: without any mercy: whereby their strength, in all likelihood, would be broken, as the Hebrew word signifies. Some of the Jews think they beat and scourged them sorely.

Ver. 14. They made their lives bitter.] The Hebrews call all things bitter, which extremely grieve and afflict the soul (Gen. xxvii. 34; Lam. iii. 15). Whence Naomi bids her daughters call her no more by that pleasant name, but call her Mara, i.e. bitter: because of the very severe afflictions she had endured in a strange country.

With hard bondage.] Such drudgery as if they had been mere bond-slaves.

In mortar, and in brick.] Πέποιος εις πίθον ουγκρατούς, "by making clay into bricks" (as Philo well interprets it, lib. i. de Vita Mosis), or in working the clay, and then mixing it into the brick. And so Bochart, where he speaks of Pithom, "L'Empereur's, a city of Arabs." And therefore Sir J. Marshall's conjecture seems more reasonable, who takes it for Pelusium: which was the most ancient fortified place in Egypt; called by Ezekiel (xxx. 15), "the strength of Egypt," and by Suidas, long after him, καὶ τήν τοῦ Ἀσυρίων the key of Egypt: because it was the inlet from Syria into this country, Which was the reason, as Diodorus says (lib. iv.), that they made all fortified to ἀλασκωμαῖος στύμα, as his words are. And this agrees with the significations of Pithom, if C. Chrysenus guesses aright, which is as much as πί and τήν, i.e. the mouth of the deep: being seated near the sea, at the mouth of one of the streams of the Nile. And thus I find it expounded in the Talmud, T. Ber. in the Gemara, cap. 1, § 92.

And Raamses. It is an ignorant conceit of Benoī Tudeleensis that this city is that called Ein-Alumes, i.e. the fountain of the sun: in Greek, Helopolis (see his Itiner. p. 130, and L'Empereur's Anot. p. 529). For the city was in the upper Egypt; whereas Raamses was in the lower, in the land of Goshen; and gave name to the whole country where the Israelites dwelt (Gen. xlvii. 11). And it is most likely, it was a frontier town, which lay in the entrance of Egypt from Arabia, or some of the neighbouring countries. They that take the name of the king who now reigned to have been Raamses, think this city had its name from him, and the country called Pithom (as Mercator thinks) from the name of his queen.

Ver. 12. But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew.] Here is a new word, different from all the former (ver. 7), to express their extraordinary increase; for so jipbrots signifies, breaking out, as water doth which bursts out with a greater force, when it is poured out of its bounds. This, as St. Augustine observes (lib. 8. de Civ. Dei, cap. 6), is to be ascribed to the Divine blessing, for naturally tiresome labours would have dispirited them and made them less fruitful.

They were grieved because of the children of Israel.] It vexed them to see this device prove so unsuccessful, that it promoted what they thought to hinder their purpose. Ver. 13. And the Egyptians; rather therefore.] The Egyptians resolved to take a more severe course with them.

Made the children of Israel to serve with rigour.] Used them more tyrannically and cruelly: without any mercy: whereby their strength, in all likelihood, would be broken, as the Hebrew word signifies. Some of the Jews think they beat and scourged them sorely.

Ver. 14. They made their lives bitter.] The Hebrews call all things bitter, which extremely grieve and afflict the soul (Gen. xxvii. 34; Lam. iii. 15). Whence Naomi bids her daughters call her no more by that pleasant name, but call her Mara, i.e. bitter: because of the very severe afflictions she had endured in a strange country.

With hard bondage.] Such drudgery as if they had been mere bond-slaves.

CHAPTER I.

15 And the king of Egypt spake to the Hebrew midwives, of which the name of the one was Shiphrah, and the name of the other Puah;
16 And he said, When ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, and see them upon the stools; if it be a son, then ye shall kill him: but if it be a daughter, then shall she live.
17 But the midwives feared God, and did not as the king of Egypt commanded them, but saved the men children alive.
18 And the king of Egypt called for the mid-
EXODUS.

22 And Pharaoh charged all his people, saying, Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river, and every daughter ye shall save alive.

wherin God rewarded them; which was in making them houses. Some indeed (particularly Mr. Calvin) refer this to the Israelites; because the word them is of the masculine gender; and therefore cannot, they think, be meant of the midwives; but must be interpreted, by this means the children of Israel were exceedingly increased. But, besides that this was said just before, it is not unusual in Scripture, when the speech is of women, to use the masculine gender. Thus Ruth (1.8) prays for her daughters-in-law in these words, “the Lord deal kindly with you;” where in the Hebrew the masculine gender is used, and not the feminine. But we need go no further for an instance of this than the very next chapter to this (Exod. ii. 17), where Moses is said to water their flock, speaking of Jethro’s daughters, and the word for their is of the masculine gender. It agrees also best with the whole story to take it so here; that God made the midwives houses (so the Chaldee and the LXX. understand it), that is, gave them a numerous offspring, out of which arose many families, which in Scripture language are called houses (Gen. xxx. 30); “We shall make ourself a house” (the same phrase with this,) i.e. take care of my own family (Deut. xxv. 9; Ruth iv. 5). Or else the meaning may be, he increased their estate, and gave them great riches: which the Psalmist may be thought to mean, when he saith, “Except the Lord build the house,” (i.e. preserve and increase the estate of a family) their labour is in vain that endeavour it (see also 2 Sam. vii. 11; Ps. cxiii. 9). Some that take these midwives to have been Egyptian women, proselyted to the Jewish religion, think the sense may be that they married to Israelites, and God made their families eminent in Israel.

Ver. 22, Pharaoh charged all his people, saying, Every son, &c.] Not being able to effect his end by the midwives, he commanded everybody to inform his officers when any Hebrew woman fell in labour, and appointed searchers (it is likely) to examine whether they were delivered of male or female, and to act according to what is here ordered. Some, that understand the foregoing words of the Israelites, make this the sense of the two last verses: “Because the midwives feared God, and thereby the families of the Israelites were increased, not diminished; Pharaoh took a new course, and charged all his people to see that done, which the midwives refused.”

The Jews (in the book called the life of Moses), say that many of their people, upon this decree of Pharaoh, resolved not to marry, or not to come near their wives: and those who did, were forced to have them brought to bed alone, and throw their children into the fields, where the angels took care of them, &c.

But this is confuted by what follows in the next chapter. And yet they are so fond of such fables, that in one of their Medrashim (or books of homilies), they say God made milk to come out of one stone, and honey out of another, to suckle them, while they lay hid in the earth. (See Buxtorf. of the education of their children, Synag. Judaic. cap. 7.)

CHAPTER II.

1 Moses is born, and in an ark cast into the flags. 5 He is found, and brought up by Pharaoh’s daughter.

11 He slayeth an Egyptian. 13 He reproveth an Hebrew. 15 He flaxeth into Midian. 21 He marrieth Zipporah. 22 Gershom is born. 23 God respecteth the Israelites’ cry.

1 And there went a man of the house of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi.

2 And the woman conceived, and bare a son: and when she saw him that he was a goodly child, she hid him three months.

3 And when she could not longer hide him, Scripture are frequently called sisters. And then, when it is said she was a daughter of Levi, the meaning must be, his grand-daughter, or the child perhaps of one of his grand-daughters: who, in these writings, are commonly called daughters. And so all the objections against this marriage vanish; and the first words of this verse explain the last: “A man of the house of Levi, took to wife a daughter of Levi;” that is, one of the same house or family. But see vi. 20.

Ver. 2. The woman conceived, and bare a son.] She had one before this, viz. Aaron; who, if it is probable, was born before this persecution began, being three years older than Moses (v. 7).

When she saw him that he was a goodly child,] His goodly aspect (which seems to have been an early indication of his future greatness) is taken notice of by strangers; particularly by Justin out of Trogus, an ancient heathen historian, lib. xxxvi. cap. 7, where he saith, that besides the inheritance of his father’s knowledge (whom he takes to have been Joseph), etiam formae pulchritudo commendabat, “the gracefulness of his person recommended him to others.” Insomuch, that the whole fable of Adonis among the heathen was framed (as Huetius conjectures) out of this story of Moses. For Apollodorus...
she took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and she laid it in the flags by the river's brink.

relates (lib. iii.) how Venus, admiring the great beauty of the infant, took him away privily, without the knowledge of the gods; and, hiding him in an ark, delivered him to Proserpine, &c. (see Demonstr. Evangel. p. 499, n. 9.)

She hid him three months.] R. Simeon, in Pirke Eliezer (cap. 48), saith, she hid him in a vault under ground. But in Sota they say (in the Gemara, cap. i. sect. 38) he being hid in a secret inner room of their house, was in danger to be detected by his crying; when some of the Egyptians came into the outer room, and brought a crying child with them on purpose; so that the Talmudists would answer, if any were in the house. But there is no certainty of this.

Ver. 3. When she could not longer hide him.] Some discovery being made of him, by some means or other, by their neighbours; or the search after new-born children being now more narrow and diligent; she thought she could be no longer concealed, and therefore resolved to expose him, in the manner following.

She took for him an ark of bulrushes.] Or of reed: for Kimchi observes the Hebrew word gome signifies the lightest wood. Patricides, an Arabian writer, saith it was made of that which the ancients call papyrus: and so the LXX. and Josephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, says it was made of εἰς ἑγγύς, εἰς πολύμεαν, εἰς τις παρασκεύης, which was a future that grew particularly upon the banks of Nile, as Salmiasinus shows in Solin. p. 1002, &c.

Daubed it with slime and with pitch.] Of this word slime, see Gen. xi. 3. It is most probable that this was used within, and pitch without, to keep the water from coming into the ark. And so I find in the Vulgate. It is well observed in Ston. p. 343, that Sota called Sota (cap. i. sect. 29), where this is said to have been an ancient tradition. Only they say, as many of the rabbins do, that chemer signifies plaster, not bitumen; because the bad smell of that, they think, would have been noisome to the child. R. Solomon’s opinion is, that it was pitched both within and without, and daubed with pitch.

She laid it in the flags by the river's brink.] That it might not be carried away with the stream; but she might come in the night and suckle it. Some think that the ark, notwithstanding, was made below in the form of a boat, that if it should chance to be carried from among the flags upon the shore, it might swim in the river. For it is certain that Egyptians made ships of the forenamed reed, as we find in Pliny and Solinus, who both mention papyraceæ naves; and in Theophrastus, who mentions Παπυρικα ἀνθρωπ. speaking of papyrus: as Salmiasinus observes in his Plin. Exercit. p. 1003, 1115, 1116. Herodotus also mentions, Παπυρικα ἀνθρωπ. in his Etberpe, cap. xcvii. (see Isa. xviii. 2.)

Ver. 4. His sister stood afar off, to wit what, &c.] By her mother's order no doubt; that she might not seem to be set there, on purpose to watch him. We read of no other sister he had but Miriam (Num. xxvi. 59.), who therefore is thought to be the person.

Ver. 5. The daughter of Pharaoh.] Called Thermutis by Josephus (lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 5), but by Aratapanus, in Eusebius's Praepar. Evangel. lib. ix. cap. xxxiv., and Meris, or Merris. Which is her name, as Jacobs Capellus observes, in his Fasti Siciuli. The same Aratapanus there says, she was married to Cenephes, king of the country above Memphis; but had no child by him. Clemens Alexandrinus says the same, that she was not only a married woman, but had been long married, without being with child. τίκοι δὲ ἐκ τουτοτίων; but very desirous to have one” (Lib. i. Strom. p. 543.)

Came down to wash herself at the river.] Not for pleasure, but for purification: this being an ancient rite of religion in all nations, to cleanse themselves, by washing their bodies, after any defilement. Thus Philo seems to understand it, in his book of the Life of Moses: where, speaking of this matter, he uses the word περίπλακερν, which is proper to sacred pleasing. And in Deut. xxxii. 43, Amos, vii. 19, Psal. lxxxvi. 12, psalm., it is said, that the scorching heat of the weather (caused by an extraordinary hand of God) made her betake herself to the cool streams for her refreshment (as the tale is told in the Hebrew book, called the Life of Moses), or that the desire of children carried her hither; the waters of Nile being thought to make women fruitful. Clemens Alexandrinus seems to have put their heads together, refreshment and religion; when he saith she came hither, πενίφαν δια περίπλακερνς κολαστίων. (Lib. i. Strom. p. 343.) It is still a further fetch of Jonathan, who would persuade us that at this time God had smote the Egyptians with a burning ulcer; which made their flesh so hot, that they could not endure it, but ran to the river to cool their bodies.

And in Pirke Eliezer (cap. xlviii.), this inflammation is said to have seized on Pharaoh's daughter, whom he calls Bathia. Which is indeed the name of a daughter of one Pharaoh (1 Chron. iv. 18), but to make her the daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, (as G. Vorstius observes they do, in Shemoth Reba, and Vajra Rab), is altogether senseless. And yet it is upon that ground it is kept for her a prophecy also, and say in the title of the Talmud before mentioned, called Sota (cap. i. of the Gemara, sect. 40), that she went into the river to purge herself from the idolatry of her father's house: i. e. to become a proselyte, who was received in (following times) into the Jewish religion by baptism.

Her mother walked along by the river's side.] While she washed herself, in a private place, which, no doubt, was made by the king for that purpose. For it is not to be imagined, that she washed herself publicly in the river; but in some enclosure, whereby she was separated from the sight of company. For Zoan (or Tanis) the royal city, it is certain, lay near the river; and it is likely the king's gardens extended themselves to the very bank of it; where convenient bathing-houses were contrived for himself, and the royal family, to bathe in the river when they pleased. Patricides seems to say, that the river ran through the city, or by the side of it; for so the words are: “the ark was put in the banks of the river Nile, where the water was shallowest, in the city of Tanis, which was the metropolis of that part of the country.” And to the same purpose Elnacimus, another Arabian writer, as Hottinger observes in his Smegma Oriental (lib. i. cap. 8, p. 400).

When she saw the ark among the flags.] In such a bathing-house, as I suppose her to have now been, there were lattices through which she could see what was done in the river, though nobody could see her. And she spying an unusual vessel among the flags, commanded it to be brought to her. Patricides saith, she heard the child cry. And Chuskuni observes, it was more easy for her who was in the river to} walked along by the river's side; and when she saw the ark among the flags, she sent her maid to fetch it.

6 And when she had opened it, she saw the child: and, behold, the babe wept. And she had compassion on him, and said, This is one of the Hebrews' children.

7 Then said his sister to Pharaoh's daughter, Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee?

8 And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went and called the child's mother.

espy the ark, than for her maidens who walked above the banks.

She sent her maid to fetch it.] The Hebrew word וּמַתָּה, which we translate 'maid,' is much different from that for maidens mentioned just before; signifying one that waited immediately upon her, whom we call a handmaid: the other properly signifying only young women: who were such, perhaps, as we now call ladies of honour.

And together with him the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, as Rabbi Jose saith in Sota: which is agreeable to their opinion who make her to be now prosected, but hath no other foundation.

The babe wept.] There is nothing strange in this, that a babe (perhaps had been a good while without the breast) should weep; but it is remarkable that Pharaoh's daughter saw it and said that the Hebrew child ran down its cheeks: because this helped to move her compassion towards it, as it here follows.

She had compassion on him.] Resolved to preserve him, contrary to her father's order.

This is one of the Hebrews' children.] None else, she thought, would expose so goodly a child: and she was confirmed in her opinion, when she found he was circumcised, as the same R. Jose conjectures. And the truth is, we have no good reason to believe, that the Egyptians had, as yet, received circumcision.

Ver. 7. Then said his sister to Pharaoh's daughter, &c.] We cannot think his sister would be so imprudent to step in immediately upon the finding of the child; but was of such sorts as were wont to call the little ones in to see what they saw: but stayed for sometime (that she might not seem to know any thing of him, but what she heard them say), till they had tried other nurses (as the Hebrew doctors in Sota understand it, cap. i. sect. 43), whose breasts the child refusing to suck, she took the opportunity to ask if she might see for a nurse among the Hebrew women. Josephus saith the very same.

Ver. 8. Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go.] It is likely that Miriam addressed herself to her so discreetly, that it moved her easily to agree to her proposal. Though a singular providence of God guided this whole business.

The maid went and called the child's mother.] Whose breast the child readily taking (having been used to it) she was confirmed to be his nurse. So it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 9.] Thus by the wonderful providence of God, Jochabed had the pleasure of suckling her own child; and was also well paid for her pains.

Ver. 10. The child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter.] The Hebrew writers say, that when he was two years old, he was taken from her: which is not so likely, as that he continued with her till he was grown capable to be instructed in true religion, and to understand and remember whose true child he was; whereby he was disposed to behave himself accordingly, when he came to live at court. He became her son.] She having no child of her own, adopted him for her son, with the consent, no doubt, of Pharaoh: not to succeed in the throne, as some have fancied; but to be the heir of her private estate. And accordingly she gave him a princely education, and took care he should be instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, as St. Stephen hath remembered (Acts vii. 29), and as Philo (in the Life of Moses) saith, he would have believed, sent for the ablest masters out of Greece (as well as out of Assyria, and other eastern countries) to teach him in their learning. Which is a piece of Jewish vanity: for there was no learning among the Greeks in the days of Moses, who was ancieneter, not only than their philosophers and poets, but than most of their gods, as the same Philo saith (ib. cap. ii. sect. viii. 2-4); and that same Philo (ib. cap. vi. sect. xxii. 5) saith, καλαίσθηκός τήν ἐκαρπόν ὡς μήναν τῶν ἑλληνιστῶν ποίησε τα καὶ ποιήσε τα Μωυσῆς προεδρικός. And that learning was now in Egypt is not certain; for there is no evidence that the wisdom St. Stephen speaks of, comprehends the knowledge of so many things, as some learned men are pleased to have been in the days of Moses.

Moses] The reason of this name is given in the following words: Because I drew him out of the water.] This name seems to be derived from the Hebrew word מַשָּה, which is never used in the Bible, but for drawing out of the water (2 Sam. xxii. 17; Psalm xviii. 17; Isa. lxiii. 11). And therefore there is no need to have recourse to any other language than the original of his name; which Philo, Josephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, will have to be derived from the word מֵא, which, in the Egyptian tongue, they say, signifies water, and מָאוּס, which signifies saved. So that it is as much as saved from the waters, or preserved from drowning. It may he said, indeed, that it is not likely that she should give him a name from any other language than her own; but it is to be considered, that the word מַשָּה (from whence this name must naturally flow, and to which she herself said she had respect) might have the same signification in her language that it had in Hebrew; there being a great affinity between these two tongues (see Gen. xi. 15). Alexanderinus saith, that the name Moses he had given him at his circumcision was Joachim. Which he had, I suppose, out of some fabulous book: for, in the same place, he speaks of the name that was given him after he was translated to heaven (lib. i. Strom. p. 343).

Ver. 11.] In those days, when Moses was grown.] When he was not only arrived at man's estate, but was fully forty years old, as St. Stephen observes (Acts vii. 23), and may be gathered from this history.

That he went out unto his brethren, &c.] He had 12 And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand.

13 And when he went out the second day, a motion from God (as St. Stephen there seems to interpret it) to go, and acquaint himself with the condition of his brethren; and to own himself, more than he had done hitherto, to be one of them. The Jews tell many tales of what passed between him and Pharaoh till this time; but there is no more credit to be given to them, than to what Artapanus, a heathen historian, relates of his military exploits in a war with the Ethiopians, against whom Cenephebus sent him as general of his forces: though this is remarkable, that this name and several passages of his life (mixed with some fabulous) were known to other nations, and by them magnified and admired. As appears by what Eusebius hath extracted out of Artapanas, Epolomus, Demetrius, and other heathen writers (ib. ix. Prepar. Evang. cap. 26, 27, &c.).

[Looked on their borders:] Which he did very often (as Philo understands it: lib. i. de Vita Mosisis), and not only to observe the strength and horror of his brethren neither able to hinder their oppression, nor to help them under it. But he exhorted Pharaoh's officers to moderate their severity; and the Israelites to be patient, in hope of deliverance.

He expid an Egyptian sucking an Hebrew. The cause of it is reported (in the Life of Moses, in Hebrew, in the Targum of Aquila, and in the Latin Vulgate) that an Egyptian had broken the Hebrew's house, and bound him, and ravished his wife, and now endeavoured to murder him. But this looks like a tale: which is a little better told by the author of Sheboth Rabba, and others mentioned by Mr. Selden, (lib. ii. de Synodr. cap. i.) who say, that this Egyptian was one of the fastest sleepers, which called this man out of his bed in the night to go to work, and then took his manner upon him, and slip into it, and lie with Selomith, his wife, who took him for her husband. The plainest account and most likely, is this of Philo (in the place above mentioned), that some of Pharaoh's officers, little differing from the most furious beasts, not at all mollified, but more exasperated by entreaties; one of them, of the most violent temper, was thus affected, when he called this man out of his bed in the night to go to work, and then took his manner upon him, and either to slay him, or to beat him, or to murder him, or to subject him to servitude, or to enslave him, or to make him a slave. But this is a tale, and no such thing was ever done in such a manner. The power of Pharaoh was not so great, that he could have such persons as could have such power, or could have such authority over such persons, as the Hebrews.

One of his brethren.] All the Hebrews were his brethren; but this man was of his own tribe, and one of the children of Kohath, as the forenamed authors take it.

Ver. 12. He looked this way and that way. Round about him; that he might not run into danger himself, by delivering his brother from it.

He slew the Egyptian.] Being stirred up to it by a Divine motion; otherways he could not have justified this fact to God and his own conscience. And though Moses excused what he had done, yet his story is not to be applied to the children of Israel, that God intended to deliver them by his means; and says, Moses thought they would have so understood (Acts vii. 25). Nay, Maimonides himself gives this account of it (par. ii. cap. 45. More Nechovim), where making this the first degree of prophecy, when a man is moved and inspired by God, to some great and heroic enterprise (either for the preservation of the whole church, or the deliverance of eminent men from oppression), he reckons Moses, among others, as an instance of it, in these words: "Moses was endued with this power, when he grew up to be a man; by the impulse of which he slew the Egyptian, and checked him who ungrudingly strove with one of his brethren," &c. The Hebrews generally say that Moses did not kill this man with a sword, or any other weapon, but merely by the word of his mouth, pronouncing him dead in the name of God. Which tradition is so old, that it is mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus, (lib. i. Strom.) &c. "They that pretend to secrets, say, that he killed the Egyptian with his word alone," as Peter afterwards, in the Acts, killed Ananias and Saphira.

And hid him in the sand.] An inaccessible desert lay on the west of Egypt, as Diodorus Siculus observes; and there was another also on the east of it: so that if this had happened upon the borders, there was sand enough wherein to bury him.

Ver. 13. When he went out the second day.] Having begun to act by the Divine commission, he seems to have resolved every day to give proofs of his authority; and therefore the people might expect to be delivered by his means. And therefore went out, among them, as he had done the day before.

Behold, two men of the Hebrews strove together.] He was surprised to find two of his brethren contending one with another; when they were so grievously oppressed by the Egyptians.

Wherefore didst thou smite thy fellow?] He had no less authority to admonish and reprove his brethren, than to chastise their oppressors.

Ver. 14. Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?] It is plain by this that he acted as one that had authority; but this man questioned from whence he had it.

Intreat that I may die, as thou killedst the Egyptian? It is not likely the man thought he had any such intention, but meant only to fright Moses from meddling in his matters, by letting him know, that what he had done already was not such a secret as he thought it.

Moses feared.] He had not yet received a commission from God to act publicly as their governor, and therefore the people might not expect any charge against him (which he thought might be possibly brought), for what he had done privately. Some have troubled themselves to reconcile this with what the apostle saith, Heb. xi. 27, that "he feared not the wrath of the king;" which doth not seem to agree with what is said here, that Moses feared. But there may very well be thought to have been a fear of his flight out of Egypt, but of his last departure with the whole body of the Israelites. Though if we should allow Moses, and the apostle, to speak of the same thing, there would be no contradiction between them. For he might so fear, as to make him cautious, and consult for his safety; rather than basely either deny or confess, or ask pardon for it; unto which no fear of the wrath of the king could have moved him.

Ver. 15. Now when Pharaoh heard this thing.] Which was soon brought to his ears, as Moses suspected; and aggravated extremely by the great men of the court, as Philo represents it (lib. i. de Vita Mosisis).

He sought to slay Moses.] Not so much because he had killed the man, as because he pretended to assert the liberty of the Israelites, and to be their deliverer. Demetrius bears witness to this story, just according to what is here related, in Eusebius's Prepar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 29.

But Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh.] Wisely a judge over us! intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, Surely this thing is known.

15 Now when Pharaoh heard this thing, he sought to slay Moses. But Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Midian: and he sat down by a well.

16 Now the priest of Midian had seven daughters; and they came and drew water, and filled the troughs to water their father's flock.

17 And an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a pillar of a flame of fire burning among the thorns; and when Moses saw it, he wondered why the pillar of fire stood in a pillar of fire burning among the thorns; and when Moses saw it, he wondered why the pillar of fire stood there all the time.

18 When he came to Reuel their father, he said, How is it that ye are come so soon to day?

Had seven daughters: and they came and drew water, &c. He was but a small prince it appears by this; though it must be acknowledged it was a useful character in the times when Israel was so weak and despised. See Moses's translation of the Bible, in which he is said to have been bred in a false religion.

Ver. 17. The shepherds came and drove them away. Some rude and idle shepherds would have made use of the weakness of these princes to put them to the lowest and meanest employment, and to turn them into the hands of those, who would have made use of their pains, without any labour of their own. This looks like an argument that their father was not a prince for then, one would think, these shepherds would not have dared to contend with them. But it is as much an argument that he was not a priest for they were great men also in those days. And it seems probable to me, that these were the shepherds of some other greater prince in those countries; who made thus bold with Jethro's daughters and their servants. For one cannot think, as I said, that they alone looked after this flock, but were overseers of those that did, like Rebekah and Rachel (see Gen. xxix. 9).

But Moses stood up and helped them, &c. This was an act (as Maimonides suggests) of the same heroic spirit, mentioned before (ver. 12), which still rested on him, and moved him here, as it had done in Egypt. And thus Philo also represents him as ἑρωικόν διαμαρτυρώντας transported by such an enthusiasm when he spake to the shepherds, that it affected them from their attempt. Though it is not certain that he overcame them by persuasions, but that the whole discourse seems rather to imply that he forced them to desist: which he could not do alone, but at the head of those servants that belonged to these young women: and it is not improbable he had some servants of his own, who attended him in his flight. Certain it is that the Arabins' great employment was in protecting their flocks; and that Moses, having received the principle of this from Pharaoh, and the consuls and emperors of Rome were ambitious of the same dignity: by which means the word cohen came to signify both. Though where the place or territory of which any person was cohen is mentioned, there it always signifies him to have been prince or civil governor of that place. So S. JarchiChariss, the word cohen always denotes some Divine ministry or function, except where there is an addition of some particular principality to it, as Cohen of Midian and Cohen of On, (referring to this place, and that I now mentioned in Genesis), where it signifies a prince, though the priesthood might be joined with it. And so Artaxerxes in 19 And they said, An Egyptian delivered us out of the hand of the shepherds, and also drew water enough for us, and watered the flock.

20 And he said unto his daughters, And where is he? why is it that ye have left the man? call him, that he may eat bread.

21 And Moses was content to dwell with the man: and he gave Moses Zipporah his daughter.

22 And she bare him a son, and he called his name Gershom: for said, I have been a stranger in a strange land.

all their business, that they despatched it sooner than themselves.

Ver. 19. They said, An Egyptian] So they took Moses to be by his speech and his habit; and perhaps he told them he came out of that country.

Delivered us out of the hand of the shepherds.] This justifies what I said (ver. 17), that these shepherds belonged to some other prince in those parts, who were wont, it seems, to infest those that were weaker; and some of Moses by his extraordinary courage drove them away.

Drew water enough for us, &c.] They had drawn water before (ver. 16), which the shepherds took from them: and he now did it with greater expedition, and in great plenty.

Ver. 20. He said unto his daughters, And where is he?] This is a form of chiding, as Philo observes, or upbraiding for their ingratitude; as appears by what follows.

Why is it that ye have left the man?] Suffered him to remain in the field. Ye ought (as Philo explains it) to have invited him to my house; and if he had declined it, to have entreated and urged him to it.

Go back (as he goes on) with all speed, and pray him to come and refresh himself; and receive my thanks, which are due to him. This shows Moses had done them some considerable service.

Ver. 21. Moses was content to dwell with the man.] After some conversation with him, Reuel liked Moses so well that he offered him such terms as he accepted, and became one of his domestics.

He gave Moses Zipporah his daughter.] The Divine writers do not relate all the passages of a story (as other authors delight to do) but only the most material. Therefore we are to suppose a great many things to have preceded this: which was not accomplished presently; for when he was entered into Reuel’s house, after he had had such experience of Moses’s other virtues, as well as of his valour. Though the observation of Philo here is not to be slighted, that ἀραβὸς αἱ μεγάλες φύσεις, καὶ οὐ μοίχη χρόνον γνωρίζομαι, “Men of a great genius quickly show themselves, and are not made known by length of time.” And therefore, he thinks, that Reuel, being struck first with admiration of his godly aspect, and then of his wise discourse, immediately gave him the most beautiful of all his daughters to be his wife: not staying to inquire of anybody what he was, for his own most excellent qualities sufficiently recommended him to his affection (lib. i. de Vita Mosis, p. 611).

Ver. 22. She bare him a son, and he called his name Gershom; for he said, I have been a stranger in a strange land.

where he had nothing but what he earned by his labour. For it is not to be thought, that in a hasty flight he could bring any great matter with him into Midian. Either this son was born long after his marriage, or he did not marry till he had been long in this country: for when he left it, after forty years’ stay in it, his children were but young, as appears from iv. 20.

Ver. 23. In process of time.] After many days, (as it is in the Hebrew), i.e., years; for this king reigned a long time (see ver. 15).

The king of Egypt died.] That king from whom Moses fled, viz. Orus. After whom Eusebius makes Aceneceres to have reigned; and after him Achrois; both which died before Moses returned into Egypt.

The children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage.] Their cruel servitude did not end with the life of Orus; but the new king, who succeeded him, was so far from giving them any case, that he laid more heavy burdens upon them.

They cried.] This signifies they lay under the most grievous oppression; which grew intolerable.

Their cry came up unto God.] A cry that comes up unto God, signifies, in the holy language, the loudest and sorest cry (see Gen. xix. 13).

By reason of the bondage.] This may be referred both to their cry, and its coming up to God; who resolved speedily to free them from such insupportable burdens.

Ver. 24. And God heard their groaning, and God remembered his covenant, &c.] There are four different words in these two last verses, (viz. heard, remembered, looked upon them, had respect unto them), which, every one of them, signify God’s kind intention towards them; but seem also to me to denote that the Divine Providence determined to proceed gradually in the deliverance of the children of Israel from their cruel servitude. For when he saith, God heard their groaning, the meaning is, he favourably condescended to grant their petition; which was the first step to their deliverance. And then Remembered his covenant with Abraham, &c.] This gives the reason of it, because he was mindful of his ancient promises to their forefathers; which was a further assurance of his favour. And then he says, God looked upon the children of Israel; for when he saith, God heard their groaning, the meaning is, he favourably condescended to grant their petition; which was the first step to their deliverance. And then

God had respect unto them.] Which imports that he determined to have mercy upon them (and that includes all their blessings in it). For so this phrase to respect another signifies, as Bochart hath shown from many instances, particularly Ps. xxi. 12; Isa. lxvi. 2 (Hierozoic, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 49).
I New Moses kept the flock of Jethro his father in law, the priest of Midian: and he led the flock to the backside of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. New Moses kept the flock] So Moses was taken from the sheepfold (as David was in aftertimes) to be the ruler of God's people (Ps. lxxvii. 70), "For as a father pitieth his sons, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." Clemens Alexsnndrinus hath the same notion, and the same words (lib. 1. Strom. p. 245). As then Moses wrote this book, there had been a more wonderful, that he delivered his people from the Egyptian tyranny, by one that was contemptible, or rather abominable, to that nation, viz. a keeper of sheep.

Of Jethro] It is most likely that Reuel, mentioned in the foregoing chapter (ver. 18), was now dead; to whose Jethro had succeeded in that principality where he ruled: for it was now forty years since Moses came first into Midian. His father in law.] This shows that the seven daughters spoken of, ii. 16, were the children of Jethro, and Reuel his grandfather: unless we will say, as a great many do, that Jethro had two names. Nay, they fancy he had three, being called Hoba, they think Jethro, iv. 11, where Hoba is said to be "the father-in-law of Moses." But the word son is there to be supplied (which in other places is sometimes to be understood), he seeming to be Jethro's son, brother to Zipporah; and accordingly is said, (Numb. x. 29), "to be the son of Raguel the Midimnite," i.e. of Jethro, as many understand it. See there; Bookside of the desert. Or, as St. Jerome understands it, ad interiora deserti, "to the inner parts of the desert" (where there was better pasture than in the place where he was before), to which he was conducted by the providence of God, who intended here to reveal himself more fully to him. Mountain of God, even to Horeb.] So steep delight to feed on mountains, as Bochart observes out of Theocritus and Virgil. Whence such mountainous places are often called in Homer αἰεών, ζώοι, καταγόμενοι, μοναχαὶ, sheep-walks; they being wont to feed there, as Eustathius and Hesychius interpret it (see Hierozon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 46). And this is called the mountain of God, because, when so long, it is certain, he continued there (Exod. vii. 7). But how he employed all that time, we are not told. No doubt, in something else than mere feeding sheep. For, being learned in all the Egyptian wisdom, we may well think he both taught others, and made also great improvements himself in studying the records of that, and all other neighbouring countries; and besides, received, it is likely, Divine revelations. There are those, likewise, who think he now wrote the book of Job, to comfort the Israelites, by the example of his admirable patience, under their heavy oppressions in Egypt; and the book of Genesis disdained the eternal Word, the Second Person in the blessed Trinity. But I think it is not called simply an angel anywhere, but with some addition, as the angel of the covenant: for it would be a dangerous insinuation, that he was but a mere creature. Yet I believe he is not here to be excluded: for I take this to have been the appearance of the Shechinah; which comprehended both the Lord himself, and the angels that attended him, as his prophets, and one of whose sons now appeared so gloriously, that he showed God to be present: and accordingly we find, in the following words, that he himself spake to Moses. And thus the Lord is said to have sent his angel, when they cried to him, and brought them out of Egypt (Numb. xi. 16). Which angel is called Michael, by Menachem; and the same which they also call Goel, who redeemed Jacob from all evil (Gen. xlviii. 16).

In a flame of fire] The glory of the Lord (as the Shechinah is frequently called) appeared in a flaming manner like fire: exceeding bright, and with an amazing splendor. So it appeared, though not so bright, when the first promise was made of their deliverance (Gen. xv. 17, 19).

Out of the midst of a bush.] To show, say the Jews in Pirke Eliezer (cap. xi.), that God was present with them, in their great affliction and tribulation: which was represented by this bush of thorns or briers (for so the Hebrew word signifies, such a bush as pricks those that touch it), or, as the prophet Isaiah speaks (Isa. xlii. 5), "in all their affliction he was afflicted." And by his providence ordered things such that their affliction did not consume them, but rather multiplied and increased them; for, as it there follows, "the angel of his presence saved them." And thus Eusebius tells us (in the latter end of lib. v.,
And Moses said, I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt. And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I.

And he said, Draw not nigh hither: put Demonstr. Evangel. cap. 13, some Christians understood, αἰνεῖτες δὲ φασὶ τὴν μὲν Βαστον, τὴν τῶν Ἀ- γγείων ὄρθιον καὶ σημέρι τῶν ἄνθρωπων μουσείον, &c.

This fire also in the bush might be intended to show, that God would there meet with the Israelites, and give them his law in fire and lightning; and yet not consume them, as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is be- lieved, that they came from Egypt, delivered the law to them: which theme was called Sinai (saith the for- named author in Pirke Eliezer), from this bush; which in Hebrew is Sene, and signifies in Arabic a thorn- bush; whereas before it was called Horeb, from its dryness and barrenness, as that word imports. The bush burnt with fire, and—was not consumed. This is a wonderful wonder, as appears by Artapanus, who mentions it (in Eusebius, lib. ix. Prepar. Evangel. cap. 27), but he disguises it and misreports it; saying, it was a fire which suddenly broke forth out of the earth, and flamed, κύριον παρ' ἥλιον οὐκ ἔχει σαφήνειαν εἰς τύχην, "when there was no matter, nor any kind of wood in the place to feed it." But in the next chapter, but one, an ancient tradition reports it exactly, saying, just as Moses doth here, that "the bush burnt in a great fire, and yet remained entire and green in the flame," which he calls τεραστὸν μετοχον, "the greatest miracle." The meaning of which I have already explained, in the foregoing observation. There is a story something like this in Dion. Phusæus, Orat. xxxv, where he saith the Persians relate concerning Zoroaster, that the love of wisdom and virtue led him to a solitary life, separate from company, upon a mountain, he found it one day all in a flame, shining with celestial fire: out of the midst of which he came without any harm, and instituted certain sacri- fices to God, who then he made account appeared to him. Which Job, Hieronymus, a good while ago, endeavoured to prove was nothing else but a cor- ruption of this apparition to Moses. And Hucuus lateelly (in his Demonstr. Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 5) hath made such a laborious comparison between what is said of Moses and Zoroaster, as is sufficient to make it probable the ancient Persians derived their religion from those books of Moses.

Ver. 3. Moses said, I will now turn aside.] It seems this glorious appearance was not directly before him, but on one side of him, and some distance from him. This great sight.] This wonderful appearance; or, as Philo translates it, ἱππευτασεως, "this most stupendous and astonishing sight or vision."

He said, the bush is not burnt.] A fire, which did not burn (what it consumed or laid hold on) was very amazing. Yet the Gentiles did not think such things incredible, as appears out of Seneca in his Thyestes, where he speaks of a forest which appeared all on a flame, without fire: and out of Lucan, and divers other authors among the pagans, produced by the learned Hucuus in his Questions Almætane (lib. ii. cap. xxi. p. 19). It is plain by this, that the Lord himself was here present: his angels being but attendants, as I said, upon his Majesty (see Gen. xii. 11, 15). God called unto him out of the midst of the bush.] He now calls him God, whom just before he called Lord. Both which are sometimes put together, as comprehending all the Divine attributes. Maimonides, who makes eleven degrees of prophecy (or Divine communications to men), justly thinks this the very highest of all, and it was peculiar to Moses, to hear God himself speaking to him in a vision, when he was entirely awaked by it. Moses Moses.] He repeats his name, to excite his attention. And some take it for a token of familiarity (see Gen. xlvi. 2). This is called by Gregor. Nys- sen. (de vita Mosis, p. 172), ἦ τοι φωτος φως, &c. "a voice of that Light, or splendid light;" i.e. of the Di- vine Majesty which appeared to him. He said, Here am I.] A common expression of readiness to do there was supplied after that. For a picturesque description of this is given, in the prayer of Moses, in Hucuus Demonstr. Evangel. cap. vi. sect. 2.

The place whereon thou standest is holy ground.] It was made holy by the special presence of God, which was now there, who is most holy, and makes every thing relating unto him to be holy also. For thus the tabernacle, the temple, and the utensils thereof, with all things destined to the Divine service, were called holy.

Ver. 6. I am the God of thy father.] i.e. of Amram; who, it seems, was a very pious man. The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.] Who were so dear to him, that he made a covenant with every one of them (which is the reason he is distinctly called the God of each of them), as Maimonides observes (More Nev. par. iii. cap. 51), from Gen. xxvi. 42. And this covenant was, that he would be their God after a peculiar manner. For otherwise, he was the God of Noah, and of all the holy patriarchs before him: but he is called the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, for a pecu- liar reason, because of the promise made to these three of the blessed Seed which should spring from the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their task-masters; for I know their sorrows;

CHAPTER III.
EXODUS.

8 And I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; unto the place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites.

9 Now therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me: and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them.

10 Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt.

11 And Moses said unto God, Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?

12 And he said, Certainly I will be with thee; and this shall be a sign unto thee, that I have unto Pharaoh, &c.] Leave thy flock; for I have another more weighty business, wherein I will employ thee. For thou shalt go with my authority to Pharaoh; and command him not only to release my people out of their servitude, but to let them go also out of Egypt. He had called them by the name of his people (ver. 7), and now mentions it again, to encourage their hope that he would take care of his own.

What Pharaoh this was (it being a common name to all the Egyptian kings) is very much disputed. The common opinion is, that after Orus (in whose time Moses fled into Midian), Aeceres (or Achrestis) reigned twelve years; and after him his nephew reigned seven years, and then the eldest Centenarian, the worst of them all, to whom Moses was now sent. But Clemens Alexandriaus tells us, that Appion (a great enemy of the Jews, and who wrote against them) mentioning their going out of Egypt (in his fourth book of his History of Egypt), saith, it was in the reign of Amosis. For which he quotes Polomaus Mendesius, an Egyptian priest; and there is a book there written by him about their affairs, in which he saith, &c. 'Amison Aegyptus Basilius, Moisioii Iphimines, personam Ioulian kiit Aegiptot ieron (lib. i. Stromat. p. 390). But Tacitus calls him Bocchoris, or, as some read it, Oocoris (lib. v. Hist. cap. 3).

That thou mayest bring forth my people, &c.] From this time we are to consider God as the king of this people: not in general only, as he is Lord of the whole world; but in a proper and peculiar manner. For whatsoever authority or power of jurisdiction the kings of other nations did exercise over their subjects (as power of life and death, of making laws and leagues, &c.), the same prerogative did the Lord of heaven and earth reserve to himself, as to the children of Israel. Upon which ground, as Dr. Jackson well observes, Moses was delegated to be his ambassador to the king of Egypt; and constituted (it appears by the whole story) his deputy or viceroy over Israel.

Ver. 11.] He modestly declines the service, considering how mean a person he was, in comparison with Pharaoh; and how unable to do any thing for the Israelites. He had felt some extraordinary motion in himself, forty years ago; which he took to be an indication that God would use him as an instrument of their deliverance (see chap. ii. 11, 12), but at that time he was a far greater man than now; and had more interest at court; the princess who adopted him for her son perhaps alive; or having left him what made him very considerable. In short, he was then the son of Pharaoh's daughter; but now a poor shepherd.

Ver. 12. And he said, Certainly I will be with thee.] In answer to his objection, God bids him depend on this; that he would preserve him by a special providence from being hurt by Pharaoh. So Maimonides shows this phrase (I will be with thee) signifies in Scripture, Mat. iv. 10; Mark vi. 8, &c. (iii. cap. 18). And the confidence which God wrought in him of this, gave him courage and resolution: which is also denoted by sent thee: When thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain.

13 And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?

14 And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you.

15 And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations.
16 Go, and gather the elders of Israel together, and say unto them, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, appeared unto me, saying, I have surely visited you, and seen that which is done to you in Egypt:

17 And I have said, I will bring you up out of the affliction of Egypt unto the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, unto a land flowing with milk and honey.

18 And they shall hearken to thy voice: and thou shalt come, thou and the elders of Israel, unto the king of Egypt, and ye shall say unto him, The Lord God of the Hebrews hath met with us: and now let us go, we beseech thee, three days' journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice to the Lord our God.

19 ¶ And I am sure that the king of Egypt will not let you go, no, not by a mighty hand.

20 And I will stretch out my hand, and smite Egypt with all my wonders which I will do in the midst thereof: and after that he will let you go.

21 And I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians: and it shall come to pass, that, when ye go, ye shall not go empty:

22 But every woman shall borrow of her Israel; which God promises to incline their hearts to receive and hear.

The Lord God of the Hebrews hath met with us.] We have received a special command from the eternal God, whom we, and our forefathers, worship: who hath appeared to us.

Now let us go, we beseech thee, three days' journey into the wilderness.] They intended to go quite away; but at first are directed to demand only to go as far as Mount Sinai. Their purpose, however, was that they might not remain in Egypt, if they went the nearest way to it. For this they were humble petitioners; which is implied in those words, We beseech thee.

That we may sacrifice to the Lord our God.] When they delivered this message to Pharaoh (ver. 1), they call holding a feast in him: which was to be made upon the sacrifices that they offered. For, ver. 2 of that chapter, they speak in the same phrase which is used here.

Ver. 19. The king of Egypt will not let you go.] God understood beforehand the hardness of his heart; and that he would not yield; no, not to let them depart for three days, much less for altogether.

No, not by a mighty hand.] In the margin, But by a strong hand; i.e. by cutting off all the firstborn in the country; till which, he knew Pharaoh would be obdurate.

Ver. 20. I will stretch out my hand.] As the hand of God signifies his power, so the stretching it out seems to signify the exercising of that power in mighty deeds.

Smite Egypt with all my wonders.] The Hebrew word for wonders comes from a root, which imports something singular and not common. Such were all the plagues God sent upon Egypt, which made them the more wonderful.

After that he will let you go.] They grew so terrible at last, that he was afraid the next stroke would be upon his own person: which made him content to dismiss them.

Ver. 21. I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians.] Dispose their hearts to be kind to them, so that they should readily furnish them with anything they desired.

Ver. 22. But every woman shall borrow.] The word shall is of a doubtful meaning: for it signifying in general, to ask or to pray, one may pray another, either to give or to lend. And if the Israelites asked their neighbours to bestow such things upon them as are here mentioned, and they, out of a desire to be rid of them, or hoping speedily to recover their goods, granted their requests, no wrong was done to them. And if they borrowed them of the Egyptians, by the authority of God, whose the world is and the fulness thereof: and who doth no man any wrong when he is pleased to transfer what he enjoys unto another (see more xi. 2, xii. 35).

Of her neighbour, and of her that sojourneth in her neighbour, and of her that sojourneth in her house, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment: and ye shall put them upon your sons, and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil the Egyptians.

CHAPTER IV.

1 And Moses answered and said, But, behold, they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice: for they will say, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee.

2 And the Lord said unto him, What is that in thine hand? And he said, A rod. 3 And he said, Cast it on the ground. And he cast it on the ground, and it became a serpent; and Moses fled from before it.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. But, behold, they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice, &c. This seems directly to contradict what God had said unto him (vii. 18), "They shall hearken to thy voice." Which Maimonides interprets thus, Pharaoh saying it, that when Moses was satisfied they would believe that he told them concerning the name of God who spake to him; but not believe, without further proof, that he was sent by him (par. i. More Novochim, cap. 62). But the plainest answer is, that God did not mean they would hearken to Moses immediately; but that he would so convince them by undeniable signs and tokens, that they should give credit to him, when he said he came from God to them; such signs he now asks, and God grants, that they might believe the Lord appeared to him, and gave him commission to deliver them.

Ver. 2. What is that in thine hand? He asks this question to make way for what follows; and to move his hearers to mark the difference of this rod into three sorts of serpents; and R. Eliezer takes it to have been a flying serpent; but our Doctor Lightfoot thinks it was a crocodile; for which there is some reason. For that which is here called nachash (which most think signifies a common snake or serpent), when he threw down his staff before Pharaoh (vii. 10), that it might not be thought Moses' hand contributed anything to the change; but it might appear to be wrought by the power of God.

It became a serpent; Aretine 322232212320 320 (as Philo speaks), "immediately it was enlivened and crawled about." The word nachash comprehends all sorts of serpents; and R. Eliezer takes it to have been a flying serpent; but our Doctor Lightfoot thinks it was a crocodile; for which there is some reason. For that which is here called nachash (which most think signifies a common snake or serpent), when he threw down his staff before Pharaoh (vii. 10), is called feraun: which signifies a serpent of the largest dimensions (compare 24 xix. 21; Philo here calls it), and, as I proved upon Gen. i. 21, includes in it crocodiles, which

4 And the Lord said unto Moses, Put forth thine hand, and take it by the tail. And he put forth his hand, and caught it, and it became a rod in his hand:

5 That they may believe that the Lord God of their fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath appeared unto thee.

6 And the Lord said furthermore unto him, Ishmael calls the crooked serpent (xxvii. 1) unto whose devouring jaws Pharaoh had exposed the Hebrew infants, when he commanded them to be cast into the river Nile (i. 29), which abounded with crocodiles.

Moses fled from before it. It being a very frightful sight; enough to dismay the most courageous man on earth; as God himself describes the crocodile in the book of Job (xii. 14, 15). "His teeth are terrible round about: when he raises up himself, the mighty are afraid."

Ver. 4.] This shows Moses' faith to have been great, which overcame his fear. Most think this to have been an apt representation of the condition of the Israelites in Egypt, and of their deliverance there. R. Eliezer, in his Pirke (cap. xi.), hath hinted the best explication of it, if it have any such meaning, when he saith, As a serpent bites and kills those on whom it seizes, so did Pharaoh and his people bite and kill the Israelites: or rather he should have said, So shall the Egyptians be afflicted and tormented by the rod which Moses carries in his hand.

Ver. 5.] The meaning is, Thou shalt do thus before them, if they doubt whether I have appeared to thee (as he feared they would, ver. 1), to convince them of it.

Ver. 6. Put now thine hand into thy bosom, &c. He did not ask for a new sign, but the Lord was graciously pleased to grant him a further confirmation of his faith; or rather, of the faith of the Israelites.

He put his hand into his bosom: and when he took it out, behold, his hand was leprous as snow. It was a wonderful thing, that out of the same place should come both the disease and the cure (as we read in the next verse, that by putting his hand into his bosom again it became sound), and it was the greater wonder, because the leprosy was a disease that was very hard to be cured. R. Eliezer, in the place forenamed, doth not give so good a reason for this sign as for the former; though it is not a bad one. For he, making a question, Why should God give them a sign by an unclean thing; and not by a clean? makes this answer to it; because, as a leper is unclean, and makes others so, in like manner Pharaoh and the impure...
Egyptians had defiled the Israelites; but God showed by Moses's driving his hand out of his bosom again pure and clean, that he would deliver and purge the Israelites from the filthiness of the Egyptians. I should think rather, that the leprosy represented God's smiting the Egyptians with his plagues; and the cure of it, God's removal of those plagues at Moses's prayer. But there is no end of such conceits. Therefore I shall rather observe, that God commanded him to work "all these wonders before Pharaoh" (Ver. 21), and it is very probable, this gave occasion to the fabulous story which was invented in future ages, that Moses was a leper, and the Israelites infected with that, and other scabby diseases. For so Josephus tells us (lib. i. contra Appion) the tale was told in Manetho's history and thence descended unto others, that Moses was driven out of the country, and was leprous, see J. Justin, lib. xxxv. cap. 2; Tacitus, lib. v. Histor. cap. 3), "because he had the leprosy." Which, as Manetho, perhaps, did not maliciously devise out of his own head, so those historians from whom he borrowed his work, might have but an imperfect tradition of the truth, derived from this passage of Moses appearing with a leprous hand, which was presently noise'd about the country, without the other part, of his being immediately cured. And thus Helladius Besantius, an Egyptian writer, in his Chresto-Mathia, mentions one who said Moses was called "Aполе, because his body γογνος και σωστος το κεφαλι, was marked with white leprous spots." And to this lie he calls Philo to be a witness. The very same is affirmed by Philemeneus Hephastionis, as J. Meursius observes in his notes upon the forenamed author.

Ver. 7.] A manifest token (as Con. Pellecanus rightly takes it) that God could, with as much ease, restore his oppressed people to perfect liberty.

Ver. 8.] Here he gives the reason why he was plagued, not as a sign of his former sins, but to shew that he might overcome the iniquity which he foresaw would be in many of them.

That they will believe the voice of the latter sign.] Yield their consent to that which is plainly taught them by both these signs, viz. that God had appeared to him, and ordered him to say what he did. And he said, they would believe; because it was rational to suppose they would: though he likewise supposes, in the next verse, some might still remain incredulous; and therefore he adds another.

Ver. 9.] This sign was not wrought now, when God talked with him, as the two former were: for he was in the desert, far from the river here spoken of, and near no river at all. Therefore, in case the Israelites did not believe upon the sight of the two former signs this is ordered to be wrought, when he came into Egypt, for their conviction, by taking the water of Nilus, and turning it into blood. Which might be well looked upon as an indication that God was able to spoil that water, which was the great instrument of the fertility of that country, and make them as barren. And also put them in mind that the cry of the innocent blood of their infants, which had been drowned in that river, was come up to God.

The first sign, that they will believe the voice of the latter sign.

9 And it shall come to pass, if they will not believe also these two signs, neither hearken unto thy voice, that thou shalt take of the water of the river, and pour it upon the dry land: and the water which thou takest out of the river shall become blood upon the dry land.

10 ¶ And Moses said unto the Lord, O my 13 And he said, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send.

14 And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses, and he said, Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. And also, behold, he cometh forth to meet thee: and when he seeth thee, he will be glad in his heart.

15 And thou shalt speak unto him, and put born; and yet God's promise was to send one immediately to relieve the Israelites. Upon which errand also, if he had prayed God to send him, it would argue Moses to have been in the same error with the present Jews, that the Messiah was to be a temporal deliverer.

Ver. 14. The anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses.] The Vulgar Latin having translated the word mitte as it stands in the original, and the Vulgate in the margin (in abbreviation) as mitto, so that the word is not signified, as I take it, that he had, without further disputing, gone about his business, God would have given him a better elucidation; but that he would have made his words as powerful as if they had been pronounced with the greatest advantage. Or the meaning may be, that he should never want either words or thoughts to instruct his brother Aaron, whom God always intended to send along with him.

Ver. 13. O my Lord,] The same form of speech with that, ver. 10.

Send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send.] The Vulgar Latin having translated the word mitte as it stands in the original, and the Vulgate in the margin (in abbreviation) as mitto, so that the word is not signified, as I take it, that he had, without further disputing, gone about his business, God would have given him a better elucidation; but that he would have made his words as powerful as if they had been pronounced with the greatest advantage. Or the meaning may be, that he should never want either words or thoughts to instruct his brother Aaron, whom God always intended to send along with him.

Vol. I.—27
words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do.

16 And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people: and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God.

17 And thou shalt take this rod in thine hand, wherefore he shall do signs.

18 ¶ And Moses went and returned to Jethro his father in law, and said unto him, Let me go, I pray thee, and return unto my brethren which are in Egypt, and see whether they be yet alive. And Jethro said to Moses, Go in peace.

19 And the Lord said unto Moses in Midian, Go, return into Egypt: for all the men are dead which sought thy life.

20 And Moses took his wife and his sons, and set them upon an ass, and he returned to the land of Egypt: and Moses took the rod of God in his hand.
21 And the Lord said unto Moses, When thou goest to return into Egypt, see that thou do all those wonders before Pharaoh, which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go.

22 And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my firstborn:

Set them upon an ass; one ass thou shalt not carry with thee, with every thing necessary for thy removal; therefore the singular number (as is very usual) is put for the plural; though one ass might perhaps carry her and two children, one of which, if not the other, was very small (see Drusius, Questiones per Epistol, 86, and Simeon de Muis in his Varia Sacra); asses are vile creatures here with us, but they were not so in those countries; for the noblest persons ancients reen rode on them; as appears by a great many places of Holy Scripture, Gen. xxiii. 1; Num. xxii. 21; 2 Sam. xix. 6, and several others, which are reckoned up by Bochart (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 13, Hierozoic.).

He returned to the land of Egypt.] Set out, and began his journey to that country.

Moses took the rod of God.] So called, because God ordered him to carry it with him (ver. 17), and had appointed it to be the instrument wherewith he should work wonders.

In his hand.] As a sign of his authority. So Conr. Pellicanus hath not unfitly explained it: he returned with the rod of God, signo apostolatus et duceatus, “a sign or token of his embassy and government.”

Ver. 17. He returned to return into Egypt.]

When thou art come thither, See that thou do all those wonders before Pharaoh,] The signs mentioned in the beginning of this chapter, with which he was to begin.

Which I have put in thine hand.] Given thee power to do.

I will harden his heart, &c.] The meaning is, that God would harden his heart at the first, as soon as Moses began to work his signs: no more than he would at the first, say his firstborn, as he threatens, ver. 23. But, as at last he intended to slay his firstborn, if he would not be humbled by other plagues; so in conclusion he resolved to harden his heart, as he had preordained it himself.

There are three distinct words used in this story about this matter: the first is chazeh, the next is kashoh, and the third is coqat. Which seem to signify a gradual increase of his obstinacy, till at last it grew very grievous. For the last word (coqat) intends and expresses the sense, whether it be in good or evil qualities.

Ver. 22. Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh.] In this God begins to fulfil his promise to Moses, that he would teach him what he should say, ver. 12, and 15, 16.

Thus saith the Lord.] This shows he came to Pharaoh in the name and by the authority of God.

Israel is my son, even my firstborn.] Most dear to me, and beloved above all people (as the first-born so commonly is above the rest of the children), God having chosen and adopted them to be his peculiar people; on whom he bestowed singular privileges and blessings. Thus God speaks of David, Psalm cxlvii. 28. And Aben Ezra’s interpretation of this phrase is not improper; that “his ancestors from the beginning had been worshippers of him the true God.”

Ver. 23. I say unto thee.] I command and require thee (so the word say here signifies).

Let my son go, that he may serve me.] Not to keep my people in thy servitude any longer, but to 21
cut off the foreskin of her son, and cast it at his feet, and said, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me.
26 So he let him go: then she said, A bloody husband thou art, because of the circumcision.
27 ¶ And the Lord said to Aaron, Go into the wilderness to meet Moses. And he went,

(Ex. xvii. 25) or rather, because they were about to make a journey, when she thought it might be omitted; till they came to be settled among the Israelites. And Moses had circumcised his household. Perhaps they have been the reason to defer circumcision beyond the eighth day; motion being dangerous when the child was sore. But such a man as Moses should have trusted God to take care of his child; and not have been afraid of the consequence, if he had performed his duty. And because he followed the tender inclination of his wife, rather than a plain precept (Ex. xvii. 2, 15, &c.), he fell into this great danger. Many other accounts are given of this (for the truth is, the whole matter is very obscure), but I see none more probable, than what I have mentioned.

Cast it at his feet;] It is uncertain at whose feet she cast it; whether at her husband's or the child's, or the angel's. The first seems most probable; if the next words be spoken to Moses, as they seem to me to be.

Surely a bloody husband art thou to me.] If the foregoing interpretation be true, these are not the words of an angry woman; but spoken with great affection; signifying that she had espoused him again; having saved his life by the blood of her son. Our commentator, Mr. Mede, indeed (Discourse xiv.), carriest the sense quite another way: because a husband, he saith, is never called chattan after the marriage solemnity was over. Which, if it be true, makes nothing against what I have said; because she looked upon herself as a second time espoused (or married) to him by this act, which had restored him to her, when his life was in danger. It must be granted that the word chattan doth not signify only a spouse, but sometimes a son-in-law: but why Zipparah should call her own child by this name, I do not see. Yet so Mr. Mede understands it; and adds, that the rabbins tell us it was the custom of the Hebrew women to call their children, when they were circumcised, by the name of chattan, &c. (as if they meant that it was now espoused unto God. And indeed, Aben Ezra saith so: but I cannot find that this was an ancient notion among them. If it were, its interpretation might be the more easily embraced, which is this: that these were a solemn form of words used at circumcision; signifying as much as, I pronounce thee to be a member of the church by circumcision. Thus Val. Schindler also expounds it (in his Lexic. Pentaglot, p. 677), a child was called chattan upon the day of his circumcision, "because then he was first joined to the people of God, and as it were espoused unto God." And he thinks the Targum countenances this sense, when it thus expounds these words, "by this blood of circumcision a spouse is given to us." Which may as well be understood of Moses being given to her, as of the child: for he was, as I said, restored to her and to his family, upon the circumcision of the child: so it follows in the next verse. They that have mind to see the sense of an eminent writer of our church concerning this passage, may consult Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, book v. In the latter end of the second section, where he thus far agrees with me, that these words were spoken "out of the flowing of abundance of commiseration and love," with her hands laid under his feet. For and met him in the mount of God, and kissed him.

28 And Moses told Aaron all the words of the Lord which had sent him, and all the signs which he had commanded him.

29 ¶ And Moses and Aaron went and gathered together all the elders of the children of Israel:

so he thinks these words, she cast it at his feet, import.

Ver. 26. So he let him go.] i.e. The angel no longer threatened Moses with death; but his wife, to her great joy, saw him restored to her in safety. From which in aftertimes sprang the Gen. 33.13-20, which were so famous among the Greeks and Egyptians, in the feasts of Bachiuns and Osiris; whose stories Huetius hath lately shown were framed out of this of Moses. From whence also, as he probably conjectures, they used remedies for diseases, in forma sacramentis, which they hang, as amulets, about their children's necks (Demonstrat. Evang. propos. iv. cap. iv. n. 3).

Then she said, or, when she said. A bloody husband thou art, &c.] As soon as Zipparah had circumcised the child, and thrown the foreskin at her husband's feet, and Moses was saved from his danger. Or (according to our translation), as soon as her husband was safe, she repeated the foregoing words, saying, I have redeemed thy life, by circumcision thy son. They that make these words to have been spoken in a rage, because she was forced to do what she did, suppose her to have had little kindness for her husband; and as little regard to circumcision. I should rather translate the words, so she let him go; i.e. let Moses go to Egypt; and went back herself to her father; only repeating these words before she went, Remember me, how I have saved thy life, and made thee my husband again (when death was at hand) by the blood of thy son, whom I have circumcised. There is only this exception to it, that the Hebrew word for let him go is of the masculine gender; which is of no great weight, because it is usual in this language when they speak of females (as I observed on i. 21), and it is certain she returned to her father; whether in this manner nobody can certainly determine. For we are not told anywhere, upon what occasion she went back to Jethro; unless it be a word generally used, and she did (viii. 9), together with her children. But it is very probable, that she fearing some other danger, into which she and her children might fall by the way, or in Egypt, might desire Moses to send her home again, till he had finished the work he went about; until which he consented.

Ver. 27. The Lord said to Aaron.] In Egypt, I suppose, he received this order from God; but we do not know how; whether by an apparition of the Divine Majesty to him, or in a dream, or otherwise.

Go into the wilderness to meet Moses.] The wilderness was a wide place; therefore he directed him, no doubt, into what part he should go.

He went and met him in the mount of God.] He went almost to Midian: that he might have the more time to hear what Moses' commission was, before they came to Egypt.

Ver. 28. Moses told Aaron all the words of the Lord, &c.] Mentioned iii. 6, 8, &c. and in this chapter, 18-15. &c. See ver. 2, 3, &c., which he told to confirm his belief, that God had spoken those words to him.

Ver. 29. Moses and Aaron went] Came into Egypt.
CHAPTER V.

CHAPTER V.

1 And afterward Moses and Aaron went in, and told Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness.

2 And Pharaoh said, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go.

3 And they said, The God of the Hebrews hath met with us: let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the desert, and sacrifice unto the Lord our God;

4 lest he fall upon us with pestilence, or with the sword. 5 And he did so, as Pharaoh had permitted; and the men of Israel went up, as Pharaoh had permitted, without any grief.

6 And the officers of Pharaoh, which were overseers of the children of Israel, and their captains, sought to make the children of Israel serve; but they would not serve.

7 And the officers of Pharaoh, of his servants, of his officers, and of all the Egyptians, demanded of the children of Israel, to serve them.

8 And the children of Israel said, We will not serve the Lord our God, and will not serve Pharaoh; therefore we will die.

9 And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people; and took such as were slow of heart, and killed them with the sword. And there was a slaughter among the children of Israel.

10 And Moses spake unto the Lord, saying, Lord, why hast thou brought misfortune upon this people? for there is no wheat, neither is there bread in all the coasts of Egypt.

11 And the Lord said unto Moses, Go unto Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness.

12 And he shall let them go, after that I shall smite all the land of Egypt with that plagues which I have said unto thee.

13 And Moses said unto the Lord, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The Lord God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?

14 And God spake unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you. And he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers hath sent me unto you, and he said, I will smite all the first-born in Egypt, both man and beast; and the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I smite all the land of Egypt.

15 And Moses said unto the Lord, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The Lord God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?

16 And God said unto Moses, I am that I am: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you. And he said, I will smite all the first-born in Egypt, both man and beast; and the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I smite all the land of Egypt.

17 And they took their journey from Succoth, and pitched in Pisgah, which is over against Jericho.

18 And they journeyed from the wilderness of Sin, which is eastward of Zoan, and they came to the wilderness of Paran, which is before Zoan, to the wilderness of Paran.

19 And they journeyed from the wilderness of Paran, and pitched in Oboth. 20 And they journeyed from Oboth, and pitched in Iloph. 21 And they journeyed from Iloph, and pitched in Tahath.

22 And they journeyed from Tahath, and pitched in Terah. 23 And they journeyed from Terah, and pitched in Mibzar.

24 And they journeyed from Mibzar, and pitched in Skion. 25 And they journeyed from Skion, and pitched in Balak.

26 And they journeyed from Balak, and pitched in Pisgah, over against Jericho.

27 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Gather together all the elders of Israel, and let them come forward, and hear all that I command you.

28 And let them teach their children wisdom, and let their children teach their children, and their children teach their children, that they may observe all the words of this law, and that they may do them, and that the land, whither ye go to possess it, may not be polluted; for the land is holy.

29 And be ye sure that ye obey not every word which they tell you: for they speak to you not for your good, but for their own profit. And the Lord hath heard me your voices, and the Lord will not suffer the Egyptians to come away.

30 And Moses spake all the words which the Lord had spoken unto Moses, and did the signs in the sight of the people.

31 And the people believed: and when they Gathered together all the elders of the children of Israel.] The chief persons in every tribe, who bore a great sway among them (see iii. 16).

Ver. 30. Aaron spake all the words which the Lord had spoken unto Moses.] According to what God had promised (ver. 15, 16).

Did the signs.] The signs are done by Moses, as the words were spoken by Aaron (ver. 17).

In the sight of the people.] Who came along with the elders.

32 And the Lord came down in the pillar of cloud, and stood in the door of the tabernacle.

33 And the Lord said unto Moses, I have seen the affliction of my people which is in Egypt: and I have heard their cry, and I have considered their mourning, and am come down to deliver them out of the hand of Pharaoh, that I may bring them up out of the land of Egypt into a good land and a broad, a land flows with milk and honey.

34 And now the time has come that I should send my servant Moses to thee, and Aaron, and Aaron his brother, and they shall speak unto Pharaoh, that he may send the children of Israel out of his land.

35 And Moses and Aaron did so; as the Lord had commanded; they did, and the children of Israel did so.
EXODUS.

the Lord our God; lest he fall upon us with pestilence, or with the sword.

4 And the king of Egypt said unto them, Wherefore do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works? get ye unto your burdens.

5 And Pharaoh said, Behold, the people of the land now are many, and ye make them rest from their burdens.

6 And Pharaoh commanded the same day the taskmasters of the people, and their officers, saying,

7 Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves.

8 And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish ought thereof: for they be Idile; therefore they cry, saying, Let us go and sacrifice to our God.

9 Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labour therein; and let them not regard vain words.

10 ¶ And the taskmasters of the people went out, and their officers, and they spake to the people, saying, Thus saith Pharaoh, I will not give you straw.

11 Go ye, get you straw where ye can find it; yet not ought of your work shall be diminished.

12 So the people were scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt to gather stubble instead of straw.

13 And the taskmasters hasted them, saying, Fulfil your works, your daily tasks, as when there was straw.

14 And the officers of the children of Israel,

(who think they were not baked in a kiln) imagine it served only to cover them; that they might not be cracked by the violent heat of the sun, wherein they were baked. For so Vitruvius tells us, that the best bricks were made in the spring and in the autumn, ut uno tenore siccissant, "that they might dry by an equal heat." they that were made at the solstice being suddenly crusted over by the sun, and left too moist within (lib. ii. de Architect. cap. 3).

Ver. 8. The tale of the bricks, &c.] It appears from ver. 13, 14, that there was a certain quantity exacted from them every day.

For they be idle:] They have not work enough to employ their thoughts; which makes their mind wander after other things.

Ver. 9. Let there more work be laid upon the men.] Or, make it heavy upon them (as it is in the margin).

That they may labour therein;] Have no time to think of any thing else.

Let them not regard vain words.] So he calls the message of Moses and Aaron; who, he pretends, were mere deceivers, and fed their hope with lies (for so it is in the Hebrew, words of falsehood, or lying words), or, at least, he resolved their words should not prove true; for he would not let the people go.

Ver. 10.] The taskmasters with their officers proclaimed the king's order, that everybody might take notice of it.

Ver. 11. Get you straw where ye can find it, &c.] A heavy sentence; importing, that whether they could find any or no, no abatement would be made of the number of bricks that was expected from them. This was to drive them to desperation, by demanding things impossible. And added (as Conradus Pellicanus observes) to the burdens on their bodies, very sore anguish of mind. For it tempted them to doubt of the goodness of their God, who they thought had sent a deliverer to them (iv. 31), by whom they were now reduced into a more miserable condition.

Ver. 12.] Some part of them were forced to go and pick up straw, or, for want of it, stubble (and sometimes travel a great way for it), while the rest were working in the brick-kilns without their help, which they were wont to have; whereby they were disabled from making so many bricks as formerly they had done.

Ver. 13. The taskmasters hasted them.] Quickened them in their work; when they saw they were likely to fall short of their wonted task.

Ver. 14.] And as it appears (as I said ver. 6), that these officers were Israelites. And from this place Bonavent. Bertram concludes (lib. de Rep. Hebr. cap. iv.), that there was a civil government among the Is-which Pharaoh's taskmasters had set over them, were beaten, and demanded, Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick both yesterday and to day, as heretofore?

15 ¶ Then the officers of the children of Israel came and cried unto Pharaoh, saying, Wherefore dealst thou thus with thy servants?

16 There is no straw given unto thy servants, and they say to us, Make brick: and, behold, thy servants are beaten; but the fault is in thine own people.

17 But he said, Ye are idle, ye are idle: therefore ye say, Let us go and do sacrifice to the Lord.

18 Go therefore now, and work; for there shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks.

19 And the officers of the children of Israel raileth all the time they were in Egypt: and that these shoterim (as they are called in Hebrew) were under the greatest note among the elders; who executed all their decrees; and consequently of high authority among the people. For which reason Pharaoh's taskmasters chose them, to oversee and direct the labours of their brethren. But Mr. Selden (ib. 1.de Synedr. cap. 15), hath made it appear, that there was no such judicature among them at this time; and when there was, this was the name of those who executed the sentence of the judges; being like to our apparitors, and such-like under officers (see p. 621, &c.).

Were beaten,] With sticks; or scourged with rods. Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick both yesterday, &c.] They punished the officers, as if they had been negligent in not press ing the people to their duty. Yet it seems they forbore them one day, to see if they would mend their fault the next.

Ver. 15.] They had some hope this oppression might proceed from the taskmasters, and not from the king himself: and therefore they represented their case to him, and petitioned for relief. It is said, indeed (ver. 6), that Pharaoh laid this command both upon the taskmasters and their officers; but it is not unlikely that he gave it immediately only to the taskmasters, who were his own ministers, and by them to the officers.

Ver. 16.] This shows that they thought such inhuman usage was the effect of the taskmasters' cruelty.

Ver. 17.] He could not make them understand it was by his decree, and not his servants' pleasure, that they were thus used. And which was worse, they saw he was fixed in his resolution: being void of all pity; and mocking at their complaints. For nothing could be more sarcastical, than to tell them they were idle when they sunk under their burdens.

Ver. 18. Go therefore now, and work, &c.] Do not spend your time in making complaints to me; but return immediately to your labours, and continue at them till my commands be executed: and expect no mitigation.

Ver. 19.] By this answer they found themselves reduced to such straits, that now they despaired of all relief; the king himself being set against them.

Ver. 20.] They had placed themselves there on purpose, to hear what success the officers had in their petition.

Ver. 21. The Lord look upon you, and judge.] This seems to be an imprecation: or, at least, the officers bid Moses and Aaron expect that God would take them to task (as we speak) for bringing his people into so bad a case.

Ye have made our savour to be abhorred.] Made us odious; as this phrase signifies, Gen. xxxiv. 30.

To put a sword in their hand to slay us.] Who may take an occasion from hence, and make this a pretext for the destroying our whole nation.

Ver. 22. Moses returned unto the Lord,] This plainly intimates, that the Lord had appeared to Moses since he came to Egypt: as he did at Mount Horeb; and that he appeared in some settled place, where he might upon all occasions resort to him.

And said, Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil entreated this people? &c.] It was to no purpose to answer the officers who complained with him; for they were too much exasperated, and thereby prejudiced against any thing he could say. And therefore he chose rather to represent to God the complaints they had made to him: that he might be directed what satisfaction to give them. For he was not able of himself to give an account, why the Lord should suffer their condition to grow worse rather than better, since he delivered his message to Pharaoh: no, nor why he should send him on an embassy which was not at all regarded.

Ver. 23.] He might have remembered that God told him more than once, that Pharaoh would not obey him at first (iii. 19, iv. 21). But the bitter reflections which the officers of the children of Israel made upon his conduct, had so disturbed his mind, that he forgot himself so far as to ask the indecent questions mentioned in the foregoing verse, and complains here that God had done nothing to fulfill his promise of deliverance to his people.
CHAPTER VI.

1 God reneweth his promise by his name JEHOVAH.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Moses, Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharaoh: for with a strong hand shall he let them go, and with a strong hand shall he drive them out of his land.

And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am the Lord:

And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them.

And I have also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were strangers.

And I have also heard the groaning of the Abraham: who when he went by God's direction out of his own country into Canaan, the Lord appeared to him there, and there he built an altar to the Lord, and he called the name of the Lord Jehovah.

Then I said, I am Jehovah; and I called thee by thy name, even before thou camest forth out of Egypt.

The like expression we find in the prophet Isaiah, as Theodoric Hackspan hath observed (Disput. de Carthaginis Divinis, n. 15), Isa. li. 4, wherein the Lord saith, "My name is blasphemed every day continually: therefore my people shall know my name; therefore they shall know in that day that I am he that doth speak; behold, it is I."

Which cannot signify that the Jews did not then know that this was one of the names of God; but that all who blasphemed him should be confuted by sensible proofs which he would give, of his own unchangeable resolution to fulfil his promises, in bringing them out of Babylon; which fully demonstrated that he was Jehovah.

Which word, some think, includes in it, not only his eternal existence and immutable truth, but his all-sufficient power, for which he was the Lord (ver. 6). The last of which was now made known, so as it had never before been to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; for Moses was the first that wrought miracles and prodigies: God was known to the fathers, by visions and dreams, but not by signs and wonders. Moses made him known by these unto the world. And therefore upon the whole Maimonides well concludes from this place, that the prophetical spirit on Moses was more excellent than that which had been upon any before him (More Nev. par. ii. cap. 35).

Ver. 4. And I have also, &c.] The Hebrew word wegom may be better translated although. Which makes a clear connection of this verse with the former; and explains the meaning of the name Jehovah. By which he was known from so many times, although he had made a covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give them the land of Canaan; and often ratified, confirmed (and established as he here speaks), this covenant (Gen. xvi. 7, 8, xxvi. 3, 4, &c.) But now he not only declares himself mindful of that covenant (ver. 5), but, because he could disavow it, from the Egyptian bondage, and that with a miraculous power. Which should make them know more of him than their fathers did (ver 7), both by his delivering them out of Egypt, and by children of Israel, whom the Egyptians keep in bondage; and I have remembered my covenant.

6 Wherefore say unto the children of Israel, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you with a stretched out arm, and with great judgments:

7 And I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God: and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, which bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians:

bringing them into the land which he swore he would give to their fathers (ver. 8).

This is the sense of these five verses.

The land of their pilgrimage, &c.] So it is often called, when he speaks to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 8), and so Isaac calls it (xxxvii. 4), and Jacob also (xxxvii. 1). And so it might be called, not only with respect to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but also to their posterity: because of the near union that is between fathers and children. Thus God is said to have given to these three patriarchs (as the famous primate Usher observes) the land of Canaan for an inheritance (Ps. lix., which is not fulfilled to them, but to their posterity. And as the possession of posterity is attributed to the fathers, so, upon the same ground, he thinks, the peregrination of the fathers is attributed here to the children (Chronol. Sacra, cap. viii.).

Ver. 5. And I have also.] This verse also begins with the same particle segan; and must be translated although, if the former interpretation be right. Or else those words, by my name Jehovah was I not known to them, must come in by a parenthesis: and both these verses be connected with what goes before, appeared unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, to whom he so appeared, as to make a covenant with them, which he perfectly remembered, and having taken notice to what condition they were reduced, was now come to deliver them.

Ver. 6. Say—I am the Lord.] Tell them, I will now show that I am what this name importing (ver. 2), I will bring you out from under the burdens] The heathen represented, as it were, the weakness of the children of Israel: and they are called, in the ancient versions, slaves, and that, and are also under such inexpressible loads, as made it impossible for them to deliver themselves: but it was to be the sole work of God.

I will redeem you with a stretched out arm.] This word redeem implies their servitude; from which he rescued them by a power superior to Pharaoh's, or any power on earth, as appears by the following story.

With great judgments.] When God first promised this deliverance, which Moses was about to effect, he told Abraham, "I will judge that nation," which oppressed them (Gen. xv. 14). That is, punish them (which is one office of a judge) according to their deservings. This now he intended to perform (and thereby he judged himself to be Jehovah), and that in a most terrible manner; by inflicting not only very grievous, but many plagues upon them. For Greg. Nyssen observes, that all the elements, the earth, the water, the fire, and the air, were all moved against the Egyptians, oivos τε σπαζοντο ἑποξίζοντο, "as an obedient army" (lib. de Vitis Mosis, p. 173). Thus justice, and the office of a judge, are used in many places for punishing (Ps. ix. 17; Prov. xix. 29; 1 Chron. xx. 19).

Vol. I.—98

8 And I will bring you in unto the land, concerning the which I did swear to give it to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob; and I will give it you for an heritage: I am the Lord.

9 And Moses spake so unto the children of Israel: but they hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage.

10 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 11 Go in, speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, that he let the children of Israel go out of his land.

12 And Moses spake before the Lord, saying,

Ver. 7. I will take you to me for a people,] By the right of redemption before mentioned. I will be to you a God.] He was so before: but now after a peculiar manner.

Ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, &c.] By seeing my promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob fulfilled.

Ver. 8.] Two things were promised to Abraham in that vision mentioned Gen. xv. First, he would deliver his seed from this nation which oppressed them (ver. 14). And, secondly, that he would bring them into the land of Canaan (ver. 17). Both these he now declares should be fulfilled (the former in the foregoing verse, and the latter in this), and thereby they should be convinced that he was indeed Jehovah, true and constant to his word.

I am the Lord.] He concludes as he began: having said this twice before (ver. 2, 6).

Ver. 9. Moses spake so unto the children of Israel.] He delivered this message, as he was commanded: which, one would have expected, should have raised their drooping spirits. But quite contrary.

They hearkened not unto Moses.] They did not believe, or receive what he said (so Maimon. More Nev. par. 1. cap. 45), or it made no impression upon them.

The reason follows.

For anguish of spirit.] In the Hebrew, because of shortness of breath. They were so extremely oppress'd, that they could scarce fetch their breath, as we speak. Or, had no heart so much as to think of deliverance, much less hope for it; but sunk unto their burdens.

For cruel bondage.] Common slaves, though they cannot deliver themselves, rejoice to hear the good news that they are likely to be delivered by those who have power and will to do it. But in this slavery they were used so cruelly, that they were quite dejected and incapable of any comfort. So the LXX. translate the foregoing words (for anguish of spirit), ις γαρ χερι, out of fit faint-heartedness: they being quite dispirited.

Ver. 10. The Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] It is likely that Moses, finding the Israelites so regardless of what he said, went to the usual place, where he was wont to have recourse to the Divine Majesty (see ver. 22), to receive new directions what to do.

Ver. 11.] The Lord bids him go again to Pharaoh, and renew the demand he made before (ver. 1).

Ver. 12. Moses spake before the Lord.] This phrase, ἐπεί οὖν Παραών, "before the Lord," plainly denotes that God appeared to him in a visible majesty, as I observed above, ver. 1, and see xi. 4.

The children of Israel have not hearkened unto me; how shall Pharaoh hear me?] Their faint-heartedness disheartened Moses also; and made him unwilling to renew his address to Pharaoh. And there seems to be a good reason in what he says; if the children of Israel, whose interest it was to give ear to him, did not be-Behold, the children of Israel have not hearkened unto me; how then shall Pharaoh hear me, who am of uncircumcised lips?

13 And the Lorp spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, and gave them a charge unto the children of Israel, and unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, to bring the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt.

14 ¶ These be the heads of their fathers' houses: The sons of Reuben the firstborn of Israel; Hanoch, and Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi: these be the families of Reuben.

15 And the sons of Simeon; Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar, and Shaul the son of a Canaanitish woman: these are the families of Simeon.

16 ¶ And these are the names of the sons of Levi according to their generations; Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari: and the years of the life of Levi were an hundred thirty and seven years.

17 The sons of Gershon; Libni, and Shimi, according to their families.

18 And the sons of Kohath; Amram, and Izhar, and Hebron, and Uzziel: and the years of the life of Kohath were an hundred thirty and three years.

19 And the sons of Merari; Mahali and Mushi: these are the families of Levi according to their generations.

20 And Amram took him Jochebed his father's sister to wife; and she bare him Aaron and Moses: and the years of the life of Amram were an hundred and thirty and seven years.
CHAPTER L.

21 And the sons of Izhar; Korah, and Nepheg, and Zithri.

22 And the sons of Uzziel; Mishael, and Elzaphan, and Zithri.

23 And Aaron took him Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab, sister of Naashon, to wife; and she bare him Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

24 And the sons of Korah; Assir, and Elkanah, and Abiasaph: these are the families of the Korhites.

Word dod signifies an uncle: and therefore some would have the word dodah, in this place, to signify only his uncle's daughter. So the Vulgar and the LXX. translate it. But Moses tells us so expressly that she was "born to Levi in Egypt" (Num. xxvi. 59), that it unavoidably follows she was sister to Amram's father. Which the forenamed great prince maintains (cap. 8, of the same book) against Scaliger and Peiresius, who would have Jochebed called Levi's daughter, only as Ephraim and Manasseh are called Jacob's sons. Which would make a very easy sense (as I observed, i. 1), if it would consist with those words, "which father and mother (for that must be understood) bare to Levi?" which show she was his daughter. And thus R. Solomon understood it; and so did Tostatus and Cajetan, and divers others, whom our Usher there mentions. And see our most learned Selden (lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. ix. p. 384), Which shows how sincere a writer Moses was, who doth not stick to relate what mother (for he thought in after ages (when the law against such marriages was enacted), a blot to his family. And it is observable, that he doth not say one syllable in commendation of his parents; though their faith deserved the greatest praise, as the apostle to the Hebrews shows (xi. 23). But Moses (as Jac. Capellus truly observes) was "wont to pleasure" in his own glory, but for the service of God and of his church. She bare him Aaron and Moses. This shows, that God exactly fulfilled his promise of delivering the Israelites out of servitude in the fourth generation (Gen. xv. 16, i.e. the fourth from their descent into Egypt), for Moses was the fourth from Levi: being his great-grandson.

These are the heads of the life of Aaron were an hundred and thirty and seven years.] The same very age with his grandfather Levi (ver. 16).

Ver. 21. The sons of Izhar; Korah, &c.] He gives an account of his uncle's sons, but saith not one word here of his own. Who were not to succeed him in his place and dignity, nor to be advanced to any other office. Such was his humility and generous love to his country, that he only sought the good of that; but nothing for his own family.

Ver. 22. The sons of Uzziel.] This was another of his uncles; whose posternity he mentions, that it might be seen how God blessed the tribe of Levi: notwithstanding the sin he had committed at Shechem, and the punishment his father denounced against him for it (Gen. xliii.). He saith nothing of Hebron, another of his father's brothers; because, perhaps, he died childless: or his children had no issue.

Ver. 23. Aaron took him Elisheba—to wife. Though he says nothing here of himself, yet he relates particularly what concerned Aaron; who, he shows, was matched into an honourable family, with a sister of the prince of the tribe of Judah, chief commander of their host when they were come out of Egypt (Num. i. 7, ii. 3). The knowledge of this, he thought, might breed in posterity a greater reverence to the priesthood; which was settled in the family of Aaron.

25 And Eleazar Aaron's son took him one of the daughters of Putiel to wife; and she bare him Phinehas: these are the heads of the fathers of the Levites according to their families.

Ver. 26. These are that Aaron and Moses, to whom the Lord said, Bring out the children of Israel from the land of Egypt according to their armies. These are they which spake to Pharaoh, requiring him to let Israel go out of Egypt (v. 1, 2, &c. vi. 13).

These are that Moses and Aaron.] He repeats it again, that all generations might mark who were the Lord spake unto Moses in the land of Egypt,

29 That the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, I am the Lord; speak thou unto Pharaoh king of Egypt all that I say unto thee.

30 And Moses said before the Lord, Behold, I am of uncircumcised lips, and how shall Pharaoh hearken unto me?

men that God employed, in this great and hazardous work of demanding the liberty of the children of Israel from Pharaoh's servitude; and effecting it in such manner, as is afterward related in this book. There have been critical wits, who made this an argument, that Moses was not the author of these books; because it is not likely, they imagine, he would write thus of himself. But nobody but these critics can see an absurdity in it, that he and his brother, being the instruments in God's hand of effecting such wonderful things, should not let posterity be ignorant of it; but take care not only to record it, but to set a special note upon it, that none might rob them of the honour God bestowed on them; and He (by whose direction this was written) might have the glory of working such mighty things, by such inept instruments, as Moses often acknowledges himself to have. Nor is this more than Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel say concerning themselves; and St. John may as well be denied to be the author of the gospel which bears his name, because he saith, "This is the disciple that testifieth these things," &c. (xxi. 24). And besides this, the history of succeeding ages shows us the necessity of this, which Moses hath said of himself. For if he had not told us what his progeny was, we see by what we read in Justin and Corn. Tacitus, and such like authors, what false accounts we should have of him: for Justin, from Trogus Pompeius, makes him (as I observed before) the son of Joseph. Nay, the Jewish writers have been so fabulous, that we should have learnt as little truth from them, if Moses had not told it us himself.

Ver. 29.] Having finished the account he thought fit to give of himself and of his brother, whom God was pleased to employ in this great embassy, he resumes the relation of it, which he broke off at the end of ver. 13.

Ver. 29.] This and the next verse seem to be a recapitulation of what God said in his last appearances to him (ver. 2, 10, &c.), and of his desire to be excused from the employment on which he was sent; urged by two arguments, ver. 12, 13, where they are related something more largely than they are here, in the last verse of this chapter. In which he mentions them again; that there might be a clearer connection with what God further added for his encouragement, when he gave him the forenamed charge (ver. 13), to deliver a new message to Pharaoh.

Ver. 30. Moses said before the Lord,] We read the very same (ver. 12), which makes me think this is not a new objection: but merely a recital of what he had objected there. See what I have said on the foregoing verse. Behold, I am of uncircumcised lips,] See ver. 12.

CHAPTER VII.

1 Moses is encouraged to go to Pharaoh. 7 His age. 13 Pharaoh's heart is hardened. 14 God's message to Pharaoh. 19 The river is turned into blood.

1 And the Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet.

2 Thou shalt speak all that I command thee: and Aaron thy brother shall speak unto Pharaoh, that he send the children of Israel out of his land.

3 And I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and he will follow after them; but he will let none of the children of Israel go out of the land.

Which seems to signify that the word nabi (which Moses here uses for a prophet) was but newly come into use, in Samuel's days. But this is very far from Samuel's meaning; whose plain sense is this, that he who foretold things to come, or discovered secrets, was ancyenly called a seer, not a prophet. Which signified heretofore only an interpreter of the Divine will: but now they began, in Samuel's days, to apply the word nabi (or prophet) to those who could reveal any secret, or foresee things future. Which had not been the use of the word formerly: but it signified, as I said, one that was familiar with God, and knew his mind, and delivered it to others; as I observed upon Gen. xx. 7, where God himself calls Abraham a prophet; as he here calls Aaron. And what holy writer would dare to alter the word which God himself used? Which is far more proper also to this purpose than either rosh or choresh (which these men fancy were the words in use in Moses's time, not nabi); for they do not answer the intention of God in this speech concerning Aaron. Who was not to seer, and divine, or to receive revelations from God, but to be a mouth to Moses; to utter what God revealed to him, not to Aaron. Which is the original signification of the word nabi; there being no derivation of it so natural that I can find as that of R. Solomon's, from the word nub, which signifies to utter, or to bring forth (Prov. x. 31).
multiply my signs and my wonders in the land of Egypt.

4 But Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that I may lay my hand upon Egypt, and bring forth mine armies, and my people the children of Israel, out of the land of Egypt by great judgments.

5 And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I stretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel from among them.

6 And Moses and Aaron did as the Lord commanded them, so did they.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt speak all that I command thee, &c.] This explains the latter end of the former verse: that Moses should deliver God's mind to Aaron; and Aaron should deliver it to Pharaoh: requiring him from God to dismiss the children of Israel out of his country.

Ver. 3. I will harden Pharaoh's heart. Or, but I will harden, &c., which Ahenarion translates, I will permit his heart to be hardened. Though there is no need of it: for God here only foretells what Pharaoh would force him to do (see iv. 21), after several signs and wonders had been done to Pharaoh and to others, to bring forward his own purpose of hardening his heart. For he was so stupid, and hardened his heart so often (viii. 15, 32), that in conclusion God hardened him, by withholding all good motions from him. And therefore, the first time that Jehovah is said to harden his heart, there is a special remembrance of this that the Lord had foretold it (ix. 12).

That I may lay my hand upon Egypt.] Sustain all their firstborn: upon which immediately followed their march out of Egypt.

Bring forth mine armies.] All the tribes of the children of Israel: which were so multiplied, that every one of them singly made an army (see vi. 26).

By great judgments.] That is, grievous plagues: which was the occasion of the number of the children of Israel, that was to be freed from the Egyptians.

And thereby made good his word, that Moses should be a god to Pharaoh (ver. 1), that is, a judge, as the word Ebrhoim sometimes signifies (see vi. 6).

Ver. 5. The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord.] Be convinced, or made sensible that none can withstand me.

When I stretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, &c.] This was most especially fulfilled, when he smote their first-born, which made them look upon themselves as lost men, if they continued disobedient (xii. 33).

Ver. 6. He repeats what he saith of their obedience to God's commands, because, from this time forward, they no longer disputed, nor made any objection; but more especially about their business.

Ver. 7. Moses was fourscore years old, &c.] The Israelites were under a heavy persecution when Moses was born; and God exercised their patience (it appears by this) a very long time, that their deliverance might be for ever remembered with the greatest thankfulness and obedience. Such grave persons as these were fittest to be employed as God's commissioners in this affair: for they could not well be thought to be hot-headed men, who thrust themselves forward into this embassy without a warrant. So some of the Jews very judiciously have observed, that God made choice of aged men to work all his miracles before Pharaoh, and to receive his revelations, because they were not apt to be carried away with men's foolish imaginations, fancy, at those years. See Septer Costi, lib. i. sect. 83, where Buxtorf notes, that Aben Ezra observes upon this place, that none besides Moses and Aaron ever prophesied in their old age; because they were more excellent than all the prophets.

Ver. 8.] When they were about to renew their addresses to Pharaoh, to speak to him, and to demand his obedience. For he was so stupid, and hardened his heart so often (viii. 15, 32), that in conclusion God hardened him, by withdrawing all good motions from him. And therefore, the first time that Jehovah is said to harden his heart, there is a special remembrance of this that the Lord had foretold it (ix. 12).

That I may lay my hand upon Egypt.] Sustain all their firstborn: upon which immediately followed their march out of Egypt.

Ver. 9. When Pharaoh shall speak unto you, saying, Shew a miracle for you:] It was likely that Pharaoh would, when he was not in a passion, ask, How shall I know that you come from God with this message to me? give me some proof of your authority: and such a proof as can be done by none, but by the power of God. And therefore God directs Moses what to do in this case.

Say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, &c.] The same rod is sometimes called the rod of God (iv. 20), sometimes Moses's rod, and sometimes Aaron's: as we find it in many places, ver. 10, 19, of this chapter; and viii. 5, 19, &c. Because God wrought all the following miracles by Moses's rod and by Aaron's rod, and sometimes Aaron held it in his hand. But commonly Moses delivered it unto Aaron, as an agent under him, to stretch it out for the effecting of wonders. For he tells Pharaoh, in this very chapter, that with the rod which was in his hand, he would smite the waters, &c. ver. 17. And immediately the Lord bade him say unto him, "Take up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand upon the waters of Egypt" (ver. 19). By which it appears he had delivered the rod unto Aaron. For a rod being the ensign of authority, prophets were wont to carry one in their hand, in token of their office. And so did the Egyptian magicians also, who had every one their rod ready to throw down (ver. 12). And Mercury, whom the Egyptians counted a prophet (and thence called him Ambis), was represented with a wand in his hand.

Cast it before Pharaoh, &c.] As God had before directed Moses (iv. 3, 21).

Ver. 10.] At their first address to Pharaoh they only delivered their message; but did nothing to confirm it (ver. 1, &c.). Nor were they commanded now to work any more, till Pharaoh, God was pleased again to appear, and stretch out his rod upon the waters of Egypt. Which it is likely he did; this second address to him moving him to ask, How shall I know that you come from God?

Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh and before his servants.] The great men of the court, who are always supposed to be present where the king was; though not mentioned in the story demanded one. Which it is likely he did; this second address to him moving him to ask, How shall I know that you come from God?
11 Then Pharaoh also called the wise men and the sorcerers: now the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments.

fled from before it: the sight of it was so terrible. And therefore it is highly probable, that Pharaoh and his servants were not less startled at the first appearance of it. Artapanus relates several other miracles besides this, in Eusebius's Prepar. Evang. p. 434, 435, and 441; which I mention to show that the fame of Moses's miracles was spread among the heathen, who were so far from disbelieving them, that they gave credit to other false reports, which some ill people had mingled with them.

Ver. 11.] When he had recovered the fright in which we may well suppose him to have been, he sent some of his servants to call in those who he thought could cope with Moses and Aaron in wonderful works.

Wise men. This word is sometimes used in a good sense: for therefore to show they were such as we now call cunning men, he joins another word to it, which is never taken in a good sense, viz. Sorcerers:] Which most take to be such as we call jugglers; who cast mists, as we speak, before men's eyes; and make things appear otherwise than they really are. For the Hebrew word ciddaph (from which we compose magicians, which we translate sorcerers), signifies to delude the sight with false appearances. Sir John Marsham puts these two words together, and (by the figure of יו bdi šúw) translates them, accurvisit perittissimos artis magicæ, "he called the most skilful persons in the magical art," Chronic. Can. Secul. ix.

Moses.] This is a third word, which seems to be of worse import than the two former. Some translate it necromancers: but it being a foreign word, we cannot determine its particular meaning: though, in general, no doubt it signifies men that by evil arts performed amazing things: such as Simon Magnus and Elymas in aftertimes. See Gen. xli. 8, and Bochart in his Hierozoicon, (par. ii, lib. iv, cap. 18), where he hath a large discourse about the meaning of this word chartumim: which, after all that others have said about it, he thinks comes from the word retan; which in Arabic and Chaldee signifies to murmur, as magicians were wont to do in their incantations. And Hartn is properly ἀναγώγοι, an enchanter, and the name of Aegyptus (the same with Hecate), he thinks alludes to it; whom magicians were wont frequently to invoke.

The names of the principal magicians at this time among the Egyptians were Jannes and Jambres, as not only St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8), but several, both Jewish, Greek, and Roman writers tell us. I will mention but one, the author of Schalshe-Hakkabalah, who calls them by these names; and saith, that in our language we would call them Johannes and Ambrosius. The reader may find a great many more, if he please, in prime Usher's Annals, ad A. M. 2513, and in Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i, lib. ii, cap. 53, p. 645. Artapanus, in Eusebius, calls them τρις προίκες, "priests at Memphis," whom Pharaoh sent for to oppose Moses.

The original of which sort of men seems to have been this; that God being pleased to admit the holy patriarchs to familiar colloquies with him, the devil endeavoured to imitate him; that he might keep man in his obedience, by pretending discoveries of secret things, which God had vouchsafed to his ministers. And when God was pleased to work miracles for the confirmation of the truth, the devil directed these men, who were familiar with him, how to invoke his help for the performance of strange things, which confused them in their errors. They also did in like manner with their enchantments.] If the Hebrew word come from lakat, which signifies a flame (see Gen. iii. 24), it seems to denote such sorcerers as dazzled men's eyes, and then imposed on them by shows and appearances of things, which had no real being. But it may be derived from lakat, which signifies hidden and secret; and then denotes those that used secret whispers or murmur, as enchanters did (as Bochart in this place now mentioned interprets it), or such as had secret familiarity with demons; as it is expounded in the Gemara Sanhedrim (cap. vii. p. 10), where there are many examples of the former sort of enchantments, by the deception of the sight. For instance, R. Aschev relates a story, how a mage of his name, blinds his nose, and bring pieces of cloth out of it. And R. Chajah saw one cut a camel in pieces with his sword, and then set it together again: which was nothing, saith he; but the delusion of the eyes. Several other stories are told of the same nature.

Ver. 12. For they cast down every man his rod.] They were sent not only to oppose Moses, and therefore attempted to do the very same thing that he had done. For they took him for a mere magician, like themselves; and it was a common thing, in ancient times, for such kind of men to contend one with another. And their great study was (as Gaulmyn hath observed in his Naum upon it) to show their art or skill by a Jeff (2 K. vii. 22, &c.), to find out the genius that attended their opponent; whom they strove to gain to their side; or to terrify him by a greater and more powerful angel. And they only were insuperable who had a deity to their genius; as Porphyry, saith Plotinus, did. Who contending with Olympian an Egyptian, when his genius was called, εἰς ἀνταφώνιον "to appear visibly," there came a god and a demon. Which made the Egyptian cry out, Μαξάρτωσι εἰς Σεκειλα ἔτοιμον. "he is happy who hath a god for his genius," as I suppose it should be interpreted. And thus the Jewish author of the Life and Death of Moses fancies, that these magicians, who resisted Moses, turned over all their books, and find out the name of that deity, by which he did wonder, so much superior to theirs, &c.

And they became serpents.] Not real serpents, but seeming, as Josephus understood it, and several Christian writers; particularly Sedulius (lib. iv. curn.) imagined fata, Visiblum humanis magica tributa figurae.
hearkened not unto them: as the Lord had said. 14 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh's heart is hardened, he refuseth to let the people go.

same bigness (as we may well suppose they would endeavour to bring) with that of Moses. However their serpents (whatsoever they were) could not stand before his; but were swallowed up, while his still remained. This might have convinced Pharaoh, if his magicians had not made him believe that they would in time find a power superior to Moses. The Jews also imagine Pharaoh himself was a magician; and helped to get out of Moses the secret whereby he wrought these wonders. Which were the greater, because Moses, no doubt, in conclusion, took this serpent by the tail (as God had commanded him, iv. 4), and it became a rod in his hand again. Whereas the Egyptian sorcerers had no rods remaining to take up; they being vanished with their serpents. Greg. Nyssen. (L. V. Via Mosiae, p. 172), takes the devouling of their rods to have been a plain argument, "or ei μετα των χερσον," that the rods, i.e. serpents of the magicians, had no vital power in them able to defend themselves; but were mere delusions, without any real virtue." And here I cannot but take notice of a remarkable passage in Numenius, a Pythagorean philosopher, recorded by Eusebius (lib. ix. Prepar. Evang. cap. 8), where he tells us, that Numenius (in his third book περὶ ψευδοτήτων) expressly saith "That James and Jannes were, Αἰγυπτίων ἐπορωμάτων, inferior to none in magical skill; and therefore chosen, by the common consent of the Egyptians, to oppose in the miracles of Moses, and show their manhood, by magical arts." The leader of the Jews: of whom he gives this noble character, that he was a man most powerful with God in prayer, ἁρματημένος τείχων ἑξίσσυος δυναστής. Which is a plain confession, that he took Moses to be, as he is called in these books, a man of God: and may serve to shame those who either believe not this history, or think Moses to have been only a great magician.

Ver. 13. He hardened Pharaoh's heart: or rather, Pharaoh's heart was hardened.] For so we translate this very Hebrew phrase (ver. 22), and I can give no account why we translate it otherwise here. Especially since the Vulgar and the Chaldee so render it, and the LXX. also in this verse, saraphan p. ἡμέρας Pha-ra·o-ων, "Pharaoh's heart grew stiff; or, waxed strong and stubborn!" and ver. 32, ἐπαραφην' ἐκ θεοῦ Φαρ-αων, "his heart was hardened." And it is plainly the like form of speech with that in the next verse (14), where God himself interprets his own meaning, Pharaoh's heart, διὰ θαρσίας, "is heavy, and will not stir." Nor is he there, in any of these three verses, the least mention of any person by whom his heart was hardened.

That he hardened not unto them:] It is likely, upon the first sight of the serpent, his heart was inclined to hearken: but seeing the magicians do the same, it returned to its first bent; and there fixed, notwithstanding Moses's rod devoured theirs. This God had predicted (iii. 19), knowing his wicked disposition would not yield to any means he should think fit to use for his reformation.

Ver. 14.] It is likely Moses, after he had been with Pharaoh and wrought this miracle, returned to the place where the Divine Majesty was wont to appear unto him (vi. 12, 30), and gave him an account of what was passed. Whereupon the Lord told him, he saw Pharaoh's heart dissolved in his way; and therefore it would be to no purpose to wait to see what would be the effect of the late miracle; but bid him go the next morning; and carry a threatening message to him.

Pharaoh's heart is hardened.] It is observable that he doth not say, I have hardened Pharaoh's heart (and therefore there should have been no such intimation in our translation of ver. 13), but Pharaoh's heart is hardened. Which can imply no other hardening than what proceeded from his own obstinate resolution, not to lose the service of the Israelites.

Ver. 15. Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning:] Of the very next day after he had wrought the foregoing miracle: and now begins the first of the ten plagues which God sent upon the Egyptians, for disobeying his ambassadors. Whose treatment with Pharaoh, as Cassiodorus Capellanus, (Cod. A. M. 2002) thinks, continued about eleven months; from the end of harvest (which he makes account was in our May) to the beginning of the next year: which is the opinion of the Hebrew doctors. But our excellent primate Usher thinks, that all the following plagues were inflicted within the space of one month; in such order of time, as I shall observe in the resolution of each of them. And Bochartus gives good reason for it in his Hierozoicon. (par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 8). For we are told here (ver. 7), that Moses was fourscore years old when he began to treat with Pharaoh: and in Josh. v. 6, that they "walked forty years in the wilderness." Now, if he had spent a year in inflicting these plagues upon the Egyptians, the remaining thirty entering into Canaan, must have been a hundred and one-and-twenty years old: whereas he was but a "hundred and twenty," as we read Deut. xxxiv. 5.

Nor was it suitable to the Divine goodness to be so long in delivering his people, who were reduced to extreme misery. It was but just, also, that God should follow Pharaoh, whose heart was so obstinately hard, with one plague upon the neck of another; and give him no time to breathe, after one was removed, before another came upon him.

Lo, he goeth out unto the water:] God, who knows all things, foresaw his motion beforehand; and speaks as if he then saw him actually going out of his palace to the river: either to walk there for recreation, or to worship the river Nile. For as Bochartus (whose words these are) observes out of Plistarch, οὗτος οὖν θεός Ἀιγυπτίως ὥς καὶ Νιλιος, "Nothing was had in such honour among the Egyptians as the river Nile." If it was so in Moses's days, it is not unlikely that he went to pay his morning devotions to it. Or, if he were a magician, as the Hebrews fancy, he might be such a worshiper of the Nile, that when he came thither, the river Nile, as if it understood his language, should answer in some sort, as if it said to him, "I am the Nile; treat me as such: for I served the Egyptians as a god." So, for he observes, they say in the Talmud: and make this the reason of Pharaoh's going to the river. Which Jonathan follows in his paraphrase, "Behold, he goeth out to observe divinations upon the water, as a magician," Hierozoicon. (par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 15).

Thou shalt stand by the river's brink against he comes.] Perhaps Pharaoh (as the same Bochart observes) had forbid him come any more to the court: and so God directs him to take this occasion to meet with him.

The rod—shall thou take in thine hand.] To give him the greater authority, and to put Pharaoh in fear at the sight of that rod, which had lately swallowed up all the γενεάς Ποταμίων (as Greg. Nyssen calls them), magical staves which encountered him.
16 And thou shalt say unto him, The Lord God of the Hebrews hath sent me unto thee, saying, Let my people go, that they may serve me in the wilderness: and, behold, hitherto thou wouldest not hear.

17 Thus saith the Lord, In this thou shalt know that I am the Lord; behold, I will smite with the rod that is in mine hand upon the waters which are in the river, and they shall be turned to blood.

18 And the fish that is in the river shall die, and the river shall stink; and the Egyptians shall loathe to drink of the water of the river.

Ver. 16.] See ver. 3. To which add, that it is plain by this whole story, that all the messages delivered by Moses, and all the answers which Pharaoh returned, were true and formal treaties of a solemn embassage (as Dr. Jackson speaks), upon which Moses was sent to the king of Egypt, from the Lord God of the Hebrews; that is, their king (as he was become in a people), and to whom Moses acted as his deputy or vice-regent.

Let my people go, &c.] The merciful kindness of God to a hardened sinner is here very remarkable in renewing his message, and giving him warning of what would come upon him, if he did not yield. Whereas he might in justice have inflicted it, without any notice of his intentions. He sets before him also his sin and his danger, in being hitherto disobedient; and behold, hitherto thou wouldst not hear: i. e. "thou hast provoked the Divine Majesty, by disregarding several messages I have brought to thee from him."

Ver. 17. Thus saith the Lord.] Attend to this new message I bring to thee in his name.

In this thou shalt know that I am the Lord:] He had asked in a contemptuous way, Who is the Lord? and said after a supercilious manner, I know him not (ver. 2), nor indeed cared to know him; but slighted him and his messengers; as the word know not sometimes signifies, being as much as not to regard. Therefore now he bids Moses tell him, He would make him know not as the divine agent of the Lord of the world; by the change of the waters of the river (which Pharaoh perhaps adored) into blood.

Behold, I will smite with the rod:] God and Moses are represented in this history as one person (according to what he had said ver. 1 of this chapter), and therefore it was the same thing to say, the Lord (whose words Moses had begun to recite) will smite; or, to say, I will smite (see ver. 16). It is to be observed, also, that Aaron smote the river (ver. 19), but it being by Moses's direction and order, it was counted his act: so that he might say, I will smite, &c.

The waters—shall be turned to blood.] This plague was the more remarkable, because, as Theodoret here observes, they having drowned the Hebrew children in this river, God now punishes them for it by giving them bloody water to drink (Wisd. xii. 7, 8). And if they had the same notions then, that the Egyptians had in future times, the plague was the more terrible, because it fell on that which they thought had some divinity in it, and (as the same Theodoret observes) was honoured as a god; because it made plenty when it was holy, and plagues when it was profane.

The Hebrew doctors add another reason for this punishment: because the Egyptians had hindered them from their wonted baptisms (as the author of the Life and Death of Moses speaks), that is, saith Paulinus, from purifying themselves in the river by bathing; after they had lain in of their children: which, in the scarcity of water in that country, could nowhere else be done but in the river.

Ver. 18. The fish that is in the river shall die:] Here are three grievous effects of this plague: it deprived them of their most delicious food, for so their fish were (Numb. xi. 5). And took away the pleasure they had of washing by the river's side, because it was then made noxious; and deprived them of the correction of the blood, through the heat of the sun, by which means the water was made unfit for their drink.

Ver. 19. The Lord spake unto Moses.] After he had been with Pharaoh, and delivered this message to him.

Say unto Aaron, Take thy rod;] This warning being despised by Pharaoh, who would not relent; God requires them actually to do as he had threatened. And now Moses had delivered his rod to Aaron, that he might by his authority execute this judgment.

Upon the waters of Egypt.] These are general words, comprehending all the particulars following.

Upon their streams,] There were seven branches into which the river Nile was divided before it fell into the sea; which seems to be here understood: being called (Isa. xi. 15) the seven streams, or rivers of Egypt.

Upon their rivers,] There were several cuts made by art, out of every stream, to draw the water into their grounds: which seem to be here meant by rivers.

Upon their ponds,] These were digged to hold rain-water when it fell; as it did sometimes: and near the river also they digged wells, it is likely, which may be here intended.

Upon all their pools of water,] There were, here and there, other collections of water: particularly in their gardens, derived by pipes from the river, into cisterns.

In vessels of wood,—of stone.] Wherein water was kept in private houses, for their present use.

Ver. 20. Moses and Aaron did so, as the Lord commanded, &c.] This first plague our primitive Usher makes account was inflicted about the eighteenth day of the sixth month; which in the next year, and ever after, became the twelfth month. Artapanus tells the story otherwise; but it is evident he had heard of it among the gentiles: and Ezekiel the tragedian relates it all right: together with the following miracle (see Euseb. Prepar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. xxix. p. 493). Nor is there any thing more frequent in the Roman story (as Huetius observes, lib. ii. Athet. Question. cap. xii. p. 123), that declarations of rivers by floods, flowing over the earth; pits full of blood, showers of blood, and waters of rivers changed into blood, &c.

Smote the waters that were in the river, &c.] Here is mention only of smiting the water in the river. And it is likely, that only the waters of the river were turned into blood (as it here follows) at the first life-
21 And the fish that was in the river died; and the river stank, and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river; and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt.

22 And the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, neither did he hearken unto them; as the LORD had said.

23 And Pharaoh turned and went into his house, neither did he set his heart to this also.

24 And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink; for they could not drink of the water of the river.

25 And seven days were fulfilled, after that the LORD had smitten the river.

So that there was not time to fetch water from distant places: but the magicians exercised their enchantments upon some ponds, which were not as yet turned by Moses into blood.

Neither did he set his heart to this also] Here is the reason why his heart was not moved by this miracle. He did not seriously consider what Moses had done, and examine the difference between the effect of this power and that of the magicians. Which was the cause that his heart was hardened (as we read before) as all men's are, who will think of nothing, but only to have their own humour satisfied.

Ver. 24. The Egyptians digged—for water] The whole country was forced to try to get water to quench their thirst, by this great labour. How it succeeded we are not told; but it is likely they found clear water, by percolation through the earth. For Moses smote only the pits that were then in being, when Aaron stretched out his rod: which had no effect upon those which were digged afterwards. Why they did not fetch it from Goshen, if there was any clear water there (as we cannot but think there was, for the use of the Israelites), is not easy to determine. Their pride, perhaps, would not suffer them, till they had tried other ways to supply their wants.

Ver. 25.] The rod of Moses could effect nothing without the LORD; by whose power this change was made in the waters. Which lasted seven days before this plague was removed. By which means they were convinced that all the waters were really corrupted: and they felt the heavy effects of it in a grievous stench, and perpetual labour in digging pits all about the river. Whether Pharaoh at last begged to have this plague removed, or no, we are not told. It is likely he was so obstinate that he would not stoop to ask this favour of them: which might be the reason it lasted so long; to see whether he would be moved to humble himself so far. To which when he would not yield, God took it away to make room for another stroke; or, as some think, it continued together with the plague of frogs, and were both removed upon his petition.

It is a weak conjecture of the Hebrew doctors, from these words, that all the ten plagues lasted seven days apiece; which is plainly contrary to the story.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Frogs are sent. 8 Pharaoh sweareth to Moses. 12 and turned into lice, which the magicians could not do. 16 The dust is by prayer removed them away. 20 The swarms of flies. 25 Pharaoh inclineth to let the people go, yet is hardened.

And the LORD spake unto Moses, and unto Pharaoh, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Let my people go, that they may serve me.

1 And the LORD spake unto Moses, Go unto Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Let my people go, that they may serve me.

21 And the fish that was in the river died; and the river stank, and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river; and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt.

22 And the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, neither did he hearken unto them; as the LORD had said.

23 And Pharaoh turned and went into his house, neither did he set his heart to this also.

24 And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink; for they could not drink of the water of the river.

25 And seven days were fulfilled, after that the LORD had smitten the river.

So that there was not time to fetch water from distant places: but the magicians exercised their enchantments upon some ponds, which were not as yet turned by Moses into blood.

Neither did he set his heart to this also] Here is the reason why his heart was not moved by this miracle. He did not seriously consider what Moses had done, and examine the difference between the effect of this power and that of the magicians. Which was the cause that his heart was hardened (as we read before) as all men's are, who will think of nothing, but only to have their own humour satisfied.

Ver. 24. The Egyptians digged—for water] The whole country was forced to try to get water to quench their thirst, by this great labour. How it succeeded we are not told; but it is likely they found clear water, by percolation through the earth. For Moses smote only the pits that were then in being, when Aaron stretched out his rod: which had no effect upon those which were digged afterwards. Why they did not fetch it from Goshen, if there was any clear water there (as we cannot but think there was, for the use of the Israelites), is not easy to determine. Their pride, perhaps, would not suffer them, till they had tried other ways to supply their wants.

Ver. 25.] The rod of Moses could effect nothing without the LORD; by whose power this change was made in the waters. Which lasted seven days before this plague was removed. By which means they were convinced that all the waters were really corrupted: and they felt the heavy effects of it in a grievous stench, and perpetual labour in digging pits all about the river. Whether Pharaoh at last begged to have this plague removed, or no, we are not told. It is likely he was so obstinate that he would not stoop to ask this favour of them: which might be the reason it lasted so long; to see whether he would be moved to humble himself so far. To which when he would not yield, God took it away to make room for another stroke; or, as some think, it continued together with the plague of frogs, and were both removed upon his petition.

It is a weak conjecture of the Hebrew doctors, from these words, that all the ten plagues lasted seven days apiece; which is plainly contrary to the story.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Frogs are sent. 8 Pharaoh sweareth to Moses. 12 and turned into lice, which the magicians could not do. 16 The dust is by prayer removed them away. 20 The swarms of flies. 25 Pharaoh inclineth to let the people go, yet is hardened.

And the LORD spake unto Moses, and unto Pharaoh, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Let my people go, that they may serve me.

21 And the fish that was in the river died; and the river stank, and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river; and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt.

22 And the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, neither did he hearken unto them; as the LORD had said.

23 And Pharaoh turned and went into his house, neither did he set his heart to this also.

24 And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink; for they could not drink of the water of the river.

25 And seven days were fulfilled, after that the LORD had smitten the river.

So that there was not time to fetch water from distant places: but the magicians exercised their enchantments upon some ponds, which were not as yet turned by Moses into blood.

Neither did he set his heart to this also] Here is the reason why his heart was not moved by this miracle. He did not seriously consider what Moses had done, and examine the difference between the effect of this power and that of the magicians. Which was the cause that his heart was hardened (as we read before) as all men's are, who will think of nothing, but only to have their own humour satisfied.

Ver. 24. The Egyptians digged—for water] The whole country was forced to try to get water to quench their thirst, by this great labour. How it succeeded we are not told; but it is likely they found clear water, by percolation through the earth. For Moses smote only the pits that were then in being, when Aaron stretched out his rod: which had no effect upon those which were digged afterwards. Why they did not fetch it from Goshen, if there was any clear water there (as we cannot but think there was, for the use of the Israelites), is not easy to determine. Their pride, perhaps, would not suffer them, till they had tried other ways to supply their wants.

Ver. 25.] The rod of Moses could effect nothing without the LORD; by whose power this change was made in the waters. Which lasted seven days before this plague was removed. By which means they were convinced that all the waters were really corrupted: and they felt the heavy effects of it in a grievous stench, and perpetual labour in digging pits all about the river. Whether Pharaoh at last begged to have this plague removed, or no, we are not told. It is likely he was so obstinate that he would not stoop to ask this favour of them: which might be the reason it lasted so long; to see whether he would be moved to humble himself so far. To which when he would not yield, God took it away to make room for another stroke; or, as some think, it continued together with the plague of frogs, and were both removed upon his petition.

It is a weak conjecture of the Hebrew doctors, from these words, that all the ten plagues lasted seven days apiece; which is plainly contrary to the story.
2 And if thou refuse to let them go, behold, I will smite all thy borders with frogs:
3 And the river shall bring forth frogs abundantly, which shall go up and come into thine house, and into thy bedchamber, and upon thy bed, and into the house of thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thine ovens, and into thy kneadingtroughs:
4 And the frogs shall come up both on thee, and upon thy people, and upon all thy servants.
5 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Stretch forth thine hand with thy rod over the streams, over the rivers, and over the ponds, and cause frogs to come up upon the land of Egypt.
6 And Aaron stretched out his hand over the waters of Egypt; and the frogs came up, and covered the land of Egypt.
7 And the magicians did so with their enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt.

Ver. 5.] No doubt, Moses delivered the foregoing message unto Pharaoh; but he, it seems, turned away, and would give no answer: for here immediately follows a new order (which God, perhaps, gave Moses upon the spot, as we speak, before he returned home), to inflict the plague he had bid him threaten.

Ver. 6. | Aaron stretched out his hand | He, as the minister of Moses (who was to him as God, iv. 16.), inflicted this plague upon Egypt.

Over the waters | He did not go to every place where there was water, but stood by the river, and stretched his rod over it, towards every part of the country (as Aben Ezra rightly explains it), and immediately the God effected what Moses had denounced.

The frogs came up, and covered the land | That is, there were vast numbers of them came up; for they did not so cover the land, but there was room for more; which the magicians counterfeited. The Jews think here was mensura pro mensura, “like for like,” as we speak. For they say it was a piece of their bondage, that the Egyptians, when they pleased, sent them a fishing; and now God made the river a noose, but frogs. Whose very crooking, others of them think, put the Egyptians in mind of the cries of the poor children whom they barbarously murdered.

Ver. 7. | The magicians did so with their enchantments, &c. | They should rather have shown their skill in removing the frogs, or destroying those which Moses had sent forth (as appears from ver. 5). For most of them came, one way or other, out of the river; they having little rain in Egypt.

Frogs abundantly | The Nile naturally produced frogs, but such great abundance of them as filled the country, was miraculous; especially being produced on dry land, and going out of the river and fields into the cities and houses, &c. was still more miraculous.

Which shall go up | Out of the river, which lay lower than the land.

And come into thine house, &c. | This explains what he meant by smiting in the foregoing verse: viz. inflicting some plague, more grievous than the former.

And it came to pass, when they had seen the wonders which he did by the hand of Moses, they said, What god is this, that hath worked these marvels in Egypt? and the people did reverence Pharaoh’s house, and his servants, and his officers, and all the land of Egypt;

Ver. 8.) He that had proudly said not long ago, who is the Lord? &c. (v. 2), now says, Intreat the Lord, &c. This was an acknowledgment that the Lord sent them; and that he only had power to remove them. In the former plague, he did enough to make Pharaoh know he was the Lord (vii. 17), but this had not enough on him for the present, which made him earnestly entreat those, whom he had scorned, to become intercessors to God for him and his people.

I will let the people go | This was not his settled resolution, but the present danger made him consent to it: for if the frogs had continued long, there had been no living in the country. As appears from what we read in Athens, out of Hecaleides Lembus (lib. viii. Deipnops. cap. 2), who says the whole country of Paonia and Dardania were covered with frogs, which God rained down from heaven in such abundance, that the houses and highways were full of them. They spent some time in killing of them: and, by keeping their doors shut, they made a draft for a while to bear this calamity: but when it did no good, but at last
CHAPTER VIII.

9 And Moses said unto Pharaoh, Glory over me: when shall I interreat for thee, and for thy servants, and for thy people, to destroy the frogs from thee and thy houses, that they may remain in the river only!

10 And he said, To morrow. And he said, Be it according to thy word: that thou mayest know that there is none like unto the Lord our God.

11 And the frogs shall depart from thee, and from thy houses, and from thy servants, and from thy people; they shall remain in the river only.

12 And Moses and Aaron went out from Pharaoh: and Moses cried unto the Lord because of the frogs which he had brought against Pharaoh.

13 And the Lord did according to the word of Moses; and the frogs died out of the houses, out of the villages, and out of the fields.

14 And they gathered them together upon heaps: and the land stank.

15 But when Pharaoh saw that there was respite, he hardened his heart, and hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had said.

16 And the Lord said unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Stretch out thy rod, and smite the dust of the land, that it may become lice throughout all the land of Egypt.

Ver. 12. Moses and Aaron went out.] To the place, it is likely, where Moses was wont to attend upon the Divine Majesty.

Moses cried unto the Lord because of the frogs.] In the Hebrew the words are, Cried to him about the business (or the matter) of the frogs, which God had sent upon Pharaoh. Or, as Aben Ezra understands it, concerning the frogs, which he had promised Pharaoh should be removed; as if the words should be translated thus: "He cried unto the Lord about the frogs, and appointed unto Pharaoh." For so the word shem in xv. 25, signifies to appoint or propose, and so the LXX. here translate the words (which we render had brought against Pharaoh), ἱδρασαροι φαραθησα, "as he had appointed to Pharaoh."

Ver. 13. The Lord did according to the word of Moses.] So powerful was he with God in prayer, as the heathens themselves observed from this story. See what I observed out of Numenius, vii. 12.

The frogs died, &c.] The Egyptians could not kill them; but God took away their breath: yet not removing them from the places where they were, but leaving them dead there. As appears by what follows:

Ver. 14. They gathered them together upon heaps.] That they might carry them, it is likely, into the river: and so they might go down into the sea. God could have dissolved them into dust (if he had pleased) or swept them into the river from whence they came; or made them quite vanish in an instant. But he would have them first desiring when he said "Thou shalt command me." as a token they were real frogs, and no illusion of their sight.

The land stank.] This was a farther sensible evidence that they were real frogs.

Ver. 15. But when Pharaoh saw that there was reprieve.] That he was freed from the great strait in which he was. For the Hebrew word for reprieve, signifies breaking or enlargement; and makes the sense to be this: that when the burden that pressed him was taken off, so that he could take his breath, he was of another mind, &c.

He hardened his heart, &c.] Was not so good as his word (ver. 8), but returned to his former resolution, not to let Israel go. Which resolution grew so much more stubborn and obstinate, than it had been before; by how much the plague of the frogs had softened his heart, and inclined it to yield to God, more than the two former miracles had done.

Ver. 16. The Lord said unto Moses, Say unto Aaron.] The Lord seems to have given Pharaoh no warning of this plague; but to have inflicted it immediately upon the removal of the frogs, viz. on the twenty-seventh day of the sixth month. For his breach of faith was such a high provocation, that he deserved no other treatment, but a more notable judgment.

Smite the dust of the land, that it may become lice]
17 And they did so: for Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod, and smote the dust of the earth, and it became lice in man and in beast; all the dust of the land became lice throughout all the land of Egypt.

18 And the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man, and upon beast.

Some would have the Hebrew word cinnim to signify gnats, or some such kind of creature. Thus many of the ancients understand it; and Aristarchus calls it ζεέω, σπόρα, "a flying sort of living creature," which made such ulcers by its biting, as no medicine could cure (see Eusebius, lib. ix. Praepar. Evang. p. 425). But Bochartus hath sufficiently proved that our translation is right; and that out of the very text. For gnats, and such-like insects, are bred in fenny places, but these were brought out of the dust of the earth.

Ver. 17. Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod.] He still is the instrument to execute all the judgments which Moses denounced: as he was his mouth to deliver all the messages he carried to Pharaoh.

Smite the dust of the earth, and it became lice.] This showed the lice were not a natural production; for they come in an infinite number, and as a sort of the dust, and of other living creatures.

In man, and in beast.] This proves they were lice; which stick fast both to men and beasts. Whereas gnats, though they sting sorely, cannot be said to be in man and beast: for they are a most restless creature, continually buzzing about, and never settling constantly in one place. And there were various sorts of these lice: for beasts do not breed the same that men do: nor have all beasts alike; but some are peculiar to horses, others to oxen, others to sheep, and others to swine and dogs.

The dust of the land became lice.] That is, nothing could be seen but lice, where dust was before. Or, lice were mingled everywhere with the dust.

Throughout all the land.] Not of Goshen (It is very probable), which was inhabited mostly by Israelites.

Ver. 18. The magicians did so, &c.] Attempted and endeavoured to do so: by using their wonted invocations and rites of incantation. For the common saying among the Jews is very frivolous, that "demons had endowed them with such creatures so small as lice." The meaning of which, Gaulnuma thinks, they themselves did not understand; which, according to the principles of the ancient magic, was this: that all animals had a particular genius presiding over them, by whose assistance their worshippers could do any thing among that sort of creatures. But this is meant only of perfect animals, not of insects (among whom they reckoned lice), which had no such heavenly power waiting on them. But if there had been any such notions then, these magicians sure would have understood it; and not fruitlessly have attempted that which they had no hope to produce.

But they could not.] Though they had counterfeited the former wonders; yet here a stop is put to their power, so that they themselves confess their weakness.

So there were lice upon man, and upon beast.] This seems to suggest, that since they could not produce any new lice, they attempted to remove those which Moses had brought upon the country. But they failed in that also; for, notwithstanding all that they could do, both men and beasts were infested with the lice.

The Hebrews say (in the Life and Death of Moses), that this plague was inflicted upon the Egyptians for another piece of oppression which they exercised on the Israelites: to whom they said, "Go, sweep our houses, and sweep our streets, &c." Therefore God made lice to cover the earth a cubit deep. But this savours too much of their fabulous invention. It is more pertinent to observe, that though we read of particular persons, who, for great crimes, were punished with the plague of lice (see Huetius, lib. ii. Ques. Alcaneta, cap. xii. n. 12), yet we do not find in any story a whole nation infected with them; and that both men and beasts, without exception: the magicians themselves, in all likelihood, being sorely afflicted with them: which made them cry out as here follows.

Ver. 19. This is the finger of God.] The same with what is called, in other places of Scripture, the hand of God (Psa. cix. 27), that is, his power. There are those (particularly Bochartus) who think magicians did not, by these words, give glory to God: but thought to save their own credit with Pharaoh, by telling him that it was not Moses or Aaron who were too hard for them, but a Divine power superior to them. All to this purpose Jonathan. But they ought then to have been sensible that the power which they dealt with was a spiritual one: being unable to assist them upon all occasions. And, no doubt, God intended to confound them, by taking that time to disable them when they least expected it. For why should not their power have extended to such a small thing as this, when they had done greater? But God would not let them always abuse Pharaoh with their illusions; and gave them a check, when they thought themselves most sure of success.

Pharaoh's heart was hardened.] One would have rather expected to have heard, that his heart began to relent, when he saw his magicians not only puzzled, but quite baffled: so that they owned Moses actuated by a power above theirs. But this it was, not to stick to all their former indications, that had hitherto prevented him (ver. 8), from which he not only revolted, but grew more resolute not to yield to God. The effect of which was this further induration: it being natural for evil men, who resist the means of their cure, to grow worse and worse affected.

This miracle also of the lice, being more loathsome to Pharaoh than terrible, might happily be the reason (as Dr. Jackson conjectures) that he did not entreat Moses and Aaron to pray for him: as he had done upon the sight of the frogs; and as he straightway did after he felt the next plague of the flies.

I cannot but add also this further reflection of his (book x. on the Creed, ch. x.), that though the finger of God was very remarkable in producing the lice, which the magicians could not, yet it was no way remarkable in hardening Pharaoh's heart. For it is neither said, nor intimated, that the finger of God hardened it: but Pharaoh's heart was hardened, that is, remained obstinate. The cause of which was his not hearkening to them, as it had been before (ver. 15).

Ver. 20. Stand before Pharaoh.] He had ordained him to do the same, with the plague (ver. 15). Lo, he cometh forth to the water.] This confirms what was said there, that in the morning it was usual
CHAPTER VIII.

21 Else, if thou wilt not let my people go, behold, I will send swarms of flies upon thee, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thy houses: and the houses of the Egyptians shall be full of swarms of flies, and also the ground whereon they are.

22 And I will sever in that day the land of Goshen, in which my people dwell, that no swarms of flies shall be there; to the end thou mayest know that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth.

with him to walk out by the river: either for his refreshment, or for his devotion. Perhaps that, after washing, he might worship the rising sun. For Moses is commanded to rise up early in the morning, and present himself before him.

Let my people go, &c.] The same message he had often sent him (vii. 16, 17, viii. 1), together with an admonition and warning of his danger: which God had not given him before the last plague (ver. 16).

Ver. 21. Behold, I will send swarms of flies upon thee, &c.] The Hebrew word arab being generally thought to come from a word which signifies to mingle, interpreters commonly think it denotes a mixture of several sorts of creatures. And some take it, as we seem here to do, for all manner of flies; which Aquila calls γυμνασια, all sorts of insects. Others take it, as it is in our margin, for a mixture of noisome beasts: and so the author of the Life and Death of Moses; God sent flies, wolves, bears, and leopards, and such like wild beasts, which killed not only their cattle in the field, but their children in their houses. And so Josephus expounds it, γυμνασια πασαι και πολιτικαι. But Bochartus hath confuted this notion by very good arguments, in his Hierozoicen (par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 13), where he shows no words have more significations than the Hebrew word arab: which signifies not only to mingle, but among many other things, to obscure and darken. From whence the even-time is called arab. And therefore, with great reason, he approves of the I.X.X. version, where translate it γυμνασια, a flesh fly, very bold and troublesome; being not easily driven away: which infects dogs very much in the summer-time. So it is here understood, as God take it for that large black fly which fastens upon beasts, and sucks their blood, called arab, from its black colour: as arb from thence signifies a crow. And so Philo describes this fly, called γυμνασια, that it is as impudent as a dog; and makes its assaults with great violence, like a dart; fastening its teeth so deep in the flesh, and sticking so close that it makes cattle run mad.

This plague the Jews say (in the forenamed book of the Life of Moses) was sent upon the Egyptians, because of the hard service they made the Israelites undergo, in feeding their cattle.

Ver. 22. I will sever in that day the land of Goshen, &c.] Here now the distinguishing mercy of God to the Israelites is plainly expressed: which is to be understood in the foregoing plagues. And the Hebrew word, as well as the Chaldee, signifies, I will make a wonderful difference. So Jonathan, in that day, I will work a miracle in the land of Goshen: for, indeed, it was a marvellous thing, that countries so near one another should be in such a different condition at the same time. And it was the more wonderful, because there was such store of cattle in Goshen, whose dung is apt to breed flies.

To the end thou mayest know that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth.] Who governs all things here below: or, that have a special care of my people.

23 And I will put a division between my people and thy people: to morrow shall this sign be.

24 And the Lord did so; and there came a grievous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh, and into his servants' houses, and into all the land of Egypt: the land was corrupted by reason of the swarm of flies.

25 ¶ And Pharaoh called for Moses and for Aaron, and said, Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land.

For so Bochart understood by earth, the land of Goshen. In the midst of which God is said to be, because he defended and delivered them from this sore calamity which their neighbours suffered. For thus this phrase is used in many places (Deut. vii. 22, xxiii. 14; Psal. xlvi. 6, &c.). And thus Conr. Pellicanus seems to have understood this passage, which he interprets, you shall know that I am the Lord, and Prince of this country.

Ver. 23. I will put a division between my people and thy people, &c.] It is repeated again, because it was a remarkable thing, and denoted the Israelites to be God's peculiar people; for whom he had a singular favour. Which is the reason that this mercy is called here a redemption (as the word in the Hebrew signifies, which we translate division), because God exempted and delivered the Israelites from those flies, which sorely infested all the rest of Pharaoh's dominions.

To morrow shall this sign be.] The finger of God was so remarkable in the last plague (ver. 19), that his contemptuous disregard of it was very provoking: so that God would forbear no longer than till the next morning, before he scourged him with his new judgment. Which was very grievous and naisme, as appears by the following words: especially by his willingness to grant more than he had done before, that he might be rid of it.

Ver. 24. The Lord did so.] Here is no mention of Aaron's stretching out his rod (as at other times), but this was done immediately by God himself: that the Egyptians might not imagine there was any secret virtue in it, or that Aaron was the agent, &c.

This plague was threatened about the twenty-eighth day of the sixth month: and inflicted on the twenty-ninth: and removed on the thirtieth.

There came a grievous swarm of flies. Or, a vast number of flies: for so the word cared (which we here translate grievous or heavy) is used in Gen. 1. 9. See there.

The land was corrupted by reason of the swarm of flies.] We are to understand here, by the land, the inhabitants of the land: whose blood these flies sucked, and left such a poison in it, that their bodies swelled, and many of them died. So the Psalmist understood it (lxviii. 15). There is something like this recorded in heathen stories; particularly, they say, that when Trojan made war upon the Agarans, he was so assaulted with flies, when he sat down to eat, that he looked upon them as sent by God, and desisted from his enterprise. And that whole countries have been infested with them, appears from a number of gods that were worshipped, because they were supposed to have driven them away, at Aaron, and several other places mentioned by the learned Hucius (in the place above quoted), from whence came the names of Jupiter, Ακρων and Μωλοδον, and of Hercules, Μυπος, &c.

Ver. 25. Pharaoh called for Moses and for Aaron. &c.] Sent a messenger to call them to him.
26 And Moses said, It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord our God: lo, shall we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us? We will go three days' journey into the wilderness, and sacrifice to the Lord our God, as he shall command us.

Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land.] He had consented to let them sacrifice, when he last sent for them (ver. 8). But he named no place: and also quickly repented of the concession. But now he determines it in the land of Goshen; where he grants them license to offer public sacrifice. But this Moses tells him (in the next verse) was not fit for them to accept; nor was it what God demanded.

Ver. 26. Moses said, It is not meet so to do.] Besides that this is not the thing that God requires, it is not prudent, because it is not safe for us to do it.

For we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord] There is no indication, that I can find, of any such scotic idolatry now among the Egyptians as they have here. But it is certain that what seems to be suggested in this place; which learned men have generally interpreted, as if the sense was this: "We must sacrifice to our God oxen, sheep, and goats, which the Egyptians worship and adore; and that would be such an abominable thing in their account (to kill their gods) that it would give them the highest provocation." Thus both the Chaldee interpreters, the Syriac, St. Jerome, and others: which Bochartus himself approves of in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34. and 53. and more largely, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 17. But there is an objection lies against this interpretation, that long after Moses's time the Egyptians themselves did offer all the forementioned creatures to their gods: for Herodotus relates (in his Euterpe, cap. xlii.) after what manner they sacrificed an ox in his time: and though some parts of the country abstained from sheep, yet they sacrificed goats; as, on the contrary, others abstained from goats and sacrificed sheep (see upon Gen. xxii. 12).

Therefore it may be a question, whether these words do not mean the sacrifice of the Egyptians; and to the qualities and condition of the beasts which are offered: about which, the Egyptians in after ages were very curious. For the same Herodotus tells us (in the same book, cap. xxxviii.) how the sacrifices were examined by the priest, and none allowed to be offered but those which had his mark upon them. And so Plutarch (in his book de Isis, et Osiris), that the Egyptians, thinking Typho to have been red, sacrificed only such oxen as were of a red colour: making such an accurate scrutiny, οτι κατο μεθεριπετεια και χειρακοδοτησε, "that if a beast were found to have one hair black or white, it was judged unfit for sacrifice." The forenamed Herodotus, indeed, saith, they would not sacrifice bulls, because they were sacred to them: which shows that in his time there was great superstition about such creatures; so that none durst offer the least violence to them. But as we have no evidence, that in the days of Moses they were infested with such opinions, so their sacrificing such creatures, as the Jews did long after his days, and all mankind had done from the beginning, seems to be a deviation against that sense of the words which is generally put upon them. But there were so many various ways of sacrificing in the world, that it is very probable the Egyptians differed very much from the Israelites: who might offer also (it is likely) such creatures as the Egyptians thought unclean; whereby they might be enraged at their profaneness.

Maimonides fancies the Egyptians worshipped the sign or constellation called Aries; and that this was the occasion of this speech: for which I can see no reason (More Nevouchim, par. iii. cap. xlv.).

Will they not stone us?] We cannot gather from hence, that there was such a punishment among the Egyptians as stoning men to death. For he doth not speak here of punishment by their laws; but of what might happen from a popular fury.

Ver. 27. We will go three days' journey into the wilderness, &c.] So God had directed them; and it was not lawful for them to sacrifice in any place but in the appointed place, in order to give this reason why they were to go into a solitary place, there to receive commands from God about sacrifice, and all other parts of his worship: because God intended to give them a law different from those of other nations, or rather quite opposite unto them. In which there were so many singular rites, that they would have offended other people, and seemed to them profane, if they had exercised them among them (de Vita Mosis, p. 615). And thus Corn. Tacitus understood the design of Moses, not to bring the Israelites to as near a conformity as he could with the gentiles (which some now in these days fancy), but to keep them at the greatest distance from other nations, by opposite rites of worship. His words are remarkable (Lib. v. Histor. cap. iv.). "Moses, quo sibi in posterae gentem firmanet, novos ritus, contrariostes, ceteros mortuipos indicit. Profana illis omnibus, quae apud nos sacra: rursus concessa apud illlos, quae nobis incesa;"

Ver. 28. Pharaoh said, I will let you go. He doth not say expressly, I will let you go three days' journey, as was desired: which hath made some think this was but a niggardlycession of Pharaoh's, who intended to deceive them with general words. But Moses understood it otherwise, as appears by his acceptance of the grant.

Only ye shall not go very far away.] No further than three days' journey.

Interret for me.] This indeed is added so quickly, and as it were, with the same breath that he granted their three days' journey; that it may make one think it was the least part of his intention to permit that, but only to get rid of this plague. Which if it had continued long, the Egyptians must have left their country to preserve themselves. Several people having been terrified by it, to quit their habitations, as many ancient authors inform us, mentioned by Bonfrius and Bochartus.

Ver. 29. He was not more ready to desire, than the Lord and his servant Moses were to grant, the total removal of this plague; which was sent for his reformation, not for his destruction; if he would have duly considered it.

To morrow.] Yet he would not pray that he might be released from it presently; but let him lie a while under the smart of his rod; that he might be truly humbled, and deal no more deceitfully with him, as he feared he would.
CHAPTER IX.

not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more in not letting the people go to sacrifice to the Lord.

30 And Moses went out from Pharaoh, and intreated the Lord.

31 And the Lord did according to the word

But let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more, &c.] He had promised fair before (ver. 8), but broken his word: which made this solemn caution the more necessary, lest he should be guilty of such false dealings again.

Ver. 30.] He gave Pharaoh a good example of steadfastness, by making good his promise immediately, which he gave him in the beginning of the foregoing verse.

Ver. 31. The Lord did according to the word of Moses;] Here was punctual performance on God's part, of what was agreed between him and Pharaoh, in the foregoing treaty.

There remained not one.] This was a greater miracle than that of removing the frogs; for they remained of Moses; and he removed the swarms of flies from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people; there remained not one.

32 And Pharaoh hardened his heart at this time also, neither would he let the people go.

in heaps and stank (ver. 14). But these were all swept away (by a mighty wind, perhaps), either into the sea, or into the deserts of Libya.

Ver. 32. Pharaoh hardened his heart] This is here made an act of his own; as it was no doubt in the former refusals to let him go (ver. 15, 19). And he hardened his heart, by not hearkening, or not regarding what they had done, as the word is used and translated (ix. 21). That which made him not to hearken or regard, was his excessive pride and covetousness: for he thought it a dishonour to submit to Moses: and he was very loth to lose the service of so many slaves, which was really more worth to him, than all the land they possessed in Egypt.

CHAPTER IX.

1 Then the Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh, and tell him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me.

2 For if thou refuse to let them go, and wilt hold them still,

3 Behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle which is in the field, upon the horses, upon the asses, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the sheep: there shall be a very grievous murrain.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Moses,] See vii. 1.

Go in unto Pharaoh.] It seems now he went to the palace.

And tell him, &c.] He sends the same message to him he ordered at the first (v. 3), and had continued ever since (vii. 16, &c.).

Ver. 2. If thou refuse to let them go, and wilt hold them still;] If thycovetous griping humour make thee still resolve to detain them in their slavery.

Ver. 3. Behold,] This word, as in most other places (as Dr. Jackson notes) is here a special character of the speedy execution of the plague threatened, and of the remarkable manner of its execution.

The hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle, &c.] That is, he will smite them (which is done by the hand, and is just ready to do the execution. Here is no mention of Aaron's rod, no more than in the foregoing plague, and for the same reason (see viii. 21).

A very grievous murrain,] That is, a great plague of pestilence (as we call it, in mankind), of which abundance of cattle shall die. For so the word cased (which we translate grievous) is used for numerous (see viii. 24). But the greater the number was that died, the more grievous, no doubt, was the calamity: God intended to deal more severely than formerly with him, because he had been guilty of a fraudulent contempt of his former solemn monition (viii. 29).

Ver. 4. The Lord shall sever between the cattle of Israel and the cattle of Egypt;] See viii. 22. This was the greater wonder (as the word imports), because the Israelites and Egyptians were mingled together in the land of Goshen: and their cattle breathed in the same air, and drank of the same water, &c. By which it appeared this pestilence was not natural, but proceeded, as was said before, from the hand of God.

Ver. 5. The Lord appointed a set time, saying, To morrow the Lord shall do this thing in the land.

6 And the Lord did that thing on the morrow, and all the cattle of Egypt died: but of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one.

7 And Pharaoh sent, and beheld, there was was the greater wonder (as the word imports), because the Israelites and Egyptians were mingled together in the land of Goshen: and their cattle breathed in the same air, and drank of the same water, &c. By which it appeared this pestilence was not natural, but proceeded, as was said before, from the hand of God.

Ver. 5. The Lord appointed a set time,] That they might know this stroke came from him.

To morrow the Lord shall do this thing.] This plague was threatened upon the first day of the seventh month (which afterwards was changed into the first month of the year), and inflicted on the second day.

Ver. 6. All the cattle of Egypt died:] Some survived, from ver. 19. Therefore the meaning is, either all that were in the field (ver. 3), not those in the cities or houses: or rather a great many of all sorts of cattle, as Drusius expounds it, "omne genus," all kinds: as the word all must be expounded (ver. 26, vide lib. ii. Animadvers. cap. xviii.).

But of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one.] Of any sort whatsoever.

Ver. 7. And Pharaoh sent, and beheld, there was not one of the cattle of the Israelites dead.] We do not find that he sent to make any such inquiry in the former plagues. It is likely he slighted what they said, and would not do them the honour to seem to believe them. Moses also had said nothing of this difference God would make between the Israelites and them, till the last plague; when the flies were so busy and vexatious, that it made travel uneasy: as it was like-not one of the cattle of the Israelites dead. And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, and he did not let the people go.

8 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses and unto Aaron, Take unto you handfuls of ashes of the furnace, and let Moses sprinkle it toward the heaven in the sight of Pharaoh. And it shall become small dust in all the land of Egypt, and shall be a boil breaking forth with blains upon man, and upon beast, throughout all the land of Egypt.

wise in the two other before that, when they could tread upon nothing but frogs, or lice.

The heart of Pharaoh was hardened.] One would rather have expected to hear that it relented; because he took the pains to satisfy himself that every thing foretold by Moses was come to pass; which looks as if he meant, upon the truth of that information, to alter this course. This plague likewise was much heavier than all, or most, of the preceding; which were rather more noisome and terrible (as Dr. Jackson speaks) than detrimental to Pharaoh and his people. For we do not read before this time of the death of any useful creatures, except fishes, when the waters with that burned fish were so thick that calaminy was not so universal neither, being only in the river (and some think only near the court), as this murrain, which was all over the country; and did them a far greater mischief. But having accustomed himself to do evil, he grew still more obstinate and hardened in pride and covetousness. For he doth not so much as pray to be delivered from this plague; which had done all the execution, he thought, that was designed; and he intended, perhaps, to repair his loss; which was out of all computation.

The former plague having so little moved his proud and stubborn heart, the Lord instantly, without any further message to him (as being now in hisentence, says Dr. Jackson), commands him to bring another judgment upon the Egyptians, more dreadful and noisome than any of the rest had been.

Take to you handfuls of ashes of the furnace.] In which the word of God was made them labour (Deut. iv. 20), which moved God to visit him and his people with this plague, for their cruel usage of his people there.

Let Moses sprinkle it!] The Jews think God employed him only in executing this judgment, being much heavier than all the foregoing. But both he and Aaron being commanded to take ashes (in the words foregoing), as we read they did (ver. 10), it is more probable they both sprinkled, and so the meaning is, let Moses (as well as Aaron) sprinkle it.

Toward the heaven.] To show that the plague came from thence.

In the sight of Pharaoh.] That he might be convinced of it.

Ver. 9. It shall become small dust, &c.] Instead of these ashes, which they threw up into the air, there came down a small sleet (as we call it) like that of snow, or the hoar frost, which scalded the flesh of man and beast; and raised a blister in every part upon which it fell. The poison of which penetrating into the flesh, made sore sores, like those we now call blisters. Inasmuch that, as Philo understood it (lib. i. de Vita Mosch.), they were full of blotches from head to foot. Certain it is, that the Hebrew word shechin signifies an "inflammation," that made a tumour or boil (as we translate the word, Lev. xiii. 18, 19), which turned into such a grievous ulcer, that Moses speaks of it afterwards as an awful plague, which he calls the "boch of Egypt" (Deut. xxviii. 97). Dr. Lightfoot, indeed, observes, in that the book of Job (ii. 7, 8) it signifies only a burning itch, or an inflamed scab; an intolerable dry itch, which his nails could not scratch off, but he was glad to make use of a potsherid to scratch himself. But then he concedes, this word, shechin, he often spoke of, was higher than that having blains and boils that broke out with it; which Job's had not. So that the Egyptians, he thinks, were vexed with a double punishment at once; aching boils and a fiery itch. But our interpreters take it otherwise, and say that Job also was smote with boils, which, in conclusion, perhaps, had a scab that itched very much.

Ver. 10. They took ashes of the furnace, &c.] This plague was inflicted about the third day of the seventh month, according to archbishop Usher's computation: who thinks it probable (as many others do), that from hence the tale was spread among the heathens, that the Egyptians drove the Israelites out of Egypt because they smote their cattle. For they endeavoured in future ages, to make it be believed, that what befell themselves was a plague upon the Israelites.

Ver. 11.] This plague seized on them, as well as the rest of the Egyptians, and that in the presence of Pharaoh (as these words seem to import), which perfectly confounded them. For though, since the plague of lice, which they could not endure, we see of no attempt they ventured to make to vie with miracles with Moses and Aaron, yet they still continued about Pharaoh (it appears from this place), and endeavoured to settle him in his resolution not to let Israel go; persuading him, perhaps, that though Moses for the present had triumphed over them, yet in the end they should at last be too hard for him. But those who, being on a sudden smote with these ulcers, they were so amazed, that we do not find they appeared again to look Moses in the face. For now, as the apostle speaks, "their folly was manifested to all men" (1 Tim. iii. 8, 9); in that they could not defend themselves from this terrible stroke; which publicly seizing on them before Moses, Aaron, and all his servants, rendered them so contemptible, that we never hear more of them.

Ver. 12. The Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, &c.] If we suppose that the magicians, who had hitherto confirmed Pharaoh in his obstinacy, were forced to withdraw in great confusion, when they were smitten with the last sign; one would have thought the next thing we should have heard would have been that Pharaoh relented. But here is not the least token of that mentioned in this history, but rather the express contrary; that God was so angry with him, that he himself hardened his heart, which he had never done before. This hardening, therefore, which is said to be God's doing, was something sure very extraordinary. Yet it was not an infusion of any bad qualiearly in the morning, and stand before Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me.

14 For I will at this time send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon all that thou settest thine eye upon: and I will make thee a terror, and a astonishment among all the kingdoms of the earth.

15 For I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth.

16 And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, that I might show in thee my power, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth.

Ver. 14. For I will at this time] For now I will begin to send more terrible plagues upon thee, after another, till I have destroyed thee.

Ver. 15. For I will stretch out my hand] Such as shall make thy heart ache (as we now speak); not only afflict thy body and goods, but fill thy soul with terror, or grief, or rage.

That thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth.] To teach thee, by sad experience, that my power is superior to all other. To which another reason is added in the next verse; that all the world might see the same. And a third (x. 2), that Israel might learn to worship him alone, and teach their children to do so likewise.

Ver. 15. For I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence, &c.] I do not here see how this translation can be maintained; for we do not read that God after this sent a new pestilence upon Pharaoh, and the Hebrew wordForever signifies nothing else. This, therefore, must needs refer to the time past: and the sense of these three verses (14—16), must be this: "I will send more plagues upon thee, and on thy people, and I will show thee my power, &c." (see Paulus Fagius, and Theod. Hachspan, and Fr. Junius also, who translate these words, "I had smitten thee and thy people with pestilence" (i. e. when he destroyed their cattle with a murrain), and then "hadst thou been cut off from the earth," as it follows in the end of this verse; that is, when the boils broke out upon the man that smote him.

Ver. 16. For this cause have I raised thee up.] In the Hebrew the words are, I have made thee stand; that is, preserved thee alive, when the pestilence would have cut thee off, as the murrain did thy cattle, if I had not kept thee from perishing then, that I might destroy thee in a more awful manner. And thus the LXX. understood it, when they translated it δισταται ("thou hast been preserved," that is, from destruction. With which the apostle agrees, though he doth not here follow their translation, ἵκες ἐγείρον. "I have raised thee," i. e. from the foregoing sickness (Rom. ix. 17), spared thee in the midst of malignant ulcers.

For to shew my power.] By sending more dreadful plagues upon him: and at last overwhelming him in the sea.

That my name may be declared throughout all the earth.] If Pharaoh and his people had all perished by the pestilence, when the cattle did, or died when smitten with plagues; the terror of God's powerful displeasure had not been so visible to all the world as it was in overthrowing the whole strength of Egypt in the Red Sea.

Ver. 17. As yet exaltest thou thyself against my people, &c.] In those words he returns to finish his message begun ver. 13, which he concludes with this exposition, which upbraids him with his stubborn obstinacy. Which, in other words, may be thus paraphrased: "Doest thou still (notwithstanding all the plagues) that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth."

Ver. 15. For I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth.
that I have done to humble thee) proudly insult over my people, and resolve to keep them in bondage!"

This expectation, which is very sharp and cutting, may seem to some unreasonable, now that God himself had hardened him, and taken his understanding from him; though before nothing could have been more proper, while there was a possibility of penetrating his heart. But God cannot lose his right to demand that obedience, which men have made themselves unable to pay: and it was but just he should be upbraided with his obstinacy, even when he could not comply, because he had brought upon himself this punishment out of stupid insensibility (see ver. 13).

Ver. 18, And he stretched forth his rod. As his destruction was determined, so it was to come speedily upon him; and therefore there was but one day between this plague and the former. Very grievous hail.] Great hailstones, falling very thick, as we speak.

Such as hail not been in Egypt since the foundation thereof.] Since it hath been inhabited. This shows that though rain was not frequent in Egypt, yet sometimes they had both rain and hail also. Otherwise, there could not have been a comparison made between this and former hail, if there never had been any at all.

Ver. 19. Send therefore now, and gather thy cattle, &c. It appears by the next verse, that though Pharaoh and his grandees could not be moved by all these judgments, yet there were some persons in the court who were better disposed, for whose sake God gives this warning of the danger that they might avoid it.

Ver. 20. Her that feared the word of the Lord] That which is opposed to this in the next verse, is "he that set not his heart unto the word of the Lord," or, as we translate it, regarded it not, i.e. did not attend to what was said and done by Moses, and seriously consider it. Unto which the fear of God moves all those who are possessed with it; and serious consideration will not fail to work in men the fear of God and of his judgments.

Ver. 21. He stretched forth the rod of the Lord, &c.] This was the cause of the ruin of all that perished; they did not set themselves to consider the irresistible power of him who inflicted such terrible judgments upon them, as Moses threatened. For at last they grew so stupid that they could not consider; but were perfectly infatuated.

With his rod in it, as it is explained in the margin verse; and as he had directed on other occasions (vii. 16, 17), where it is said, "Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod."
CHAPTER IX.

26 Only in the land of Goshen, where the children of Israel were, was there no hail.

27 ¶ And Pharaoh sent, and called for Moses and Aaron, and said unto them, I have sinned this time: the Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked.

28 Intreat the Lord (for it is enough) that there be no more mighty thunderings and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer.

29 And Moses said unto him, As soon as I am gone out of the city, I will spread abroad my hands unto the Lord; and the thunder shall cease, neither shall there be any more hail: that thou mayest know how that the earth is the Lord's.

30 But as for thee and thy servants, I know that ye will not yet fear the Lord God.

destroyed: though some, as appears by the following chapter, still remained.

Ver. 26. Only in the land of Goshen.] So that the Egyptians were having them fascinate the better (it is thought) at this time for their sake.

Ver. 27. Pharaoh sent, and called for Moses] This is no more than he had done several times before (viii. 8, 25), but it may seem strange he should do it now, after the Lord had hardened his heart. The clearest account of it is, that he acted now as a man distracted and frightened out of his wits: which made him rave and cry out for help, in very passionate words, without any serious meaning.

I have sinned this time, &c.] The meaning is not that he had not sinned before; but, I now acknowledge my offences, and the justice of God in punishing the wickedness of me and of my people. Which confession he made not without some heartiness and sense; as seen from the next verse, that he begg’d their prayers: for he and his servants could not always continue within doors; and while the hail lasted, there was no safety abroad.

And I will let you go.] Not quite away, but those three days’ journey into the wilderness, as they desired.

Ye shall stay no longer.] He promises to dismiss them immediately.

Ver. 29. Moses said unto him, As soon as I am gone out of the city.] By this he demonstrated the great power of God, who he knew would protect him, from receiving any harm by the thunder, lightning, and hail, which killed all others that went abroad into the fields.

I will spread abroad my hands unto the Lord.] This was an ancient posture of supplication in all nations (as many learned men have shown), whereby men declared, that God is the giver of all good things: and that they hoped to receive help from him. For our hands are the instrument: whereby we receive any gift that is bestowed upon us.

That thou mayest know how that the earth is the Lord's.] That is, to have a demonstration (which was sufficient to make him know), that the Lord governs all things: as appeared by the ceasing of this dreadful storm, upon Moses’s prayers to God, as well as by the pouring of it in such violence upon them.

31 And the flax and the barley were smitten: for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolted.

32 But the wheat and the rie were not smitten: for they were not grown up.

33 And Moses went out of the city from Pharaoh, and spread abroad his hands unto the Lord; and the thunderers and hail ceased, and the rain was not poured upon the earth.

34 And when Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail and the thunderers were ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, he and his servants.

35 And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, neither would he let the children of Israel go; as the Lord had spoken by Moses.

Ver. 30.] The generality of the court he knew would continue as obstinate as their prince; though some of them had some sense of God, and of his judgments, ver. 31, &c. (ver. 29.)

Ver. 31. The flax and the barley were smitten.] From hence our learned N. Fuller gathers, that this fell out in the month of Abib, as Archbishop Usher observes in his Annals. For it appears, by Pliny and others, that barley began to ripen in those countries in March; but wheats not till April. Heron. Conringius differs from this account a little; for he thinks (in his treatise de initio annis Sabbatiae) that this hail fell in the month of February; flax being sown here, and among the Romans, from the calends of October to the seventh of the Ides of December, as he observes out of Columella.

Ver. 32. The wheat and the rie were not smitten: for they were not grown up.] In the Hebrew, they were hidden; i. e. were as yet under ground, as Kimchi, and from him Junius and Tremellius explain it. But that cannot be the meaning; for there was but a month’s difference between the growth of wheat and of barley to maturity. And therefore Bochart hath more truly expounded the meaning (Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 3.), that they were not yet ears; and so being tender and flexible, yielded to the stroke of the hail, and received less harm than the barley which was in the ear, and the flax which was bolted.

Ver. 33. Moses went out of the city, &c.] As he had promised (ver. 29).

The rain was not poured.] It seems there was rain together with thunder and fire; which made this plague still the more wonderful. Or, by rain must be understood the shower of hail which the Lord “rained from heaven” (ver. 18), which sense is confuted by the next verse.

Ver. 34. When Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail and the thunderers were ceased.] As soon as the storm was over, and the heavens clear again.

He sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, &c.] That which should have made him acknowledge the power of God (which was as apparent in stopping the hail, as in pouring it on his country), made him the more contumacious. For seeing this danger over, he fancied there would be no more.

Ver. 35. The heart of Pharaoh was hardened, &c.] Or continued in the same mind: for God would not soften it, having resolved still to harden him, as he had begun to do (ver. 12), and did now (x. 1). For he neither moved his heart to remember his confession and his promise (ver. 27, 28), nor continued the means which extorted that seeming repentance from him. But by granting his desire, to have this stroke removed, suffered him to return to his wonted obstinacy.
CHAPTER X.

1 God threateneth to send locusts. 7 Pharaoh, moved by his servants, inclineth to let the Israelites go. 12 The plague of the locusts. 16 Pharaoh sweeth to Moses. 21 The plague of darkness. 24 Pharaoh sweeth unto Moses, 27 but yet is hardened.

1 And the Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh: for I have hardened his heart, and the heart of his servants, that I might shew these my signs before him: 2 And that thou mayest tell in the ears of thy son, and of thy son's son, what things I have wrought in Egypt, and my signs which I have done among them; that ye may know how that I am the Lord. 3 And Moses and Aaron came in unto Pharaoh, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? Let my people go, that they may serve me. 4 Else, if thou refuse to let my people go, behold, to morrow will I bring the locusts into thy coast: 5 And they shall cover the face of the earth, that one cannot be able to see the earth: and they shall eat the residue of that which is escaped, which remaineth unto you from the hail, and shall eat every tree which growth for you out of the field: 6 And they shall fill thy houses, and the houses of all thy servants, and the houses of all the Egyptians; which neither thy fathers, nor thy fathers' fathers have seen, since the day that they were upon the earth unto this day. 7 And he turned himself, and went out from Pharaoh. 8 And Pharaoh's servants said unto him, How that he had so often refused to yield; or instantly revolted from his seeming submissions.

Chap. X.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh:] Perhaps Moses might think that after seven messages delivered to him, and as many plagues for his refusal, and God's declaration that he had hardened his heart, it was to no purpose to make any new address unto him. Which it is likely he would have forbore, if he had not received this express command from God to go to him again. I have hardened his heart, &c.] This is rather a reason why he should not go; and therefore the particle ḫı is not to be translated for, but although, as it many times is used in these books, and then the sense is clear; although I have hardened his heart, yet let not that hinder thy going to him, but still importune him, because I intend to take occasion from his refusing to obey me, to work greater signs and wonders for your benefit (as it follows in the next verse), and for his ruin.

That I might shew these my signs before him:] The signs, he speaks of, were those already done since he hardened him, and those which were to follow. For he had threatened, when he said he would harden Pharaoh's heart (vii. 3), to multiply his signs and wonders in the land of Egypt.

Ver. 2. That thou mayest tell] The LXX. translate it, that ye may tell; for he speaks to Moses, as sustaining the part of the whole people of Israel.

In the ears of thy son, and of thy son's son:] All future posterity.

What things I have wrought] This may refer to the ten plagues which he inflicted on the Egyptians. My signs which I have done among them] The turning of his rod into a serpent, and two other miracles, mentioned at his first mission, are called signs (v. 8, 9, and see vii. 9, 10). That ye may know how that I am the Lord:] That there is no other God but me.

Ver. 3. And Moses and Aaron came in unto Pharaoh:] As God had commanded Moses (ver. 1), and the Lord God of the Hebrews.] This is the style wherein they began to deliver their message to him, and which they continued all along (v. 1, 3, vii. 16, &c.).

How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me?] We meet not with this chiding question in any of the former messages; which was most proper now long shall this man be a snare unto us? Let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed?

8 And Moses and Aaron were brought again unto Pharaoh: and he said unto them, Go, serve the Lord your God: but who are they that shall go?

9 And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go: for we must hold a feast unto the Lord.

10 And he said unto them, Let the Lord be teaches were like those of lions." But it is likely, Moses speaks here only of their multitude. For the prophet Joel hath such an expression, when he speaks also of their being without number (Joel i. 6), "Whose teeth are the teeth of a lion," i. e. they devoured all things greedily and speedily.

Be a snare unto us? The LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, a stumbling-block: i. e. lay before us the occasion of our falling into one calamity after another. Or, involve or entangle us in so many mischiefs.

Knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed? Dost thou not consider that so many plagues have ruined our country?

Ver. 7. Upon this advice, he commanded them to be called back again: and consented to let them go, with some limitations; to which Moses could not agree.

But who are they that shall go? In the Hebrew the words are, but who and who? that is, name the particulars. For his consent would not suffer the whole nation to go; but he would keep some fast in his hands, as a pledge for the return of the rest.

The reason of this large demand is given in the end of this verse. They did not know what and how often they must sacrifice to the Lord: and therefore it was necessary their flocks and herds should go with them. And they being to hold a feast unto the Lord, none of them were to be absent from the solemnity.

Hold a feast unto the Lord. It appears from v. 1, 3, that it was to be a feast upon a sacrifice, of which every one was to be a partaker.

Ver. 9. Let the Lord be with you, as I will let you go, &c.] Most take this for a form of approbation, as if he had said, You trust in the Lord, let him do all he can to deliver you, as I am resolved to keep you here. This justifies the truth of their observation, who say that Pharaoh at the first behaved himself like a proud fantastic humbug, who slighted all that Moses said or did; but since the plague of murrain on the cattle, and blains upon the Egyptians, like a fantastic distracted bedlam, who raved, as if his brains had been blasted (to use Dr. Jackson's phrase), with the fumes of a seared conscience.

Look to it: for evil is before you. It is uncertain, was it other he meant evil that they designed against him; or which he designed against them. The former best agrees with what follows; as if he had said, you intend a rebellion; therefore I will let none but the men go. Or, more plainly, it is visible you design some evil; i. e. you have conspired to be gone, and make a revolt. Or, it is plain and manifest, by your sudden advances, that you intend some evil. If we take it the other way, for evil which he threatened to them, the meaning must be, Mark what I say, I will take a course with you, unless you be content to go and sacrifice upon my terms; i. e. the men only.

Ver. 11. Not so.] You shall not have your will. Go now ye that are men, and serve the Lord, as ye did desire. So he interprets their demand (v. 1), pretending that women and children needed not to attend upon sacrifices.

They were driven out from Pharaoh's presence. It is likely he said, I have no more to say to you; or, you know my mind, and therefore get you gone; and then commanded his officers to thrust them out of doors; which they did with some violence. This shows he was in a fury; which made him neither regard God nor man: but reject the good counsel his own servants had given him (ver. 7), as well as the commands which Moses from God had delivered to him.

Ver. 12. Stretch out thine hand.] Upon this the Lord immediately ordered Moses to execute the just judgment. Which, as I said before, was threatened about the seventh day, and inflicted upon the next; and removed on the ninth day of Aibib. Compare ver. 4, 13, 19.

Ver. 13. Moses stretched forth his rod.] See viii. 6. The Lord brought an east wind, &c.] Though the Hebrew word kalim both properly signifies the east: yet it is sometimes used for the south, as Bochart hath demonstrated (par. ii. Hieroz. lib. i. cap. 15), and so the LXX. here understood it. For though in Arabia, which lay east of Egypt, there were great store of locusts, yet not such numbers as were in Ethiopia, which lay south of it; and abounded with them more than any country in the world. Some people there lived thither in the spring, about the vernal equinox, in vast quantities; partly by the western, and partly by the southern winds, as the same Bochart shows out of good authors (lib. iv. cap. 3). And now it was about that time of the year, when, by a wind blowing from those parts, they were brought into Egypt (see Ps. lxviii. 9).

Ver. 14. The locusts.] Being lifted up by the wind (as Pliny speaks), they fly in the air in a great cloud; which now it seems spread itself over all the land of night; and when it was morning, the east wind brought the locusts.

14 And the locusts went up over all the land of Egypt; and rested in all the coasts of Egypt: very grievous were they before them there were no such locusts as they, neither after them shall be such.

15 For they covered the face of the whole earth, so that the land was darkened; and they did eat every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left: and there remained not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field, through all the land of Egypt. 16

Then Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron in haste; and he said, I have sinned against the Lord your God, and against you. 17 Now therefore forgive, I pray thee, my sin only this once, and intreat the Lord your God, that he may take away from me this death only. 18 And he went out from Pharaoh, and intreated the Lord. 19 And the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red sea; there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt. 20 But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go. 21 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand toward heaven, that there may be no more东风 through all the land of Egypt.

That he may take away from me this death only.] We cannot, by the word ספה, hence, that the locusts killed men and women as the hail did; for the locusts, &c. are said to die as well as men (Gen. xlvi. 19; Job xiv. 8, &c.). But the locusts, destroying the supports of life, (by eating up the corn, and the grass, &c.) might, by consequence, be said to kill the people. In both which regards, Pharaoh might call them delly locusts.

Ver. 18.] Both Moses and Aaron were called to Pharaoh; and therefore now went both out; but one only is mentioned, viz. Moses; because by his prayers this plague was removed.

Ver. 19.] This is supposed to be done the next day, as I observed ver. 12, according to what is said, ver. 29.

Mighty strong west wind.] Strong winds are the only remedy to free a country from this plague, as Pliny hath observed. For if they die in those fields on which they settle, the air is so corrupted by the stench, that it breeds pestilential diseases.

The Red sea.] That which we call the Sea of Suph, i. e. of flags; as we translate the Hebrew ספעה, in the second chapter of this book, ver. 3, because it was full of a certain weed (which the Latins call alga, and the Greeks σάκες), which some travellers have affirmed to be of a red colour, and to make the water appear as if it were red also: from whence some fancy it was called the Red Sea. Certain it is it had the Hebrew name ספעה from thence being such abundance of this weed in that sea, that the inhabitants of the coast never plucking it up out of the water, and laying it in heaps to be dried by the sun, it becomes so compact that they build houses of it, as Bochart hath observed in his Phæleg. lib. iv. cap. 29. But it is most likely to have had the name of the Red Sea from this: that the Hebrews call the Sea of Suph, the nearer neighbours called the Sea of Elion, from the country which it washed, viz. Idumeæ (1 Kings ix. 26; Num. xxxi. 4). From whence the Greeks, who knew not the reason of the name, called it ἰδρυμα Σαμαραντα, the Red Sea; because Eled, in Hebrew, signifies red, as we find Gen. xxv. 29. Now this sea (which late writers call Sinus Arabicus) lies east of Egypt: and therefore a west wind was most proper to drive the locusts thither.

There remained not one locust.] The power of God appeared no less in sweeping them all away, than in bringing them upon the country: for both were done at the instance of Moses.

Ver. 20. The Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, &c.] See ix. 12. He left him to himself: and did not move him to persist in his late good resolution.

Ver. 21. The Lord said unto Moses, He left off now to treat with Pharaoh; and only proceeds in the darkness over the land of Egypt, even darkness which may be felt.

22 And Moses stretched forth his hand toward heaven; and there was a thick darkness in all the land of Egypt three days:

They saw not one another, neither rose any from his place for three days: but all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings.

24 And Pharaoh called unto Moses, and said, Go ye, serve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed: let your little ones also go with you.

execution of the sentence of utter destruction, which he had decreed against him.

Stretch out thine hand toward heaven,] See ix. 23. That there may be darkness,] So that they should not see any thing at noonday.

Even darkness which may be felt.] In the next verse he calls it thick darkness: which was made, I suppose, by such clammy fogs, that they sensibly affected the Egyptians.

Ver. 25. There was a thick darkness—three days.] Some think, that during this three days' darkness the Israelites were circumcised; when the Egyptians, by reason of being shut up in their houses, could not take any advantage of them. And so Dr. Lightfoot expounds Psalm cxvii. 28. "They rebelled not against his word;" but submitted to be circumcised. For the words seem to signify some special piece of obedience, which they then performed. The author of the Life and Death of Moses will have it, that the Egyptians continued to such a watch that they could take no advantage of them. But that which is more certain is, that if the former plague ended on the ninth day, this judgment was ordered upon the tenth of the month Abib. On which day they began to prepare for the passover, by taking up the lamb which was to be slain four days after. And God appointed this to be the first month of the year, which hitherto had been the seventh (xii. 2, 3, 4).

Ver. 23. They saw not one another.] We may well look upon this as an emblem of the blindness of their minds; which was so great, that they had not the least discerning of their approaching destruction. Some of the Roman writers mention it. For in the short time, as was counted prodigiously by Livy and Julius Obsequens. Particularly at the death of the Emperor Carus, there was such a mist, that one man could not know another (see more examples in Huetius, lib. ii. Alm. Quest. cap. 12, p. 303, &c.). But of such a darkness as this, which continued to obscure all things three days together, there is no record; but in this sacred story. Which no man hath the least reason to disbelieve; it being as easy for God to continue it for three days, as for one hour; there being also a very great reason for it, both to punish the Egyptians, and relieve the Israelites.

Neither rose any from his place] None stirred out of their houses: for they could not see one another within doors: no, not by the help of a candle, or a fire, as the author of the Book of Wisdom understood it (xvii. 5), where he also supposes, that they were afflicted with apparitions; and their own evil consciences were also a great terror to them, while they remained prisoners so long in dismal darkness. And the Psalmist justly speaks of part, when, instead of mentioning this plague of darkness (as he doth the rest which were inflicted on the Egyptians), he saith, "God sent evil angels among them" (Psalm lxxviii. 49).

25 And Moses said, Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt offerings, that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God.

26 Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God; and we know not with what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither.

27 ¶ But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let them go.

28 And Pharaoh said unto him, Get thee from me, take heed to thyself, see my face no more: for in this thing thou art a God. The children of Israel had light] Whereby they were enabled to go about their business, and get all things ready for their departure, without any notice of the Egyptians, much less any hindrance from them; who were in a mist, and could not see what they were about.

Ver. 21. Pharaoh called unto Moses.] He was so terrified by the horrible apparitions he had seen, that, at the end of the three days of darkness, he sent a messenger to call Moses: for before that time none could find their way to him. Or perhaps the meaning may be, that, in his ravishing fit, he called for Moses as if he had never seen him.

And said.] When Moses came, he made his former confession a little larger: but had not the heart to comply entirely.

Go ye, serve the Lord, &c.] It was a perfect intimation to higgle (as we speak) with Moses, and still drive his bargain as low as he could, when he was verse, and had fixed his heart on the brink of destruction. But this was the effect of his covetousness, which was incurable: and would not suffer him to part with them, but still to keep a pawn for their return to his servitude.

Let your little ones also go with you.] His blindness made him think this a great condescension, because he had denied it before (ver. 10).

Ver. 25. Sacrifices and burnt-offerings,] The difference between sacrifices and burnt-offerings, see xviii. 12. As they were to sacrifice unto the Lord their God, which was the service he required, so they were to hold a feast unto him; at which both sacrifices and burnt-offerings were necessary.

Ver. 26. Our cattle also shall go with us.] i. e. Therefore we cannot part with this cattle here, because we must use them in sacrifice, &c.

There shall not an hoof be left behind, i. e. The smallest thing. For it was a proverbial speech in the eastern countries, as appears by the like saying among the Arabians; which was first used about horses, and afterwards translated to other things; present money even to a hoof: that is, they would not part with a horse (or any other commodity) till the buyer had laid down the price of it, to a farthing, as we now speak. Or, according to the present German language, the hoof may be put for the whole beast; and the meaning be, We will not leave so much as one behind us. So Conr. Pellicanus.

For therein must we take to serve the Lord our God.] To offer sacrifice to him.

We know not with what we must serve the Lord.] Who was to appoint his own sacrifices: as he afterwards did, when they came into the wilderness.

Ver. 27. He did not incline Pharaoh to comply with this motion; but suffered him to persist in his obstinate resolution, not quite to part with them (see ver. 20).

Ver. 28. Get thee from me.] This sounds as if he intended again to have him driven from his presence (as ver. 11), so soon did he forget his own humble more; for in that day thou seest my face thou shalt die.

confessions and supplications to him (ver. 16, 17), and returned to his frantic rage and fury against him. See my face no more, &c.] A speech more foolish than proud (as Dr. Jackson observes), to come from a man whom the Lord had so much impoverished, and so often humbled; and given sufficient proofs of his power, not only to bring greater plagues immediately upon him, but to cut him off.

Ver. 29. Moses said,—I will see thy face again no more.]

That is, unless I be called for; as one would think he was: because Moses did deliver one message more to him (xii. 4—8). Though we may suppose he delivered it now; or, that he did not deliver it himself, but by some other person. But that doth not agree with the last words of ver. 8, of the next chapter. And we read also (xii. 31), that “Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron by night;” who perhaps did not go, but only receive his message.

CHAPTER XI.

1 God's message to the Israelites to borrow jewels of their neighbours. Moses threateneth Pharaoh with the death of the firstborn.

1 And the Lord said unto Moses, Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh, and upon Egypt; afterwards he will let you go hence: when he shall let you go, he shall surely thrust you out hence altogether.

2 Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Moses,] It is uncertain when the Lord spake this: I suppose it was as soon as he came out from Pharaoh, at the end of the three days' darkness; which continued the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth of the month Abib; and on the fourteenth, in the morning, Moses received this new revelation.

I will bring one plague more upon Pharaoh, and upon Egypt:] The killing of the firstborn; which was the last plague inflicted on them in Egypt.

Afterwards he will let you go hence,] Not only consent to dismiss you entirely, but he earnest with you, and urge you to depart. So we find it came to pass (xii. 31, 32).

When he will let you go hence.] Perfectly and completely, with some kind of compulsion.

Ver. 2. Speak now in the ears of the people.] Give order therefore to the Israelites, as I formerly promised to direct (iii. 21, 22).

Let every man borrow of his neighbour,] See iii. 21, 22. Unto which this may be added, that some of the ancient fathers looked upon this as a piece of justice, that they should be paid their wages for the labour they had undergone in the service of the Egyptians; which God orders in this manner. So Epiphanius, in his Ancoratus, Num. exiti. exitii. 1, where he gives this account of the Israelites spilling the Egyptians, that they had served them a long time for nothing (he makes account 215 years), and therefore oxix ἡμεῖς ἐξάγεται καὶ ἐξήρανσαν τὰ δώρα them. &c. “was it not just, both before God and man, that their wages should be paid them before they left the country?” See Paterius on that place. And Harper, lxvi. lxvi. lxxi., and Ireanaeus, lib. iv. cap. 49. Tertull. adv. Marcion. lib. ii. cap. 39. And so the author of the Book of the Apocalypse (xi. 17), where he saith, the Lord gave the Israelites the goods of the Egyptians, μουσών φοίνικας ὀτρύννων, the reward of their labours. (See more, xii. 35).

Ver. 3. The Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians.] According to his promise (iii. 21).

29 And Moses said, Thou hast spoken well, I will see thy face again no more.

3 And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians. Moreover the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people.

4 And Moses said, Thus saith the Lord, About midnight will I go out into the midst of Egypt:

5 And all the firstborn in the land of Egypt Moses was very great.] This seems to be given as a reason, both why the court durst not meddle with Moses, though he had brought so many plagues upon them; and why the people were forward to grant the Israelites what they desired, because they all highly esteemed him, and had him in great reverence, as a person that had extraordinary power with God: from whence some think it credible, that their posterity might give him Divine honours, as is reported by some ancient writers.

Ver. 4. Moses said, Thus saith the Lord,] It is manifest (from ver. 8), that these words were spoken from the Lord to Pharaoh; but it is a great question, when they were spoken. It is commonly thought that Moses said this, when he first parted with Pharaoh, and told him, he would see his face no more (x. 29). And when the first words of this chapter must be translated in the time past, the Lord had said unto Moses, that he would bring one plague more upon the Egyptians: which he now denounced to Pharaoh, because he said he should not have the liberty of being admitted to him again. Or else Pharaoh, contrary to his peremptory resolution, sent once more to speak with Moses; as it is plain he did after the firstborn were slain (xii. 31).

About midnight:] About the midst of the following night. For they having kept the passover, in the evening of this fourteenth day of Abib, the firstborn were slain in the middle of that night. Not precisely (the Hebrew indicates) but it might be a little before or after midnight (see Theodoric Hackspan, of such kind of speeches. Disput. de Locut. Sacris, N. iv.).

Will I go out?] By an angel, who was sent from the Shechinah (which resided in some part of the land of Goshen), and ordered to go and do this execution. Into the midst of Egypt:] Perhaps he means the royal city; where he began this execution, and then smote the whole country round about.

Ver. 5. All the firstborn in the land of Egypt shall die.] This was the sorest plague that had been hitherto inflicted: nothing being so dear to parents as their children, especially their firstborn.
CHAPTER XII.

shall die, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even unto the firstborn of the maidservant that is behind the mill; and all the firstborn of beasts.

6 And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be like it any more.

7 But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast; that ye may know how that the Lord doeth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel.

From the firstborn of Pharaoh, &c.] i. e. From the highest to the meanest person in the kingdom.

That sitteth upon his throne;] It is uncertain whether this relate to Pharaoh, or to his firstborn.
The LXX. seem to incline to the former; having left out the proper his, and simply translated it, that sitteth upon the throne. But the Chaldee determines it to the latter, by translating it, who is to sit upon the throne of his kingdom; i. e. to be Pharaoh’s successor, the heir of the kingdom of Egypt.

The maidservant that is behind the mill.] None were more miserable than those slaves, whose work it was to turn a mill with their hands, and grind corn perpetually; especially when they were condemned to this in a prison, say, in a dungeon: that so we are to understand this, appears from xii. 29. The ancient com-dians often mention this; and we find an instance of such drudgery in the story of Samson (Judg. xvi. 21).

Ver. 6.] The calamity being general in every house, ith made a general and very loud lamentation: men, women, children, and servants, bewailing the loss of the prime person in the family.

Ver. 7.] A great wonder! that when so many thousand people were upon their march, with abundance of cattle, &c. not a dog should stir; who, though never so gentle, yet commonly bark when they hear the least noise, especially in the night. All travellers know this.

A difference between the Egyptians and Israel.] This was indeed a plain testimony of God’s special care and providence over the Israelites: that when there was such a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt
(ver. 6), all was quiet, still, and silent among them.

Ver. 8.] You that now forbid me to come to you (for Pharaoh himself is included, it appears from xii. 31, &c.) shall be forced to come to me; and submissively entreat, my press me to be gone, &c.

Come down] It was a descent from that part of Egypt where the court was, unto Goshen: though it may simply signify, come to me,

Get thee out, and all the people that follow thee.] In the Hebrew the words are, that is at thy feet; that is, to the very last man. For they that bring up the roar,

8 And all these thy servants shall come down unto me, and bow down themselves unto me, saying, Get thee out, and all the people that follow thee: and after that I will go out. And he went out from Pharaoh in a great anger.

9 And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you; that my wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt.

10 And Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh: and the Lord hardened Pharaoh’s heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of his land.

as we speak, or march last after their commander, said in Scripture, to be at their feet: as Wagenesel hath observed in his confutation of R. Lipman’s Carmen Memoriale (see Gen. xlii. 10).

After that I will go out.] When you shall think I oblige you, to leave your country.

He went out from Pharaoh in a great anger.] It moved the meekest man on earth to a just indignation (which, it is likely, he expressed in his countenance and behaviour) to see Pharaoh remain so stupidly insensible as not to regard this threatening; which he well might think would be as certainly executed as all the rest had been.

Ver. 9. Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you;] That is, I told thee at the first how it would be, and the reason of it (iii. 19, 20). Of which it was very proper to put Moses in mind at this time, when he was going to fulfil the last part of these words: “after that (after this last plague) he will let you go.”

That my wonders may be multiplied.] That he might do one wonder after another until he had finished Pharaoh’s destruction (see x. 2).

Ver. 10. Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh;] This seems to be a summary of what hath been said hitherto, concerning the wonderful plagues of Egypt: which as God designed to inflict upon that country, so he did, by Moses and Aaron as his instruments.

The Lord hardened Pharaoh’s heart; &c.] The obstinacy of Pharaoh, under several severe judgments, is so notorious, that it need be no wonder that the Lord himself hardened his heart, so that he would not suff er the people to depart, until what is here threatened was executed upon him. There is nothing more agreeable to the rules of justice, than to inflict heavy judgments upon contaminous offenders; and no punishment heavier than to let them undo themselves by their own wickedness, and blindly run on, without any stop, in their evil courses unto utter ruin. This was the case of Pharaoh; of which the heathen had a broken notion, when they said, Quos Jupiter vult pudere, prius deminet: “Those whom God intends to destroy, he first infatuates.”

CHAPTER XII.

1 The beginning of the year is changed. 2 The passover is instituted. 11 The rite of the passover. 15 Unleavened bread. 29 The firstborn are slain. 31 The Israelites are driven out of the land. 37 They come to Succoth. 43 The ordinance of the passover.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt, saying,

2 This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you.

§ Speak ye unto all the congregation of of this to them: but it is very likely it was on the tenth day of this month, before he brought the plague of darkness on the land; wherein he gave the Israelites

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1.] We are not told here when the Lord spake
Vol. I.—31
Israel, saying, In the tenth day of this month they shall take to them every man a lamb, according to the house of their fathers, a lamb for an house: 4 And if the household be too little for the lamb, let him and his neighbour reckon together unto his house, sign. Thus the author of the Chronicon Orientale, in express words: "This was the day in which the sun entered the first sign of Aries, and was most solemn among the Egyptians." And therefore God commanded the Israelites to sacrifice that creature which they worshipped. But there is no certainty of this, nor of what the author of Pseudo-amon, that the feast of the Egyptians being at its height on the fourteenth day, God ordered the killing of this lamb at that time: which was the greatest contempt of their Corni- ger Ammon (whom they worshipped then with the greatest honours), showing he could be no god whom the Israelites should be afraid to sacrifice.

A lamb.] The word sed signifies a kid as well as a lamb (Numb. xx. 11; Deut. xix. 4), and it is evident from the fifth verse of this chapter, that they might take either of them for this sacrifice. But commonly they made choice of a lamb, as the fittest of the two; being of a more mild and innocent nature. They that are of opinion, the Egyptians now worshipped such creatures, imagine also this was ordained to preserve the Israelites from their idolatry, by commanding them to kill such beasts as they. So R. Levi ben Gerson, God intended by this, "to expel out of the minds of the Israelites the evil opinion of the Egyptians," &c.

In house.] Some translate it for a family. But that would not true, for these tribes were divided into families, so were families into houses; (see how many lambs were few enough for a whole family, some houses were no small that they could not eat one, and therefore were to call in the assistance of their neighbours, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 4. If the household be too little.] They were not to number ten persons, nor more than twenty, to the eating of one lamb. At which meal, men, women, and children, masters and servants (if it were in a private family,) were entertained, and every one did eat a piece at least as big as an olive, if we may believe the He-brow doctors.

Every man according to his eating.] This is, every member of a house shall take such a number of persons to him, as will suffice for the eating of the lamb.

Ver. 5. Your lamb shall be without blemish.] Because the male was counted more excellent than the female (Mal. i. 14), and therefore all whole burnt-offerings (which were the perfect sort of sacrifices) were to be males only (Lev. i. 3, 6). From hence this custom (as Bochart thinks) was desired among the Egyptians; who offered only males, as he proves out of Herodotus, &c. (see 2. Hieroz. ib. ii. cap. 33, 50). But whatsoever the Egyptians did, the Pharaohs did otherwise: for Servius saith (in Aeneid, viii.) In omnibus sacris femininis generis plus valent victimæ; "that sacrifices of the female kind were of greater value in all their holy offices." Such different fancies there were in the world in after ages; but what opinions they had in Moses' time, none can certainly resolve.

6 And ye shall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the same month: and the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening.

7 And they shall take of the blood, and strike it on the two side posts and on the upper door post of the houses, wherein they shall eat it.

Of the first year:] It doth not signify that the lamb was to be a year old (for then it was incapable to be offered) but under a year old. It was fit for sacrifice at eight days old, though not before, xxii. 30, Lev. xxi. 27, (where laws, Maimonides saith, were observed concerning the paschal lamb, as they were in the daily sacrifice, Exod. xxix. 38; Numb. xxxviii. 3, and in others, Lev. xxviii. 18, 19,) and so it continued fit from that time till it was a year old; after which it was not accepted. For which Bochart gives a very likely reason in the forenamed book (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50, p. 558).

6. Ye shall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the same month.] When it was to be offered to God by all the people, as our Saviour was upon the very same day. Which the Jews expected, as appears by a memorable passage which Andr. Masius (in Josi. v. 10), quotes out of that tract in the Talmud, called Rosh Hashanah, where they say it was a "famous and old opinion amongst the ancient Jews, in the day of the year which was the beginning of the Israelites' deliverance out of Egypt, should in future time be the beginning of the redemption by the Messiah," Which was wonderfully fulfilled in our Lord and Saviour; who keeping the Passover the day before the rulers of the Jews observed it, it fell out that he, the true Lamb of God, was offered on that very day, which shall hereafter be appointed for the offering this typical sacrifice.

The whole assembly—shall kill it] God hereby grants a liberty to any man among the Israelites to kill the Passover. Which act did not make him a priest (whose work it was to offer the blood), for in other sacrifices any man that brought them might do the same (Lev. i. 3, 4, 5), and this is given as a reason, why the people did not kill the Passover in Hezekiah's time, because they were unclean; and therefore the Levites had the charge of it (2 Chron. xxx. 17).

But, besides this, Moses seems to mean that all the company who were to eat, were to be present at the sacrifice: by which means, the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel was put into this service. And this was exactly also fulfilled in our blessed Saviour (whom the apostle calls our Passover), against whom the priests, and scribes, and Pharisees, and all the people, conspired to take away his life.

In the evening:] In the Hebrew the words are (as is noted in the margin of our Bibles), between the two evenings. The first of which began, when the sun began to set, and lasted till sun-set. Then began the second evening, and lasted till night. Between these two evenings, about the middle of them, was the Passover offered. For after the offering of incense, they began on this day to kill the daily evening sacrifice, between two and three in the afternoon (a little sooner than on other days), and having finished that, and trimmed the lamps (as Maimonides in this treatise on this subject, cap. i. sect. 4, describes the order of it), they went about the paschal sacrifice; which continued till sun-setting. That is, there were about two hours and a half for the despatch of all the lambs. For the daily evening sacrifice, and all belonging to it, being over in an hour's time (by half an hour after three), all the rest of the day till sun-set (which was two hours and a half at the time of the year) remained for the killing of the paschal lambs. (See Bochart, Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50, p. 558, and our learned Dr. Lightfoot, in his gleaning on Exodus.) Now our three o'clock in the afternoon being the same with the Jewish Passover, and the daily offering of our Blessed Saviour offered up himself to God for our redemption about the same time that this lamb was slain, for their deliverance out of Egypt (Mark xv. 34, 37).

Ver. 7. Take of the blood.] Which was the means that God now appointed for their preservation.

Strike it by dipping a bunch of hyssop into it (ver. 22).

On the two side posts; Upon which folding doors moved. For from thence, Bochart thinks, they had their name in the Hebrew.

Upper door post] The Hebrew word maskuph is nowhere to be found but in this chapter; and its carrying in it a signification of looking through may induce us to think they had lattices at the top of their doors, through which they could peep, to see who knocked, before they opened them. Both these were sprinkled with the blood, but not the threshold, lest any body should tread upon it, which had been profane, this being a holy thing. This striking or sprinkling of the blood upon the posts, seems to have been peculiar to the first passover at their going out of Egypt; and that he and his family may have observed them afterwards, when there was not the same occasion for it, viz. to distinguish their houses from the Egyptians, for their preservation from the destroying angel.

Of the houses,] In which the whole nation was gathered together; and all delivered.

Ver. 8. Eat the flesh in that night.] For it was not lawful to let any of it remain till the morning. (ver. 10.) And the Hebrews say, they were to eat it after they had supper, and were well filled with other meat.

Roast with fire.] Neither raw, nor sodden (as it follows in the next verse) for it might be sooner roasted than sodden: and they were in haste to be gone when they were offered.

Unleavened bread.] Partly to put them in mind of their hardships in Egypt (for unleavened bread is heavy and unsavoury) and partly to commemorate their deliverance from thence in such haste, that they had not time to leaven it, ver. 39; Dent. xvi. 3.

Bitter herbs] They were used for the same end, to put them in mind of their hard bondage in Egypt, which made not the heart sad. But we have not the mention of them in the Mosaic laws, as Maimonides says, there were five of these herbs, whose names he mentions: but it is hard for us to tell what they were. That great man Bochartus hath given some guesses at them; and thinks the first of them was wild lettuce, which is extremely bitter (see Hierozon. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50, p. 563, &c., and his dispensation, lib. ii. cap. 15, p. 567). There were there in aftertimes; when, in some of the gentle loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste: it is the Lord's passover.

12 For I will pass through the land of Egypt, and will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, and wickedness shall overtake them: but on you will I pass by, and all the beasts of the field shall go before you, and the flocks shall follow you; and the land which I go into will I give you a inheritance, a land flowing with milk and honey.

feasts (particularly those of Bacchus) which had their original in Egypt (as Herodotus tells us, lib. ii. cap. 49, and Plutarch also, lib. de Isid. at Osiris,); they were the members of living creatures in pieces, and did eat them, blood running about their mouths, as Julius Firmicus observes. But the opinion of Theodorot seems to me probable (Serm. x. Πρωτοεκκλησίων), that in that old time, the wicked demons were in love with the sacrificing of men to them; but when they saw mankind begin to abhor such sacrifices, and to abstain from them, as abominable cruelty, then they invented τὰς διαμετοχὰς καὶ ἑφοδίας, &c. “Scourgings and whippings, eating of raw flesh, and other such rites” (tom iv. p. 625).

Nor sodden] It seems superfluous to say sodden, or boiled, with water; there being no other way of cooking the flesh of the Hebrew word bashal signifying to roast, as well as to boil, according to the manner, is, Moses takes away that ambiguity, by adding with water; and also by expressly naming the opposite to it, but roast with fire. Which was ordained in opposition to some gentle customs in the eastern countries (If they were so ancient as the times of Moses), where they burnt the flesh of their sacrifices, when they prayed to their gods against drought, by the scorching heat of the sun. So Athenaeus relates, out of Philocorus, that the Athenians did, in their sacrifices to the θεόν, who came, in all likelihood, from the Egyptian Horus, which signifies Apollo, or the sun. The Zabili also were wont to boil kids in milk. (roast with fire.) Contrary to the manner in all other peace offerings, those flesh, that was allowed to be eaten, either by priest or people, was to be sodden; even in the feast of the passover: as we read expressly 2 Chron. xxxv. 18, where these things are accurately distinguished. And Maimonides gives this as the reason of it (why they are commanded to eat it roasted), because they went out in great haste, and had not time to boil it (par. iii. Moreh Nevi. cap. 46). Some of the gentiles in aftertimes roasted their meat in the sun, as Heliodorus tells us, lib. i. Ethiop. And some Grecian woman (as Plutarch tells us) did the same in their feast called Θεσμοφορία.

His head with his legs.] They were to roast the lamb whole; to avoid perhaps the superstition of the gentiles, who went not to take the bowels of their sacrifices, to make curious observations thereupon, and also (in the Θεσμοφορία of Bacchus) thought themselves full of their deity, when they ate the entrails of their sacrifices, with the blood running about their mouths, as Arnonius tells us.

Ver. 10. Let nothing of it remain until the morning.] This was a law of mystical sacrifices (Lev. xxii. 30), and before that, Lev. xi. 45, whereby there was an exception in the two following verses, 16, 17, for sacrifices that were a vow, or a voluntary offering, by which God provided that holy things should not be in danger to be corrupted, or put to profane uses; and that they might not lose their just estimation: an even common meat doth, which is not so much valued when it is not till the next day told; for men desire that which is fresh and newly dressed.

In this paschal sacrifice, also, it was the more necessary it should not remain, lest they should have been forced, either to carry it away with them, which might have been troublesome; or, if, they left it behind them, it might have been profaned, and exposed to contempt by the Egyptians, or at least have been corrupted, which would not have been esteemed so holy a meat. Besides, there might have been danger also of turning such reliks to superstitions uses, as the heathens went on: God working as a great deliverance by the one, and the other. And this we may the rather think, because it is certain, that the ancient idolaters were wont to save some part of their sacrifices for superstitions purposes, as appears from Baruch vi. 27. Herodotus testifies the same concerning the ancient Persians (lib. i. cap. 132). Which the Hebrews might have been easily inclined to do, if they had on their remains of this sacrifice, which had such wonderful effects for their preservation.

And that which remaineth of it—if ye shall burn with fire.] We read in Macrobius of such a custom among the ancient Romans, in a feast called Protervia; where the manner was (as Flavians there saith), ut si quid ex epulis superfluisset, igne consumatur: “that if by any chance any left of the food, it should be consumed with fire.” (lib. i. Saturnalia, 27).

Ver. 11. Thus shall ye eat it.] He here orders the habit and posture wherein they should partake of the passover: which was like travellers, or like those who were going about some laborious work. So the three following particulars plainly import.

With your loins girded.] They wearing long and loose garments in the eastern countries, it was necessary to tie them up, and gird them about their loins, whencesover they either went a journey, or undertook, as I said, any great labour; that so their garments might not be an impediment to them, as they would have been, if they had hung down about their heels (see 2 Kings iv. 29).

Your shoes on your feet.] Many fancy this refers to the ancient custom of putting off their shoes (which God now forbids) when they went to eat, lest they should make the beds dirty, on which they lay leaning. But Bochart hath demonstrated that this custom was not so ancient; but that in Moses’s time, till after, they sat at their tables as we do now: of which the ancient have given many instances, in the book of Genesis, and elsewhere. And there, it is more likely the Jews were wont to go without shoes, when they were in Egypt; for anciently men did so; and that being a hot country, there was no need of them. And besides, they were so oppressed, that they may well be supposed to want many such conveniences of life. But now God commands them to put on shoes, being to travel a long journey (see his Hierozoloe, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50, p. 508).

Your staff in your hand.] Still the posture of travellers, who never went without a staff; both to support them in slippery places, and to defend them against assaults (Gen. xxxiii. 10). They seem now to have eaten the lamb, leaning on their staves; and therefore stood all the time, as men ready to depart. But these were things peculiar only to that passover which they kept in Egypt: afterwards they were not tied to them.

In haste.] As men expecting every moment to begin their journey. This was the foundation of many of the laws about the passover, as Maimonides observes (par. iii. Moreh Nevi. cap. 46).

It is the Lord’s passover.] To be kept in memory of his wonderful mercy in sparing the Israelites, when he destroyed the Egyptians, and delivering them from their cruel bondage.

Ver. 12.] See xii. 4.
CHAPTER XII.

This night, and will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am the Lord.

13 And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are: and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt.

14 And this day shall be unto you for a memo-

Will smite all the firstborn, &c.] A most grievous judgment; all children being very dear to their parents, especially their firstborn; and those more especially who were their only children, as it is likely they were too many in Egypt. It was the sorer plague also, because no man’s children were spared, that he might comfort his neighbours; but they were all at the same time bewailing their loss. It is not certain by what sort of death they were smitten; but it was sudden, and extinguished them all in the same moment.

Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment.] And so Moses tells us he did, Num. xxxiiii.

4. From whence it appears that the Egyptians were idolaters in Moses’s days; and the Jewish doctors will have it, that all their idols were destroyed this night. So Jonathan in his Paraphrase: “Their molten images were dissolved and melted down; their images of wood were broken in pieces; their images made of earth were crumbled into bits, and their wooden ones reduced to ashes.” Of the truth of which we cannot be assured; though we meet with it not only in Piele Elizer, cap. 48, but in the author of Libre hajamin, &c. or, the Life and Death of Moses; whose words are these: “All the first-born in the land of Egypt were destroyed this night, and their images also and pictures destroyed; whereupon the Jews borrowing gold, silver, and garments of the Egyptians, they went away laden with riches, according to what God said to Abraham (Gen. xv. 14), ‘That nation whom they serve will I judge; and afterward shall they come out with great substance.’”

This the heathen seem to have understood (for this story reached them); and carried away the gold and silver and garments of the Egyptian idols: for so Trogus reports it (Justin, lib. xxxvi. cap. 2), that when Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, Sacra Egyptiorum furo abiustit: “he stole away the holy things of the Egyptians,” which he makes the reason why Pharaoh pursued them. Artapanus also in Eusebius saith, that most of their temples were overthrown by an earthquake (lib. ix. Praepar. Evang. cap. 27).

There are those, who by Elohim understand nothing but their princes or judges, the great men of the kingdom, upon whom the judgment of God was now executed. But another place in this book (xx. 23) plainly shews them to signify Israel and Egypt.

I am the Lord.] There is no other God but me: as he had said he would make both the Israelites and Pharaoh also to know (x. 2, xi. 7).

Ver. 13. The blood shall be to you for a token.] Or a sign, by which the Israelites were assured of safety and deliverance from the destroying angel. Of which token, if we may believe Epiphanius, there was a memorial preserved even among the Egyptians themselves, though they were ignorant of the original of their own rites. For at the equinox (which was the time of the passover) they marked their cattle and their trees, and one another in 🥰шка, with red ochre, or some such thing, which they fancied would be a preservative to them.

Would smite all the firstborn, &c.] A most grievous judgment; all children being very dear to their parents, especially their firstborn; and those more especially who were their only children, as it is likely they were too many in Egypt. It was the sorer plague also, because no man’s children were spared, that he might comfort his neighbours; but they were all at the same time bewailing their loss. Ver. 13. The blood shall be to you for a token.] Or a sign, by which the Israelites were assured of safety and deliverance from the destroying angel. Of which token, if we may believe Epiphanius, there was a memorial preserved even among the Egyptians themselves, though they were ignorant of the original of their own rites. For at the equinox (which was the time of the passover) they marked their cattle and their trees, and one another in 🥰шка, with red ochre, or some such thing, which they fancied would be a preservative to them.

And ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations: ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance for ever.

15 Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread; even the first day ye shall put away leaven out of your houses: for whosoever eateth leavened bread from the first day until the seventh day, that soul shall be cut off from Israel.

16 And in the first day there shall be an holy convocation, and in the seventh day there shall be a holy convocation.

When I see the blood.] Wheresoever my angel finds this blood upon the door-posts.

I will pass over you, &c.] Here is the reason of the name of passover, &c. (see Ex. xii. 14; or pesach, or passa, as it is called by the Chaldees; because God ordered his angel to pass over, or pass by, the children of Israel, and not to smite anybody in their families, when he smote every firstborn of the Egyptians (ver. 23).

Ver. 14. This day shall be unto you a memorial.] To preserve in mind God’s wonderful works, which “he made to them, and saved them” (cap. 10), that is ordered and disposed things in such a manner, that they should not be forgotten: particularly by instituting a festival solemnity upon this day, as it here follows.

Ye shall keep it a feast.] Called the feast of the passover: the rites of which are all manifestly con-

And an ordinance for ever.] To the end of that economy. For it often signifies only a long duration, as Deut. xv. 17. And here imports no more, but that they should keep this ordinance, not only now, but when they came into the land of Canaan.

Ver. 15. Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread.] The seven days following the feast of the passover, were observed as a distinct festival, and called “the feast of unleavened bread” (ver. 17), because no bread that had any leaven in it, might be eaten all that time. Which the Jews explain thus: that not that they were bound to eat unleavened bread all those seven days (which was necessary only on that night when the passover was killed), but only not to eat leavened bread. That was utterly unlawful; but they might eat rice, or parched corn, or any such thing (see Pa-Trovius in Epiph. Havres. lxx. n. 11).

At their march, indeed, out of Egypt, they were forced to eat unleavened bread (having none else to eat) not only for seven days, but for a whole month: that is, from the fifteenth of the first month, to the fifteenth and sixteenth of the next, when God gave them manna and quails (xvi. 1, 12, 13). But necessity, as I said, compelled them to this; they having nothing else to support them in the wilderness during that time; because through haste, they were con-

That soul shall be cut off.] See concerning this cereth (or cutting off), which is often mentioned in these books, Gen. xvii. 14. Most think it a punishment by the hand of God, and not of man.

Ver. 16.] The first and the last days of the feast of unleavened bread were kept holy (the other five were working days), because, as God delivered them from their cruel bondage in Egypt upon the first day, be an holy convocation to you; no manner of work shall be done in them, save that which every man must eat, that only may be done of you.

17 And ye shall observe the feast of unleavened bread; for in this selfsame day have I brought your armies out of the land of Egypt: therefore shall ye observe this day in your generations by an ordinance for ever.

18 In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month at even, ye shall eat unleavened bread, until the one and twentieth day of the month at even.

so he overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea upon the seventh.

No manner of work shall be done in them.] No manner of work (see Ex. xxiii. 7, 8).

Save that which every man must eat, &c.] He that did any other work was to be beaten. For they equal these days with the Sabbath in this regard; that whatsoever work was forbidden on the Sabbath might not be done on any such days as these, which they call good days. But they might provide good cheer on those days; though not more meat than could be eaten. See Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 19, where he shows at large what things might be done, and what not on these days, according to the opinion of their doctors.

Ver. 17. Ye shall observe the feast of unleavened bread, &c.] He repeats it again because it was a thing of great moment, to have these seven days observed entirely, and not only the passover upon the fourteenth day in the evening: that they might every year think so long of God's great goodness, in delivering them from their miserable condition in Egypt, as not to let the sense of so singular a benefit slip at any time quite out of their minds.

Ver. 18. In the first month, on the fourteenth day] The passover was celebrated at the conclusion of the fourteenth day of this month; just before the beginning of the fifteenth day. For the next morning, when the Israelites, immediately after they had eaten the lamb, were hastened out of Egypt, was not part of the fourteenth day, but of the fifteenth: as we read Numb. xxxii. 3.

That is, for seven days (as was said before, ver. 15, and again is repeated ver. 19), which began immediately after the eating the paschal lamb, in the end of the fourteenth day. For if they should be reckoned from the beginning of the fourteenth day, there would be not seven, but eight days of unleavened bread.

Ver. 19. Seven days shall there be no leaven found in your houses.] This still makes the precept stricter; that they were not only to abstain from any thing leavened, but not so much as to have it in their habitations. Accordingly the Jews tell us, of an exact search which every one was bound to make, with lighted wax candles, lest it should remain in any corner of their houses. Their scrupulosity in this matter is exactly described by Buxtorf, in his Synag. Jud. cap. 17, p. 394, &c.

Whether he be a stranger, &c.] This is one of another nation; but had embraced the Jewish religion, by receiving circumcision. For none else were admitted to eat of the passover (ver. 48). Such a person was called a proselyt, or proselytus.

Ver. 20. Ye shall eat nothing leavened;] This according to the Jews, explains what follows: "In all your habitations shall ye eat unleavened bread."

19 Seven days shall there be no leaven found in your houses: for whosoever eateth that which is leavened, even that soul shall be cut off from the congregation of Israel, whether he be a stranger, or born in the land.

20 Ye shall eat nothing leavened; in all your habitations shall ye eat unleavened bread.

21 ¶ Then Moses called for all the elders of Israel, and said unto them, Draw out and take you a lamb according to your families, and kill the passover.

22 And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the bason, and strike the lintel and the two side posts with the blood that is in the bason; and none of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning. 23 And the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two side posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you. 24 And ye shall observe this thing for an ordinance to thee and to thy sons for ever. 25 And it shall come to pass, when ye be come to the land which the Lord will give you, according as he hath promised, that ye shall keep this service.

Whence it is that Hesychius calls this herb ἐνίκειον, "an astringent and purging herb," because it was appointed by the law of Moses for this purpose; otherwise, there is nothing astringent in its nature.

Dip it in the blood that is in the bason.] The Hebrew word שְׁפָחָה, which is here translated bason, is translated cup in Exod. xvi. 2; and סָפָחָה, here translated sprinkle, is rendered sprinkle in Exod. xii. 21, to signify the door or threshold of the house where some suppose the lamb was killed. Certain it is, that some of the vessels of the sanctuary are called in the plural number sippirim and sippoth (1 Kings vii. 50; Jer. lii. 19), though the vessels which received the blood of the beast at the altar of burnt-offerings are called by another name (in Isaiah xlii. 20, et al.). There were no such now, and therefore they received the blood at present in a common bason or cup.

Strike the lintel, &c.] Or sprinkle it, as many understand it. For there being, as yet, no altar, the blood is ordered to be sprinkled in this manner: having in it something of the nature of a propitiation. Because by this sprinkling of the blood, God's displeasure was turned away from the Israelites, when it fell upon those houses where his blood was not seen.

The two side posts.] See ver. 7.

None of you shall go out at the door] The destroying angel could have discerned an Israelite from an Egyptian though he had met him in the street; but this was required to teach them that their safety came not by his going among them in the form of a man, but by the preservation of the blood of this lamb, which was shed to save their blood from being spilt. Thus in the flood there was no safety but in the ark: nor could Rahab have been saved, when Jericho was destroyed, out of the house where the scarlet thread was tied.

Until the morning.] When they were importuned by the Egyptians very early (not long after midnight, ver. 21, &c.) to be gone with all they had, out of their country.

Ver. 23. For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians: As he had threatened (ver. 12). For he rehearses to the elders what God had told him. When he seeth the blood, &c.] So he had promised before (ver. 12). Maimonides being of the opinion that the Zabíli and other idolaters abhorred the killing of such creatures, thinks that God ordained this killing of the lamb, &c. both to purge the minds of the Jews from such false opinions, and make profession of the contrary; and to persuade men that that action which they accounted deadly preserved from death; according to these words, the Lord shall pass over the door, &c. (Par. iii. Mere Nevech, cap. 46).

Ver. 24. Ye shall observe this thing, &c.] Keep this feast, by sacrificing a lamb, and eating no leavened bread: though some of the ceremonies wherewith it was now observed, in aftertimes were not necessary.

26 And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? 27 That ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses. And the people bowed the head and worshipped. 28 And the children of Israel went away, and did as the Lord had commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they. 29 ¶ And it came to pass, that at midnight the Lord smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the firstborn of the captive that

Ver. 25. When ye come to the land which the Lord will give you, &c.] This deliverance is not to be forgotten when God hath given you rest, in the land he hath promised you. But there you are most carefully to preserve the memory of it, by keeping this feast every year. And, indeed, most think they were not bound to keep it till they came thither: but what they did was but an act of thanksgiving, the next year was by a special direction, not by virtue of the command in this chapter (Numb. ix. 1, 2, &c.). Ye shall keep this service.] In all things, except what was proper and peculiar to their coming out of Egypt.

Ver. 26. When your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service?] When children were of twelve years old, their parents were bound to bring them to the temple; where, seeing what was done at this festival, they would be apt to inquire into the meaning of it. At every feast also of the passover, the eldest person at the table instructed all the younger sort, that were there present, in the reason of this institution, rehearsing these very words, as Conradus Pellicanus observes: "This is the sacrifice of the passover, in remembrance that the Lord passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses."

Ver. 27. It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover.] Or, the sacrifice of the passover to the Lord: i.e. in honour of the Lord, who passed over the Israelites, when he smote the Egyptians. It is frequently called by the name of the passover (xii. 12, 13, xx. 25, xxix. 22), and it is called korban; which is a name given only to those things which were brought to be offered up to God. See Numb. ix. 13, where, as it is called korban, so the same word is used for bringing it, which is commonly used about other sacrifices. And it further appears to have been properly a sacrifice, by the rites belonging to it: for the blood of it was sprinkled by the priests (2 Chron. xxx. 16, xxxv. 11). Which, though it could not be done here, because they had no altar in Egypt; yet the posts of their houses (as I observed before) were sprinkled with it; and it had an effect accordingly.

The people.] To whom the elders (ver. 21), reported these things from Moses. Bowed the head and worshipped.] Expressed their belief of what Moses had said; and humbly acknowledged God's goodness to them.

Ver. 28. The children of Israel went away.] To their several habitations.

And did as the Lord had commanded Moses and Aaron.] (ver. 1) They kept the passover.

So did they. According to all the forenamed rites belonging to it.

Ver. 29. At midnight the Lord smote, &c.] According to the foregoing threatening (xi. 4, 5), see there. The captive that was in the dungeon.] The pit or was in the dungeon; and all the firstborn of cattle.

30 And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he, and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead.

31 ¶ And he called for Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel; and go, serve the Lord, as ye have said.

32 Also take your flocks and your herds, as ye have said, and be gone; and bless me also.

33 And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We be all dead men.

34 And the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneadingtroughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders.

35 And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment:

36 And the Lord gave the people favour in dead, had reason to conclude the next blow would be at his own life.

Send them out of the land:] This shows they were not merely dismissed, but entreated, nay, importuned, to depart. Such a change had this slaughter, and the general outcry that followed upon it, made in their hearts.

In haste:] They that were unwilling before to hearken to the Israelites' petition, now make their preparation to go. The day was evening, and was come upon them. If they would not suffer them to delay their departure: nay, made a golden bridge (as we speak) for their speedy passage out of Egypt (ver. 33, 36).

We be all dead men:] They were desirous the Israelites should enjoy their liberty, rather than they lose their own lives.

Ver. 32. The people took their dough before it was leavened.] They seemed to have newly mixed their flour and water together, and kneaded it into paste or dough, as we translate it: but had not put any leaven into it, nor had time to make it into cakes, and bake them.

Their kneadingtroughs:] The Hebrew word comprehends both the dough and the thing wherein it was contained: which in viii. 3, we translate own, and here kneadingtroughs, in which their dough was carried.

Being bound up in their clothes:] The Hebrew word for clothes, signifies any thing that covers another; or wherein it is wrapped; as the dough was in linen clothes, it is most likely (for that is usual), to keep it from the leaven; and which they could not use in the night, and would have hindered its rising.

Upon their shoulders:] For we do not read of any wagons or horses they had for the carriage of their goods out of Egypt.

Ver. 35. The children of Israel did according to the word of Moses:] Who had commanded them from God, to do as it here follows (xi. 1, 2), which was their warrant, and justified the fact.

They borrowed of the Egyptians, &c.] So most understand it: though some think it was a free gift which the Egyptians bestowed upon them; when they were very desirous (as we read before) to have them gone out of their country; which made them not only entreat but hire them to depart. Auch. Jacobus Capellus, ad. A. M. 3503. They that had denied them琬e to go away for a few days (saith he), now press them to depart with all speed; quin et precibus Israelitasdemulcent, ac donis onerant.Egypti (see iii. 23). But it is commonly thought, that the Egyptians imagined the Israelites only desired to appear as well adorned as they could before their God, at the great feast they were to keep in the wilderness, and so they readily lent them these jewels and fine clothes to deck themselves withal; which they hoped would be restored to them again as soon as the sacrifice was over.

Ver. 36. The Lord gave the people favour, &c.] As he had promised, iii. 21, and see xi. 5.
the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required. And they spoiled the Egyptians.

37 And the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, about six hundred thousand on foot that were men, beside children.

38 And a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks, and herds, even very much cattle.

39 And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough which they brought forth out of Egypt, for it was not leavened; because they were thrust out of Egypt, and could not tarry, neither had they prepared for themselves any victual.

40 ¶ Now the sojourning of the children of Succoth.] This being the fifteenth of Nisan, they began to keep the feast of unleavened bread at this place: called Succoth from the booths or tents which were here first erected (no houses being there), wherein they continued while they lived in the wilderness; and many preferred them before houses, when they came to Oaanain. Whence we read so often such expressions as of tents, O Israel, or, They went every man to his tent.

It is an idle fancy of R. Solomon upon this place, that they travelled this day one hundred and twenty miles, and that in an hour, because it is said (Nix. 4), that God carried them on eagles' wings. Some will have this place called Succoth, because the cloud of glory began her first to overspread them.

Six hundred thousand on foot that were men.] i.e. Were twenty years old, and upward; all fit for war.

Beside children.] If we reckon all under twenty years of age, with all the women and old men, there could not be less than fifteen thousand persons. A vast increase in the space of a little more than two hundred years, from seventy persons that went down into Egypt.

Ver. 38. A mixed multitude went up also with them.] Some think these were only a rabble that marched along with them; imagining they would return at three days' end. Which when they saw they did not, they began to mutiny, and quarelled with Moses, &c. as the author of Dibre Hajamin tells the story. Others think that many Israelites had made marriages with the Egyptians (as some it is plain did, Lev. xxiv. 10), who now accompanied them at their departure, being loth to leave their relations. But it is most probable they were proselytes of the gate (as the Jews call them), who had renounced idolatry, but were not entered into the covenant, by being circumcised (see Selden de Synoditis, cap. 2). It is uncertain what number there was of these; but it appears they were a multitude.

Flocks and herds.] Some of which perhaps belonged to the mixed multitude: for they among the Egyptians that feared the Lord's word, preserved their cattle from the stroke of the hail, which destroyed all that was in the field (xix. 30).

Ver. 39. They baked.] When they came to Succoth.

Unleavened cakes, &c.] The Scripture often mentions such bread (Gen. xviii. 6; Numb. xi. 8; 1 Kings xvii. 12), for it was not leavened. They could not stay till it was leavened; being thrust out in haste as they were preparing it (ver. 33), which doth not signify that they put leaven to it, when they came to Succoth (as God understands it), for that was inconsistent with the feast of unleavened bread; which they were commanded to keep (ver. 15), and which it is reasonable to suppose they now observed, as well as killed and ate the paschal lamb (ver. 6, 28).

Neither had they prepared for themselves any victual.] This justifies what I observed upon ver. 15, that they baked a whole month on unleavened bread, till God sent them manna to eat.

Ver. 40. Now the sojourning.] So the Hebrew word moshab most certainly signifies: not merely dwelling (as the Vulgar Latin renders it) but dwelling like strangers, who are not in their own country. Thus Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years.

And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the selfsame day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt.

42 It is a night to be much observed unto the Lord for bringing them out from the land of Egypt.
CHAPTER XII.

Egypt: this is that night of the Lord to be observed of all the children of Israel in their generations.

43 And the Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the passover: There shall no stranger eat thereof:

44 But every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof.

Unto the Lord] In honour of him, who had graciously begun to fulfill his promise made to their forefathers.

This is that night of the Lord, &c.] Which God hath commanded to be observed; because they came out at that season (Deut. xvi. 6), under his conduct from the Egyptian bondage. Or, it may be called that night of the Lord, because his power, and mercy, and faithfulness to his promises, so signaly appeared that night.

Ver. 43. The Lord said unto Moses] At the same time, I suppose, that he instituted the passover (ver. 1), he added this caution about it.

This is the ordinance of the passover.] A further rule to be observed at this feast.

There shall no stranger eat thereof.] Several of the Jewish doctors, by the son of a stranger, understand an aspinate from the religion of Israel, those not circumcised, worship, i.e. idolatry; as Mr. Selden observes (lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 13, p. 179). But it is not to be so restrained, as appears from the next verse: which is a further explanation of this. Wherein he ordains, that no man who did not embrace their faith and religion should eat of the passover, though he was a proselyte so to say, as now the Jews intermarry with strangers, this being a commemoration of the great deliverance bestowed upon the Israelites; none but they were to partake of it; unless they would be circumcised, and thereby come into the covenant made with Abraham. Which gave them a title to all the privileges of his children; and obliged them, as well as the natural Israelites, to give public thanks for this work of their redemption from Egyptian bondage: to worship and serve their God according as he directed.

Ver. 44. But every man's servant that is bought] As many were in those times and countries; who became their masters' proper goods, as much as their cattle.

When thou hast circumcised him, then shall he be eat thereof:] He was not to be circumcised against his will: but if he refused, after a year's trial (as Maimonides expounds it), to receive circumcision, his master was to sell him again. For it is very unreasonable to think, that he was to be compelled to be circumcised, as those Hebrew doctors seem to understand it, who say, "That both master and servant were forbid to eat of it, till the servant was circumcised" (see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1). Where he shows at large, that, according to the Hebrew doctors, no man was to be admitted a proselyte, to partake of the paschal lamb, unless his whole family was circumcised with him, both children and servants.

Ver. 45. A foreigner.] The Hebrew word tsahab, literally signifies a dweller or inhabitant: by which name those pious gentiles were called who renounced idolatry, though they did not embrace the Jewish religion; because they were permitted to settle among them, and dwell in their country, which was not allowed to other foreigners who continued idolaters (see Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et G. cap. 3, et cap. 5). Where, he observes, Maimonides makes this exception, that no such persons might dwell in Jerusalem, because of the singular holiness of that city; but anywhere else they might, without the profession of Judaism.

An hired servant] Some of them were servants to the Jews, and so dwelt in the same house with them: and were called hirelings, when they bound themselves to serve their masters for three years: as the Jews gather from Isa. xvi. 11.

Ver. 46. In one house shall it be eaten; thou shalt not carry forth ought of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof.

47 All the congregation of Israel shall keep it.

48 And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the Lord, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him take of the unleavened bread, and of the bitter herbs.
come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof.

49 One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you.

Ver. 49. One law shall be to him that is homeborn, &c.] Nothing could be more equal than this, that no man should enjoy this privilege who was not of their religion; but whosoever embraced it should partake of the same benefits.

Ver. 50. Thus did all the children of Israel. They kept this passover; and afterwards another, by a special direction (Numb. ix.), but afterward, during their stay in the wilderness they seem to have omitted it; because they omitted circumcision, without which (ver. 48) they were not capable to partake of it.

As the Lord commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they.] Observed it according to all the rites here enjoin'd: though in future ages several of them were omitted, as peculiar to this time.

Ver. 51. It came to pass the selfsame day, &c.] On the day after they celebrated the passover, they began their march out of Egypt. Which was a thing so notorious, that the memory of it was preserved in nations far distant from them: though the story was much corrupted, for want of the knowledge of these sacred records. For Strabo mentions it (to name no more) but saith the report was, that the Jews were descended from the Egyptians (which might be believed by strangers, because they dwelt so long in that country), and that Moses was an Egyptian priest, who had a certain part of that country; but being dissatisfied with the present state of things forsook it, and many worshippers of God (παρεικασάλας τῶν θεών) followed him. For he affirmed and taught that the Egyptians had not right conceptions, who likened God to wild beasts and cattle: nor did the Africans or Greeks conceive of him better, who represented him like to men: οἶρ ὑπὸ τοῦ μονού θίος, τὸ ποιητὸν ἡμῶν ἡμῶν καὶ κακοῦ καισάκτας, ὁ παθητικὸς σφαίρα καὶ σχοίνος: "For there is but this one only God, that which comprehends us all, and the earth and the sea, which we call heaven, and the world," &c. In which words, he makes Moses not so foolish as the Egyptians and other nations, but attributes a senseless opinion to him (that the world, which we see, is God), if this be the right reading of his words. But I rather think the place is corrupted, and it should be, τοῦ ἱεροτεων θίος ὁ παθόντας ποιητὸν καὶ κακοῦ, for this is Moses's true opinion, with which he begins his books, that "he only is God who made the heaven and the earth." And this perfectly agrees with what follows in Strabo, "That no image can be made of this God, and therefore a temple without any image must be erected to him," &c. Which is not true, if we take the visible world to be God; for the image of the heaven and the earth may be made, as well as of a man or a beast. However, it is true, which he adds, That Moses persuaded many good men, and brought them into that country, where Jerusalem is the chief city; where they lived a long time happily, ἀποκαραγόντες καὶ ἀποστησάντες ἰησοῦς καὶ ἐρωτώμενον τό σωτήριον, and doing justly, and being sincerely religious. Which is a notable testimony from a pagan, to be noted aureis literis "with letters of gold," as Casaubon speaks in his Annotations on his place, (lib. xvi. p. 760, 761).

CHAPTER XIII.

1 The firstborn are sanctified to God. 3 The memorial of the passover is commanded. 11. The firstlings of beasts are set apart. 17 The Israelites go out of Egypt, and carry Joseph's bones with them. 20 They come to Etham. 21 God guideth them by a pillar of a cloud, and a pillar of fire.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Sanctify unto me all the firstborn, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine.

who were the firstborn of the father, called, "the beginning of his strength" (Deut. xxi. 17). The other, the firstborn of the mother, which are called here, "whatsoever openeth the womb." The Hebrews make a great difference between these two; and say, that to the former sort belong the prerogatives, both of having the inheritance of his father, and also the priesthood: but to the latter only belongs one of these prerogatives, viz. the priesthood. And they gather it from this very place, "whatsoever openeth the womb" (which is the firstborn of the mother) is mine; i.e. shall be employed in my service. But instead of these, God took the Levites to attend upon him (Numb. iii. 12). After which, the firstborn were to be redeemed at a certain rate, which was part of the priests' maintenance (Numb. xviii. 15, 16). See Selden de Successionibus, ad Leg. Heb. cap. 7.

Among the children of Israel,] Whom this precept concerned peculiarly, but no other people. Therefore the Jews say, that if one of them and a gentile had any beast in common between them, the firstborn was free (as their phrase is), because it is here said, among the children of Israel, not the gentiles (see Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 39).
3 ¶ And Moses said unto the people, Remember this day, in which ye came out from Egypt, out of the house of bondage; for by strength of hand the Lord brought you out from this place: there shall no leavened bread be eaten.

4 This day came ye out in the month Abib.

5 ¶ And it shall be, when the Lord shall bring you into the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which he sware unto thy fathers to give thee, a land flowing with milk and honey, that thou shalt keep this service in this month.

6 Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, and in the seventh day shall be a feast to the Lord.

7 Unleavened bread shall be eaten seven days; and there shall no leavened bread be seen with thee, neither shall there be leaven seen with thee in all thy quarters.

8 ¶ And thou shalt shew thy son in that day, saying, This isdone for a sign unto thee, that thy children may know that God did appear unto thee, and that He brought thee out from Egypt, as He hath.

Both of man and of beast:] And is further directed and explained (ver. 12, 13).

It is mine.] And therefore was to be offered to God, if it were a male of any beast; only an ass desiring the observation of the passover, and the feast of unleavened bread, by this law to teach them (saith R. Levi Barzelonius) that the whole world was his; and that men had nothing in it, but by his gracious grant: who challenged the firstborn of every thing to himself, because all was his. For the firstborn man was dearer to a man, saith he, than the apple of his eye (as no doubt he was), and there was bound to offer him to God. But the plainest reason of this law was, to put them in mind of God's miraculous providence, in sparing their firstborn, when those of the Egyptians were all killed. To which the Jewish doctors add a more ancient right God had to them: being the persons who sacrificed to God, before priests were ordained by the law of Moses. Onkelos takes the "young men" (xxiv. 5) to have been the firstborn, and the priests mentioned xix. 22 (Aben Ezra also upon Numb. xvi. 1, saith the same), the truth of which I shall examine there.

Ver. 3.] God seems to have commanded Moses, at the same time he gave this precept, to repent here at Succoth, what he had said to them in Egypt, concerning the observation of the passover and the feast of unleavened bread. It being of great moment to have the benefits hereby commemorated in perpetual remembrance.

Remember this day,] Which was the first day of unleavened bread; commanded to be kept holy (xii. 15). [It is a strength of hand the Lord brought you out!] That is, by a miraculous power: which constrained Pharaoh to let you go, much against his will. So God promised at his first appearance to Moses (iii. 19).

There shall no leavened bread be eaten.] Unleavened bread was to be eaten on the passover night, and afterwards no leavened bread. See xii. 15, &c., where this is represented as the sense of the Jews; but the sixth and seventh verses following seem to say otherwise.

Ver. 4. This day same ye out! In the morning of this day they began their march.

Abib.] This word Abib signifies an ear of corn: for then barley began to ear. The Syriac word habab hath something of its sound, which signifies a flower: and so the Rabbins here have it, the month of flowers. Whence Macarius saith, God brought Israel out of Egypt, in \( \text{m} \text{nu} \text{n} \text{nu} \text{nu} \text{nu} \text{nu} \) "in the month of flowers;" when the pleasant spring first appeared (see xxiii. 15).

Ver. 5. From hence they conclude, this precept did not oblige them in the wilderness: but it was law when they came into the land of Canaan; and command that they observed it the year after this (Numb. ix. 1, 2, &c.).

See xii. 25, 50. In confirmation of which (Deut. xii. 1) is alleged, where he begins to recapitulate all the laws they were to observe in Canaan; among which fathers to give thee, a land flowing with milk and honey, that thou shalt keep this service in this month.

This is one (xii. 5, 6), yet this alone would not have been sufficient to prove this (for he might be thought now only to reinforce his laws, at their entrance into Canaan), if he had not added, (ver. 1), "Ye shall remember," etc.; which supposes, that in the unsettled condition wherein they were in the wilderness, they had not kept themselves to all those rules which follow, and had been formerly delivered.

Which he sware unto thy fathers to give thee, &c.] Gen. xv. 18, 19, &c.

Kosmos saith, Both the passover, and feast of unleavened bread (xii. 25).

Ver. 6. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread.] This seems to confe what the Jews say, that they were not bound to eat unleavened bread, but only when they are the passover (see xii. 15).

In the seventh day shall be a feast.] As the first day was holy (ver. 15), so it was the last (xii. 15), that they might not fail in their gratitude for so great a benefit as they now commemorated.

Ver. 7. Unleavened bread shall be eaten seven days.] This seems still to make the injunction plainer that for seven days they should eat unleavened bread. Which is so often repeated, because this made them sensible, more than any thing else, of the wonderful hand of God in bringing them out of Egypt; which was so sudden and hasty, that they had not time to bake the dough they had prepared, nor so much as put leaven to it (xii. 39).

No leavened bread be seen with thee.] From whence the Jews conclude, that not only all such bread is to be carefully sought for and thrown out of their hands, but all those that have been used the year before thoroughly scoured, lest any thing should remain in them, that might give a tincture of acidity to the bread that might be made in them. In which work they spend some days before the passover, as Buxtorf observes in his Synag. Jud. cap. 17.

Neither shall there be leaven seen with thee, &c.] For which cause, as he there observes, they abstain, all the time of this feast, from all such things as may possibly have some leaven in them. As from honey and sugar, which are often adulterated with flour, &c.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt shew thy son in that day, &c.] That is, on the first day of unleavened bread, it was to be a part of their religion, to instruct their children in the meaning of their killing the lamb, and their abstinence from leaven. This the Jewish doctors make one of the DCXIII. precepts, that parents should tell the whole story of their going out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of Nisan: when every one, according to his ability, was bound in his own language, to bless and praise the name of God, for all his miracles, which he wrought for them. They are the words of R. Levi of Barcelona.

Ver. 9. It shall be for a sign unto thee.] These seem to be still the words that the parents were to say to their children upon the festivals; whereby saying; This is done because of that which the Lord did unto me when I came forth out of Egypt.

9 And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes, that the Lord’s law may be in thy mouth: for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt.

10 Thou shalt therefore keep this ordinance in his season from year to year.

they taught them to look upon this observation as a token or memorial of what God had done for their forefathers, when he brought them out of Egypt.

Upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes,] To make thee as sensible of God’s goodness, as of that which thou hast in thy hand; or of a thing that is continually before thine eyes. The Jewish superstition about their phylacteries took its rise from hence, but without any good ground: it being evident he speaks not of tying parchments, or any thing else about their wrists, &c., but of teaching their children the meaning of their holy rites. And so some of themselves have expounded it; particularly the forementioned R. Levi of Barcelona, who gives this reason why such abridged mention was taken to have been the case:—“Because (saith he) this is the foundation of our law and of our religion: for which cause, in all our blessings and prayers, we commemorate our coming out of Egypt; because it is a sign to us, and a perfect demonstration of the creation of the world, and that our Lord God is the author of all creatures, and doth what he pleases, &c.” For who but he could change the course of nature, and work such great and unheard of signs as he did? This is sufficient to confute those that deny the creation of the world; and to establish us in the belief of God most blessed: and to persuade both that there is a providence, and that his power extends to all things, both in general and particular.” So he (see ver. 16).

That the Lord’s law may be in thy mouth.] That their children might be able to declare to their posterity the law of the Lord about these matters.

For with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt.] By slaying all their firstborn in one night (see iii. 19). Keep this ordinance. Of the passover; and of the feast of unleavened bread.

In his season.] On the fourteenth, and the seven following days of the first month.

Ver. 11.] Under the name of Canaanites he comprehends all the rest of the seven nations. And these words seem to import, that the law of the firstborn was not to take place till they came into the promised land. Yet we find (Num. iii. 12, 13), that God demanded all the firstborn of them, though he took the Levites in their stead; and both being numbered, and there being two hundred seventy-three firstborn males more than there were Levites (ver. 41—48), he required them to be redeemed at five shekels a piece, and the money to be given to the priests (ver. 46—48). But, perhaps, after this the law was not observed till they came to Canaan.

As he sware unto—thy fathers, &c.] See ver. 5.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt set apart unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix.] Here he shows what he means by that sanctification of the firstborn, which was mentioned in the firsting of the firstborn, by the offering of a lamb to the Lord. For that which is called sanctifying there, is here called setting apart, or separating it from the rest of that kind of creatures, for another use, viz. to be sacrificed to the Lord. For the word heeverta,

11 ¶ And it shall be when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, as he sware unto thee and to thy fathers, and shall give it thee,

12 That thou shalt set apart unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the Lord’s.

13 And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break [or cut off] his neck.

which we translate set apart, is, in the Hebrew, made to pass over. Which is explained, xxii. 30. Thou shalt give it unto me; viz. to be offered at the altar.

The males] The firstborn are only mentioned (ver. 2), but here it is explained to signify only the males. If a female came first, and afterward a male; that male was not devoted unto God, because it did not open the matrix, and other ceremonies before it.

Shall be the Lord’s.] And therefore set apart from common uses, to be employed in his service. That is, every firstling male of a cow, sheep, or goat, was to be offered in sacrifice; and the blood being sprinkled on the altar, the flesh of them was given to the priests (see Numb. xviii. 17, 18), where what is here briefly directs them, as they did the firstling of clean beasts.

Ver. 13. Every firstling of an ass] There was the same reason for horses and camels; but an ass is only mentioned, because abundance of asses were bred in Judæa; where there were few horses or camels. And therefore Numb. xviii. 15, it is said in general, “the firstlings of unclean beasts thou shalt redeem.”

Thou shalt not redeem a female ass. Which was to be sacrificed to God. If a man had not a lamb, he was to give the price of one. And because all lambs were not of an equal price (some being worth more than others), the rabbins say that a good eye, i.e. liberal man, gave a skekel; an evil eye half as much; and a middle sort of men gave three quarters. It was to be redeemed also within thirty days.

If thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break (or cut off) his neck.] It was to die, one way or other, and not to be employed in common use; but thus to be disposed of, if they would not give a lamb, or its value, in exchange for it. Which men might sometimes be unwilling to do, because asses being so plentiful in that country, they might not be worth so much as a lamb; and so no one would give them. But Selden, that from this law of redeeming asses, the gentiles took up a fancy, which was common among them, that the Jews worshipped an ass’s head (see lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1). Which was one of their calendars also of Christians (whom they took to be the same with the Jews), as we read in Minutius Felix, Tertullian, and others.

All the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem.] See ver. 11. Human sacrifices were not acceptable to God. For though he once commanded Abraham to offer his son, yet it was not actually done: and here he declares he did not approve of such sacrifices, by commanding them not to offer their firstborn to him, as they did the firstling of clean beasts; but to redeem them. For the way of the gentle world, even in those days, was to offer their children to Moloch, as appears from (Lev. xx. 2), where he orders him to be put to death, who “gives any of his seed to Moloch.” The very same phrase which is used (as I observed, ver. 12), concerning sacrificing the firstling of the flesh to them, is again used in Lev. xviii. 21, he uses both phrases, saying, “Thou shalt not give any of thy seed to pass through to Moloch, or to pass over to Moloch.” The very same word, which we here translate (ver. 13), set apart. And it it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem.

14 And it shall be when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What is this? that thou shalt say unto him, By strength of hand the Lord brought us out from Egypt, from the house of bondage:

15 And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the Lord slew all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both the first-born of man, and the first-born of beast: therefore I sacrifice to the Lord all that openeth the matrix, which is the Lord word tataphot, which we translate frontlets, it is certain it signifies no more than zizaron, in the ninth verse: a memorial, or monument, as the Vulgar translates it. And so Aben Ezra explains it, be ou zizaron, as it were a memorial; and that immovable, as the LXX. take it. Yet from hence the Talmudists have extracted their phylacteries (or pieces of parchment, wherein this and other texts were written) which they fancied were a kind of amulets to defend them from dangers. For so they are said to be in the prominent place in the Sephardic Shacharit, and therefore used in their prayers to drive away evil spirits, as J. Braunius, and many others have observed. I shall only note further, that this word is found but three times in the law, and yet the Vulgar translates it three several ways; which shows how little the original is understood, though the sense of it is plain and certain (see Petittus, his Var. Lect. in loc. p. 209).

[For by strength of hand the Lord brought us forth]

This hath been often mentioned in this very chapter (ver. 3, 9, 14), and now here repeated again, to make them very sensible, both that they owed their delivery entirely to God, and that nothing was too hard for him to accomplish.

17 And it came to pass, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, &c. That was the nearest way from Egypt to Canaan, by the Mediterranean, to the river of Egypt (as the Scripture calls it), and so to Azotus and Gaza; which was a journey of not above three days, as Philo says; others say of ten. But certainly it was no great way, for the sons of Jacob went it often to and fro (Gen. x. 13). Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, &c. The Philistines being a very warlike people, would, in all likelihood, have opposed their passage; and God knew the temper of the Israelites to be so timorous, that they would run away, and rather return to Egypt, than fight their way through Canaan. For all people grow cowardly by being kept long in slavery; which breaks their spirits, and sinks them as low as their condition. They fought indeed about forty days after this with Amalek; but it was only one battle; and then they were provided with arms (which they had not now) from the Egyptians, whom they found dead on the seashore. But their base temper appeared too plainly the next year, when they heard the report of the spies concerning the inhabitants of Canaan; which put the whole congregation into a fit of despair, and made them think of returning to Egypt (Num. xiv. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 18. But God led the people about. The pillar of cloud mentioned ver. 21, in which the Lord was, conducted them in a way further about:

Through the wilderness of Sin (vers. 26, 27) led them to the right hand towards the Red sea, and the desert of Arabah.

Of the Red sea. See x. 19.

Children of Israel went up harnessed] Or, in military order: for though it is not likely the Egyptians the way of the wilderness of the Red sea: and the children of Israel went up harnessed out of the land of Egypt.

19 And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him: for he had straitly sworn the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you; and suffered them to have any arms, yet they did not go away tumultuously, like fugitives; but marched like soldiers, in good order; and, as in our margin it is translated, five in a rank. Which is the interpretation of Theodotion anciently, and of Montanus, and others, lately. But Hottinger translates it, in the form of an army. For the Arabic word chamins (from whence, it is likely, comes the word chamushi, here used) signifies *exercitus pervagatorius, "an army consisting of five parts," " which are the front, the main battle, the right wing, and the left, and the rear; Smegnata p. 71. And so David Chytraus long before him, quinque agminibus, "in five bodies," as we now speak. But the interpretation of Aben Ezra seems to be the most proper of all others, who simply expounds it, girl about their bones, i. e. expelite or ready, as Onkelos expresses it. For the Hebrew word chamins, which parts are under the five small ribs, about which men were wont to be girt when they went to fight or to travel; this word may well be rendered nigaro, "well girt," as the LXX. translate it (Josh. i. 14, iv. 13). Here indeed they translate it, παραπετευμένης καὶ ἀκρατήτως, "they went up in the fifth generation" (which St. Austin follows), taking the second part for first; but in this second of Legion, the first; the second, the third; Amram the fourth; and Moses the fifth. But as this exposition doth not agree with the Hebrew word, which doth not signify the fifth, but in fives, so it cannot be said of the children of Israel in general; for all the tribes were not yet come to the fifth generation. Our Nic. Fuller hath a learned discourse upon this word, in his Miscellan. lib. v. cap. 2.

Ver. 19. Moses took the bones of Joseph with him, &c. And of the rest of the patriarchs, it is very probable (see Gen. i. 25). To which add, that the Jews say, every tribe took care of the founder of their family. Which is far more likely than the story which the author of the Life and Death of Moses tells, that he carried the bones of all the patriarchs in his back, of which shoulders: it being more probable that some of that tribe undertook the care of it. That it was buried in the bottom of Nile, is not affirmed only by him, but by Jonathan: though others say in the banks of Nile. And they seem all to have it out of the Talmud; where in the Gemara of the title Sota, cap. i. sect. 47, they say the Egyptians themselves buried their relations in the Nile, to make the waters prosperous. And tell a vain story, how a woman called Serach told Moses where the body was, when he was at a loss where to find it, after he had searched for it three days (as the forenamed author tells the tale, while the Jews were borrowing jewels of gold and silver of the Egyptians), and that he called it up from thence, throwing (as he adds), the ineffable name into the river; which brought it up presently, though in a leaden, or, as others say, a marble coffin.

He had straitly sworn the children of Israel, &c. See Gen. i. 25. From whence Gaumlyn (lib. ii. cap. 2, Annect. in Vii. Mos.) not improbably conjectures, that the custom was derived of carrying the ashes of their ancestors into their own country; first by Hercules among the Greeks, and long before by the Egyptians and Chaldeans: whom the Arabians, as he shows, imitated in following ages.

Ver. 20. They took their journey from Succoth. They stayed but one day at Succoth (as Jac. Capelius supposes), where Moses gave the foregoing directions to them: and upon the sixteenth of Nisan they marched to Etham, and encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wilderness.

21 And the Lord went before them by day ye shall carry up my bones away hence with you.

20 ¶ And they took their journey from Succoth, and encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wilderness.

21 And the Lord went before them by day
22 He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people.

sine nimbo. Est autem nimbus, nubes divina, seu fluidum lumen, quod Deorum capita tingit.

Ver. 22. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night,] That is, it continued with them as long as Moses lived, till they came to pass over Jordan into Canaan; when not this cloud but the ark was their guide. And it need not seem incredible, since Clements Alexanderinus (lib. i. Steinmat. p. 318), that they were thus led by a pillar of fire, when the Greeks consider that Thrasylus, they believe, was thus directed, ἡπὶ λαμπὲντα προσγαμίσατε, &c. "by a fire which went before him," and conducted him in a dark winter night through unknown ways, when he brought back the Athenian exiles to their country. The wonder was, that this fire continued to lead the Israelites forty years in the wilderness; whereas that of Thrasylus (if it be true) was but a short appearance. As that light also was, which they say shone from heaven to bring Timonese unto his port when he sailed to Italy.

This pillar, also, the same Clemens thinks (in the place now named), signified τό διδυμοντα τοῦ Θεοῦ, "that no image could be made of God." From whence he thinks likewise it was, that the ancient heathen, before they learnt to make images, set up pillars and worshipped them, οὕτως ἰδοντας τοὺς "as representatives of God." Which Huetius hath lately made out in many examples (in his Questiones Alcaneae, p. 205, 206), and thinks that from this pillar, which had two appearances, the two pillars were erected to Hercules in his temple at Tyre; and two likewise set up in the Temple of the Sun in Egypt.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 God instructeth the Israelites in their journey. 5 Pharaoh pursueth after them. 10 The Israelites murmur. 13 Moses comforteth them. 15 God instructeth Moses. 19 The cloud removeth behind the camp. 21 The Israelites pass through the Red sea, 25 which drowneth the Egyptians.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon: before it shall ye encamp by the sea.

For Pharaoh will say of the children of tains before mentioned. But there was a tower called Μεγάλος, by Herodotus, and Hecateus, and others; which Bochart probably conjectures was this place. Certain it is, there was a city in Egypt called Migdol (Jer. xlv. 1). And Stephanus de Urb. expressly saith that Μεγάλος was Νίστας Αἰγυπτίως; but whether the same with this place, I cannot determine.

Over against Baal-zephon.] This, I doubt not, was the name of a town also, or city; as Ezekiel the tragedian expressly calls it. For Baal was the name of a city (1 Chron. iv. 23), and it is likely there being more of the same name, this was called Zephon, to distinguish it from some other Baal in those parts. Either because it lay north, or had an eminent watch-tower in it. There are those indeed, who, following the Jewish doctors (see Selden de Dies Syr. Syntagm. i. cap. 3), imagine there was an image of Baal set up by the magicians of Egypt, by Pharaoh's order, near this Arabian sea, and among the Israelites in their passage. And Varenus doth not quite disallow this: for he takes Baal-zephon to have been a great plain, into which they were to enter, by the chaps of Pi-hahiroth: in which an idol was worshipped, which looking from the Red Sea towards the north, was called Israel. They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in.

4 And I will harden Pharaoh's heart, that he shall follow after them: and I will be honoured upon Pharaoh, and upon all his host; that the Egyptians may know that I am the Lord. And they did so.

5 ¶ And it was told the king of Egypt that the people fled: and the heart of Pharaoh and of his servants was turned against the people, and they said, Why have we done this, that we have let Israel go from serving us?

6 And he made ready his chariot, and took his people with him:

7 And he took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them.

8 And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoḥ king of Egypt, and he pursued after the children of Israel: and the children of Israel went out with an high hand.

9 But the Egyptians pursued after them, all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pihahiroth, before Baal-zephon.

10 And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel lifted up their eyes, and, behold, the Egyptians marched after them; and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel cried out unto the Lord.

11 And they said unto Moses, Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? Wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt?

12 Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians, than that we should die in the wilderness.

13 ¶ And Moses said unto the people, Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show to you to day: for the Egyptians whom ye have seen to day, ye shall see them again no more for ever.

sured confidence; not sneakingly, like slaves or fugitives. So Oseleus understood it, when he translated it bareheaded, i.e. confidently, fearing nothing; having been delivered and conducted by the powerful hand of God; as it is often repeated (xiii. 9, 14, 16), unto which some refer this phrase, and not to the Israelites (see Drusius, lib. xvi.; Observat. cap. 2).

9. The Egyptians pursued after them.] This did not proceed from Pharaoh's great desire of killing the Jews; but, perhaps, were of the same mind with the Syrians: who fancied the God of Israel might not be alike powerful in all places; but though he was stronger than their gods in the hills, yet they might be too hard for him in the plain (1 Kings xx. 23). So the Egyptians, who had seen how much superior Moses was to their magicians, might possibly thus reason with themselves (as the same learned doctor expresses it), "Who knows whether all this power was given unto Moses to be exercised only within the meridian or climes of Egypt; or whether his commission extend over Palestine and Midian?" They presumed, at least, that the Lord God of the Hebrews had not granted Moses such a command over the armies or host of men (though he had done wonders among reasonless creatures), as the king of Egypt had: because the Israelites, they knew, had no skill in feats of arms, no captains of infantry, and no cavalry at all, no weapons or engines of war; of all which the Egyptians had great abundance. Upon these, or some other supposed God bred vain collections, they became foot-hardy, and desperately resolve to be revenged upon the children of Israel, for all the losses they had sustained by their leaders, Moses and Aaron.

All the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen and his army.] By this it appears that there were both horse and foot, who pursued them; though it is likely the foot were mounted, to make the greater speed.

10. Overtook them encamping by the sea, &c.] On the twentieth day of Nisan, towards evening, they had got within sight of the Israelites, who were just settling their camp where God directed them (ver. 2), having had no time to rest themselves after so long a march.

Ver. 10. When Pharaoh drew nigh, &c.] So that the Israelites could discern with how great a force the Egyptians were about to attack them.

They were sore afraid.] They who had marched hither with an high hand (ver. 8), full of alacrity and courage, now on a sudden were so dismayed, that they knew not what to do within them. For they had not yet settled confidence and resolution wrought in them, by all the wonders God had done for them: but, though whilst they thought Pharaoh disheartened to meddle any more with them, they went on boldly; now their hearts began to fail them, when they saw him at their backs. For they were unfit for war, weary also, and in a very bad place.

The children of Israel cried out unto the Lord.] This had been the proper remedy against their fears, if, in a thankful remembrance of what God had often done for them, they had humbly beseeched him to deliver them in this great strait: which was as easy for him to do, as to work all the mysteries of his power in destroying the Egyptians. But these crises seem, by what follows, to have been rather the effect of despair, than of hope in God: such shrieks as naturally proceed from men when they are ready to perish. Pellicanvs, indeed, thinks, that by the children of Israel is meant such as were good among them, who fell to their prayers, when the rest fell to railing, as it is usual in the next verse. But such words comprehend the generality of the people, and not only the better sort.

Ver. 11. Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?] This is very sarcastical and reproachful language; arguing the height of discontent, or rather of rage against their deliverer. From whence we may learn the wicked temper of those who are ungrateful and unmindful of benefits.

Wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us,] They seem to have been of the very same temper with the Egyptians, who had no remembrance what they had lately felt, nor made any reflections on what God had done in a wonderful manner among them. This neglect of God was an aggravation of their posteriority, as was in Pharaoh and his people; which provoked God to harden them, in the same manner, to their utter destruction. For, as the apostle observes, "God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will be hardeneth" (Rom. ix. 18). His mercy, that it was, was not so tied to them, because they were Abraham's seed, but he could and would harden them, as he had done Pharaoh, if they proved as obstinate as he was.

Ver. 12. Let us alone,] Do not increase our miseries, by attempting in vain to deliver us. This they seem to have said, after the first message Moses and Aaron delivered to Pharaoh: which only moved him to lay greater burdens on them (v. 21, vi. 9).

For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians.] This is the language of base and servile spirits; who chose rather to live miserably than die gloriously in pursuit of their liberty.

Ver. 13. Moses said unto the people, Fear ye not.] These words argue a most admirable spirit that was in Moses: who was neither angry with them, nor dismayed at the approach of Pharaoh: but meekly and sedately exhorts them to be of good courage, and to trust in God; who, he assured them, would perfect what he had begun for them.

Stand still, &c.] I do not desire you should do anything else, but only hope in God; and wait 14 The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace.
15 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward:
16 But lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea, and divide it: and the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea.

Ver. 17. And I, behold, I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them: and I will get me honour upon Pharaoh, and upon his horsemen, upon all his host, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen.

18 And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen.

19 ¶ And the angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them:

20 And it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a nocent blood he reckons with them now, and made them the executioners of his vengeance on themselves, by giving them over to their own proud presumptions of good success, in pursuing those whom they had lately besought to depart out of their land.

Ver. 14. The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord.] See ver. 9.

When I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, &c.] By overthrowing them in the Red Sea; that the blood of the Hebrew infants might be required of them, according to the law of retaliation, or most exquisite rule (as the above-mentioned author speaks) of punitive justice. It is ver. 19. The angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them.] The Lord himself is said to go before them, xiii. 21 (see there). But we must understand, that, where the Lord is, he is attended by his angels. Some of which were sent from the Shechinah, which was in the cloud, to conduct the Israelites, and take care of them. The Jews take this angel to have been Michael, as we read in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 42. "He sent Michael the great prince, &c. for so he is called, Dan. xii. 1. Others say it was Gabriel. But whichever of them it was, he was only the commander of that host, which by the Lord's commandment went before the Israelites to fight for them. The Jews call him by the proper name of Metatron; because he marked out their camp for them (where they were to stay); and described their way in their journey to their several stations; especially here in the Red Sea (Vid. Buxtorf. Histor. Arca, cap. 11, p. 131, &c.)

The pillar of the cloud went from before their face, &c.] This, it is evident, was done in the day-time, before the night came: for the cloud appeared only in the day; in the night there was the appearance of fire.

Swell behind them.] To protect them from the Egyptians, who were at their backs (ver. 9, 10), but, by the intervention of this cloud, quite lost the sight of them; as it follows, ver. 20.

It may be noted here therefore once for all, that there were several uses of this cloud. First, to guide them in their journey. Secondly, to protect them from the heat of the sun in the wilderness; where there were few trees, and no houses to shelter them. Thirdly, to defend them from their enemies, that they might not assault them. And lastly, God from hence, when there was occasion, spoke with Moses. For it is ver. 19. It is the angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel. And from thence Moses speaks of God's punitive justice upon Pharaoh, and his servants, for the wrongs that he had done to his people, by bringing them into undeserved bondage. It is plain, he appears in this cloud (Deut. xxxi. 15). And from thence Moses explains (Exod. xxxii. 9, 10). And out of it called for Aaron and Miriam to come before him (Num. xii. 5).

Ver. 20. It came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel.] This was done, as I said, in the day-time: and in the next words Moses informs us how it appeared in the night.

It was a cloud and darkness to them, i. e. To the Egyptians.
CHAPTER XIV.

cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these: so that the one came not near the other the all night.

21 And Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided.

22 And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left.

23 ¶ And the Egyptians pursued, and went in after them to the midst of the sea, even all Pharaoh's horses, his chariots, and his horsemen.

24 And it came to pass, that in the morning watch the Lord looked upon the host of the Egyptians.

P gave light by night to these.] To the Israelites. It was at the same time both a cloud and a fire: being dark on the one side, next the Egyptians; but bright and shining on the other side, next the Israelites. So that they might see their way, and the Egyptians not see them, nor come near them (as it here follows) all the night.

Ver. 21. Moses stretched out his hand over the sea.] Having his rod in his hand (ver. 16). This was done in former place.

The Lord caused the sea to go back] By this it is evident that the Sheechinah, or the Divine Majesty, was present, and employed his angel (ver. 19) in this work. As it is well explained by Pirke Eliezer, cap. 42, "The holy blessed God appeared in his glory upon the sea, and it fled back," &c. So the Psalmist adds, "He made darkness his covering;" and the waters saw they were afraid," &c. And (ver. 19), "Thy way is in the sea, and thy paths in the great waters," &c.

By a strong east wind] Or rather a south wind, as the LXX. translate the Hebrew word ḫaḏim. Which, though it properly signifies the east, yet in many places it may be translated south, as is demonstrated, for the south (par. ii. Hierozoic. lib. i. cap. 15).

All that night.] All the forepart of the night.

Made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided.] Or rather, after the waters were divided, as Bochart shows it should be translated. Thus Isa. lxiv. 5, "Thou art wrath, and we have sinned;" the meaning is, "for we have sinned," as Kimchi, and we ourselves here translate it (Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 2, p. 409).

Dry land.] The memory of this was preserved by the heathen, as we find in Diodorus Siculus (lib. iii.), Ἰππα δὲ τοὺς πληρῶς κατακόλουθος Ἰουσαφογαίς παρακόλουθον ἀπὸ διδομένων λόγως, &c. "There is a tradition among the leythophagi, who border upon the Red Sea, which they have got out, in the same way that Moses and the Egyptians, &c., and was preserved unto that time; how that, upon a great recess of the sea, every place of that gulf (κόσμω) was quite dry; and the sea falling to the opposite part, the bottom of it appeared green (from the weeds, I suppose, that were in it), but returning back with a mighty force, possessed again its former strength." No man is so blind as not to see that this is a description of the miraculous work of God for the Israelites: the memory of which those barbarous people did not suffer to perish, but propagated it to their posterity; as Bochart well observes in his Phaeg. lib. iv. cap. 29. The Egyptians, indeed, we may well think, endeavoured to blot out the memory of this shameful overthrow, and kept no record of it; for Diodorus, it seems, could learn nothing of it among them (though he lived a considerable time there), but received this intelligence from the poor leythophagi, among whom this tradition was carefully preserved.

Waters were divided. ] Into twelve parts (ἱππα ἀποκαθαρίζει), and according to the number of the tribes, as the tradition is in Epiphanius Haeres. liv. n. 6, 9, which he had from the Hebrews, who affirm the same in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 42. And Kimchi mentions it upon Psalm xxxvi. 13, where, because God is said to have divided the Red Sea into parts, they fancy there were twelve divisions; every one defended with a wall of water. But there is no foundation for this in these words, nor in Psalm lxvii. 19, where paths being in the plural number, they hence also deduce the same conceit, of a several path to every tribe. See Simeon de Muis on that place.

Ver. 23. The children of Israel went into the midst of the sea.] About the second watch of the night (which was at midnight), and about break of day they were got quite through.

Upon the dry ground.] This was not looked upon by the ancient heathen as incredible: for Homer makes Neptune driving his chariots upon the waves; and the sea withdrawing its waters. And the waters of the Sea of Ammer being swelled to destroy Achilleus, he calls them "great waters." The waters also makes Bacchus drying up Hydaspes; and minutely Orontes with his Thrysus to have gone over it. See the learned Huetius in his Questions Alicantae, p. 206, &c.

And the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left.] The strong east wind contributed no doubt to the making of the waters in two; though not without the help of angelical powers. But I do not see how it could do any thing to the compacting of the waters to such a degree, that they were no longer fluid, but firm as a wall or bank on each side of them (see xv. 8), which was effected wholly by the angelical ministry; who upheld the waters in that solid posture, till the Israelites were got quite out of the sea.

It had been an old question, whether they went quite cross the Red Sea, or only fetched a compass, and came out upon the same shore from which they went in. The Hebrew doctors are of opinion, that they did not go over to the opposite shore; but making a kind of semicircle, found themselves, when they came out, in the same place where they began: But I see no reason for this reason, and so suppose, that Moses expressly makes their next station at the wilderness of Etham (Num. xxxii. 8), in which place they were the day before they came to the sea (Exod. xiii. 20). Therefore they were still in the same wilderness.

Ver. 23.] Imagining, perhaps, they were still upon the land, or on the shore where the sea was retired; the darkness of the night not suffering them to see the mountains of water on each side: or rather their minds being so intent to overtake the Israelites, that they regarded nothing else: for when men are engaged in a fierce chase of any thing, with eager desires and confident hopes of it, it takes up all their thoughts, and makes them overlook what lies before their eyes. But by this means, as their two violent passions and proud imaginations, God blinded their minds and hardened their hearts (as he said he would, ver. 17), to rush into their own destruction.

Ver. 24. In the morning watch.] The Romans, and Egyptians through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians.

25 And took off their chariot wheels, that they drave them heavily: so that the Egyptians said, Let us flee from the face of Israel; for the Lord fighteth for them against the Egyptians.

26 And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand over the sea, that the waters may come again upon the Egyptians, upon their chariots, and upon their horsemen.

27 And Moses stretched forth his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to his strength when the morning appeared; and the Egyptians fled against it; and the Lord overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea.

28 And the waters returned, and covered the chariots, and the horsemen, and all the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea after them; there remained not so much as one of them.

29 But the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea; and the waters the Hebrews also, divided into the night four parts, containing three hours apiece. At the beginning of which the guard of soldiers, who kept watch by night, was changed; and thence they were called waters.

Two of them we find mentioned by St. Luke, xii. 38, and St. Mark mentions them all (xiii. 35), and particularly the fourth watch (Mark iv. 48), called here the morning watch; which was the last of them; between day-break and the morning.

The Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians. He frowned upon them, as we speak now in our language. For in Scripture, God is said sometimes to look upon those whom he is about to punish (Psalm civ. 32; Amos ix. 4; Hab. iii. 6).

Through the pillar of fire and of the cloud. By this it is manifest that there was but one pillar, which had different appearances: and that the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, was in it. It seems to me also very probable, that whereas the cloudy part of the pillar had been towards the Egyptians hitherto, now it turned the other side towards them: and the fiery part appearing, let them see the danger wherein they were: and by its amazing brightness perfectly confounded them. So Philo seems to have understood it, when he said (lib. iii. de Vita Mosis) that “from the cloud that was in the rear of the Israelites, there shone a fiery appearance of the Diety.” Which may well be the meaning of the Lord’s looking through the pillar of fire.

And troubled the host of the Egyptians. This glorious light, I suppose, flashing in their faces, put them into a consternation. But Josephus adds, in the conclusion of this book, that Pharaoh did not think that they were taken from a dreadful storm or tempest, with thunder, lightning, and hailstones from the cloud, which put them into the greatest disorder; as it follows in the next verse.

Hither Dr. Hammond refers those words of the Psalmist (lxvii. 17, 18), “The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows also went abroad. The voice of thy thunder was in the sea: the lightnings lightened the world, the earth trembled and shook;” &c.

Ver. 25. And took off their chariot wheels. Some of their wheels were broken by the hailstones, or burnt with lightning: with which, it is likely, their horses were so affrighted, that they fell into disorder; and one chariot running against another, some of their wheels were taken off.

Drave them heavily. They could scarce move, or but very slowly, when their wheels were broken, or taken off: and those wheels that remained sunk deep into the sand, when the waters returned upon it.

So that the Egyptians said, &c. They cried one to another. Let us give over the pursuit.

For the Lord fighteth for them, &c. Now Moses’ words were made good (ver. 14), and the Egyptians themselves acknowledged it (ver. 19).

Ver. 26. And the Lord said unto Moses. He spake to him out of the cloud, where the Shechinah was; as I have often said.

Stretch out thine hand over the sea, that the waters may come again upon the Egyptians; &c. God was pleased to use the ministry of Moses in the drowning of the Egyptians, as he had done in the preservation of the Israelites in the sea (ver. 16, 21), that all the people might honour and reverence him, and be obedient to his direction.

Ver. 27. And the sea returned to his strength.] The sense is truly expressed by the Vulgar, “the sea returned to its former place.” The great walls, or heaps of water, which were on each side of them, falling down, and rushing upon them with a mighty force, overwhelmed them, and filled the whole channel as before.

When the morning appeared.] When it was light. The Egyptians fled against it.] They were so frightened by the light which shone in their faces, and by the thunder and hail, &c. that they turned back; and, like men distracted, ran and met the waters, which came tumbling down upon them.

The Lord overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea.] The Hebrew word imports throwing down with violence and precipitation: and may be translated, threw them headlong. Artapanus in Eusebius (ib. ix. Prepar. Evangel. cap. 27) tells this story from the Helipolitians, after the same manner that Moses doth: only he makes some of them to have been killed with lightning, and the rest drowned.

Ver. 28. And the waters returned, and covered the chariots, &c.] The sea returned to its former depth; so that they were swallowed up.

All the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea after them.] Some have fancied that all the host of Pharaoh did not perish, that only so many of them as pursued the Israelites into the sea; which they fancy this place intimates some did not. But the plain meaning is, that they all came into the sea after the Israelites, and were all drowned in it. It is a wilder fancy, that Pharaoh alone was saved by the angels Michael and Gabriel; because he cried out, as he had done heretofore (ix. 27), “The Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked.” Thus the author of Dibre Hajamm (or, the Life and Death of Moses), who says they transported him to Nineveh, where he reigned as long as the Israelites wandered in the wilderness. The same is related by other such fabulous writers, who are soberly confuted by Aben Ezra from the following words, “There remained not so much as one of them and not one of them was left (ver. 4),” &c., where Moses in his song plainly makes Pharaoh to have perished among the rest. And with them an old Midrash saith, that Jannes and Jambres were drowned, who had been the great instruments of hardening Pharaoh’s heart (see our learned J. Gregory’s Observ. chap. 15).

Ver. 29. But the children of Israel walked upon dry land, &c.] Or, had walked; for it seems to be a mere fancy, that they were still in the sea, and had not passed quite through it, when Pharaoh and his host were drowned. For which there is no ground but this word walked, which may as well be trans-
CHAPTER XV.

30 Thus the Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore.

In the time perfectly past, as in the present. And so, I doubt not, Moses meant, that the Israelites were safe on shore, when the sea returned upon the Egyptians.

The waters were a wall unto them] See ver. 22.

Ver. 30. Thus the Lord saved Israel] As he had promised (ver. 13).

That day] Which was the twenty-first of Nisan; and the last day of the feast of unleavened bread; which, by God's command, was to be kept holy (xii. 16). And now there was a very great reason for it: and for that triumphant hymn which they sung upon this solemnity (chap. xv.). Mr. Mede will have this day to have been that which they afterward kept for their sabbath, in memory of their redemption out of the land of Egypt and the house of bondage. This he gathers from the repetition of the decalogue in the fifth of Deuteronomy; where, leaving out the reason for this commandment, from the creation of the world, Moses inserts this other of their redemption out of Egypt, as the ground of observing that seventh day rather than any other (ver. 15), "Therefore the Lord commanded thee to keep the sabbath;" namely, not for the quorum of one day in seven (of that there was another reason, from the example of God in the creation), but for the designation of that day, after the preceding six days, rather than any other (Discourse xv. p. 74).

Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore.] It may be interpreted, that, as they stood upon the sea-shore, they saw their dead bodies floating upon the waters. But it is likely, also, that by the working of the sea, and by the Divine providence, many of their bodies were cast on shore, that the Israelites might have the benefit of the spoil, and especially of their arms, which they wanted, and were now by this overthrow furnished withal.

This shore was inhabited by the Ithypophagi, among whom the memory of this rescue and return of the sea was preserved (as I observed upon ver. 21), and unto whom the dead bodies were given for food, as the Psalmist saith (lxiv. 14); that is, to the beasts and birds of prey which peopled the neighbouring wilderness. This was done by the righteous judgment of the Lord God of the Hebrews: who made this proud prince, his statesmen, and army, a prey, not only to the fishes and sea-monsters, but a visible booty (as Dr. Jackson speaks) to the promiscuous sorts of ravenous creatures which inhabit the deserts.

Ver. 31. Israel saw that great work, &c.] Of making a path for them to walk on dry ground in the middle of the sea, and then drowning the Egyptians when they followed them in the same path.

The people feared the Lord.] They beholding and considering the powerful hand of God, which appeared in this great work; it begat in them, for the present, high and awful thoughts of him, and devout affections to him. For the fear of the Lord includes all religion. Or, if we take the word fear in a restrained sense, for a dread of the Divine Majesty; the meaning is, they were sensible how dangerous as well as vain it is to oppose his authority, to set themselves against his will, or slight his warnings, as Pharaoh and the Egyptians did.

Believed the Lord, and his servant Moses.] Believed the promises which God had made them by Moses, of bringing them into the land of Canaan (lil. 17), looking upon Moses as a servant of his who faithfully declared the mind and will of God unto them.

CHAP. XV.

1 Moses's song. 22 The people want water. 23 The waters at Marah are bitter. 25 A tree sweeteneth them. 27 At Elim are twelve wells, and seventy palm trees.

I then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed glorioussly: the horse and the rider hath he thrown into the sea.

2 The Lord is my strength and song, and he
EXODUS.

3 The Lord is a man of war: the Lord is his name.

4 Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast thee, O Lord, whose perfections infinitely transcend all other, and therefore thou art to be praised with the greatest fear and reverence; for thy very works are wonderful, and to be had in admiration.

Ver. 12. "By thy mighty power they were buried in the bottom of the sea, into which they sank.

Ver. 13. "And in great mercy thou hast preserved thy people, whom thou hast brought out of Egypt, and rescued from cruel servitude, and conducted, by a mighty providence, towards the holy land, which thou hast promised to them, there to dwell among them.

Ver. 14. "And why should we doubt of our coming thither? The fame of this wonder shall go before us, and strike a terror into the most valiant inhabitants of that country.

Ver. 15. "Nay, all their neighbours, as well as they, shall find their hearts fail them, and become as weak as water.

Ver. 16. "For a terror shall fall upon them, that they shall be no more able to stir a stone, when they hear of this dreadful execution; but suffer thy people, O Lord, to pass to their inheritance, which thou hast prepared for them.

Ver. 17. "Thither shalt thou bring them, and there make them to take root in the highest mountains of that country, where thou hast designed a place for thy own dwelling, of which thy power also will lay the foundation.

Ver. 18. "And thou shalt do more wonders; since thy dominion and power endures to all ages.

Ver. 19. "For who can dethrone thee? Who in the same sea hast made a grave to bury the Egyptians, and a path for thy people Israel to walk in, as if they had been on dry ground."

And now having given the sense of the song in this paraphrase, it may be proper to confirm it, by the explication of some phrases in it.

Ver. 1. Hath he thrown into the sea.] The Hebrew word ranah, signifies a sudden precipitation; when they were in the height of their hopes to overtake and subdue their enemies.

Ver. 2. He is my God.] Though some think the word El to be a contraction of Elchim, yet it seems to be derived from ajal, and is generally thought to import might and strength. But I have taken in the other notion of goodness also (see ver. 11.)

Prepare him an habitation.] Whether they thought of a cloud too grand and vast for the Divine Glory, they resolve to build him a tabernacle: just as David, ashamed he should dwell in a tabernacle, designed to build him a temple.

My father's God.] I. e. Jacob's; of whom God took a singular care, both before and after he came into Egypt.

Ver. 3. The Lord is a man of war.] I. e. Gets great victories, as the Targum expresses it. For when the Hebrews would express any eminent quality, they put the word ish before it. As in 1 Sam. xvii. 33, we meet with this very expression concerning Goliath, "a man of war from his youth;" i. e. a great warrior.

And in the foregoing chapter, David is called both ish melchamah, a man of war, and ish toser, a man of form or beauty, i. e. a beautiful or comely person, as we translate it 1 Sam. xvi. 18. And in this very book, ish deravim, a man of words, is an eloquent man.

The Lord is his name.] He seems to allude unto that which God said to Moses, when he first appeared to him (lii. 14—16, vi. 3, 4, 6).

Ver. 4. Pharaoh's chariots] The Hebrew word *mer-
CHAPTER XV.

Heavenly powers, comprehending his chosen captains also are drowned in the Red sea.

5 The depths have covered them; they sank into the bottom as a stone.

6 Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy.

7 And in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee; thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble.

8 And with the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.

9 The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them.

10 Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them: they sank as lead in the mighty waters.

11 Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?

12 Thou stretchest out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them.

13 Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people which thou hast redeemed: thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation.

14 The people shall hear, and be afraid; sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina.

15 Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazéd;

Ver. 9. I will divide the spoil.] It belonged to kings, and chief commanders, to divide the spoil; as Moses, David, and Joshua did among the soldiers that were with them.

My hand shall destroy them.] Or, reposest them (as it is in the margin), bring them back to their slavery in Egypt.

Ver. 10. They sank as lead.] It signifies the suddenness of their destruction: for a talent of lead sinks in a moment.

Ver. 11. Who is like unto thee—among the gods?] Or, the mighty ones as it is in the margin. For Eliah is the plural of El, which comes from Ejlalh (saith the author of Sepher Cosni), which denotes fortitude or strength. For from him proceeds all power and might: but is himself more sublime and eminent, than to be likened to any other power, according to these words, which he quotes for the proof it (par. iv. sect. 3).

Fearful in praises.] I see no solidity in the gloss of R. Eliezer, that Moses speaks in the plural number, because the angels praised God above when the Israelites praised him below (Pirke Eliez. cap. 42). The plain meaning is, that he ought to be praised with the great names; for to him alone (as Conradus Pellicanus glosses) belongs all honour and glory, who can never enough be praised.

Ver. 12. The earth swallowed them.] They who were drowned in the sea are here said to be swallowed up in the earth; just as Jonah saith, when he was in the sea, that he "went down to the bottom of the mountains; and the earth with her bars was about him for ever" (ii. 6), because the sea, which swallo­wed both him and the Egyptians, is in the depths of the earth. R. Eliezer thinks that they being thrown upon the sea-shore (xiv. 30), the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up. Which is possible; but there is no necessity so understanding it. Rather after the Israelites had spoiled them, the sea which had cast them on shore, afterwards, as is usual, carried them off again, and buried them in the sand or mud.

Ver. 13. Thy holy habitation.] The country where God himself intended to have a dwelling-place (ver. 17).

Ver. 14. Inhabitants of Palestina.] The Philistines seem to have been the most valiant people in that country to which the Israelites were to go, and therefore here mentioned.

Ver. 15. Dukes of Edom.] Concerning the word altyshe, see Gen. xxxvi. 18. By this it appears, that Idumæan was at this time under the government of dukes; though before Moses' death they had kings the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold upon them; all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away.

16 Fear and dread shall fall upon them; by the greatness of thine arm they shall be as still as a stone; till thy people pass over, O Lord, till the people pass over, which thou hast purchased.

17 Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the Sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established.

(Num. xx. 14). For they often changed their government, as I observed upon Gen. xxxvi. where Moses gives an account both of their dukes and of their kings.

Ver. 18. Shall be as still as a stone: The LXX. translate it, ἀποκαθεδρότωσαν, "turned into stones;" i.e. so struck with the terror of the Lord, that they remained unmovable as stones; having no heart to oppose the passage of the Israelites into Canaan.

Ver. 17. Mountain of thine inheritance. Moses, it seems, has foreseen, by the spirit of prophecy, that God would place his habitation upon Mount Sion. Which he understood, perhaps, from the sacrifice of Isaac upon Mount Moriah (Gen. xxvii.).

Ver. 18. The Lord shall reign for ever and ever. It may signify, that when they came thither, they would always acknowledge him for their Sovereign, who had done such mighty things for them.

Ver. 19. In this, which the Greeks call the epiphanema of the song, Moses briefly comprehends the whole matter of it, and makes it end as it began.

Ver. 20. Miriam. Or, as the LXX., the Syriac, and others read it, Mariam; which some think comes from marah, which signifies bitterness (as the Arabic word marara doth), and that their cruel usage by Pharaoh, especially his decree that all the male children should be slain, was the occasion of this name; for it made their life bitter to them, as the text saith (l. 14). Thus the author of Dibre Hajamin (or, of the Life of Moses) and our Dr. Lightfoot, and others. But Le Moine guesses, not unhappily, that it signifies so much as marjam, which is, in English, a common name for such dart shoots of Israel, as was framed, among the Greeks, who feigned her to have been born of the freth of the sea, which gave her the name of Aphrodite. The fable of Diana also, as well as Venus, had no other original, but from that which is here said of Miriam; as Huetius hath probably conjectured, in his Demonstratio Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 15, sect. 4.

The prophetess.] She was called by this name, I suppose, because she had a gift of composing hymns in praise of the Divine Majesty, which, it is certain, is meant sometimes by prophesying in Scripture (see 1 Sam. x. 5, 6). And thus among the Greeks, a prophet and a poet were the same thing; and the Latin word sages signifies both. For, as Quintilian saith (lib. i. cap. 10), music was had in such veneration in ancient times, that "idem music, et vates, et sapientes judicaretur." But there are other places of Holy Scripture, which would incline one to think that she also received revelations from God, for the direction of the people. Particularly Mic. vi. 4, which was interpreted of her in her own words, with Aaron's (Num. xii. 2), "hath not the Lord spoken by us also?" Which the Lord heard, and doth not contradict, but rather allow to be true; though they had not such near communication with him as Moses had (ver. 6). Perhaps she instructed the women, as Moses and Aaron did the men.

Sister of Aaron.] And why not of Moses? The common answer is, that Aaron and she lived longest together; Moses having been absent from them forty years. Or, perhaps, Moses was not by the same mother which Aaron and Miriam had. She was married to Hur, if we may believe Josephus.

A timbrel in her hand.] So the manner was in aftertimes when they prophesied (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Kings xiii. 18), and when they sang a hymn (Psalm xxxvi. 2, iv. 7, 8), and upon any occasion of great rejoicing (Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6). From which we may learn, how ancient music was in the service of God; there being nothing in which it can be better employed than in his praises. Therefore it was no part of the gentle idolatry, that they used such instruments as those in their Divine worship; but they honored false gods in that manner, that Moses and the Israelites had done the true. And it ought to have a remark set upon it, that this way of praising God was no part of the Mosaical institution; but derived from more ancient times before the law was given.

Joel 2. 25. All the women went out after her.] To join with her in the praises of God, as the men did with Moses and Aaron, with timbrels and dances. As they played with these instruments in their hands, so their whole bodies made a decent motion with their feet. Which afterwards tended to lasciviousness, but anciently was very grave, and so becoming, that such dances were of holy and religious music. This appears by the example of David, dancing before the ark, when it was brought up from the house of Obed-Edom, in a joyous procession both of men and women, with vocal and instrumental music (1 Chron. xv. 27—39; Psalm lxvii. 26). From which patterns all nations, from the most ancient times, made dancing a part of the worship of their gods; as Huetius observes, in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 6, n. 2, who ingeniously conjectures, in another place of that work (cap. 12, n. 4), that from this dancing of Miriam, and her companions, on the seashore, Callimachus, in his Hymn to Diana, ascribes to her ἑσπερον συγαφίαν ἔλεσεν, "threescore dancers, the daughters of the ocean."

Ver. 21. Miriam answered them, &c.] i. e. She and the women answered Moses and the people, verse by verse; or after every verse sung by Moses and the men, Miriam and the women interposed and repeated this verse (which is the first of the song), saying, "Sing to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously," &c. And this was a way of singing in aftertimes, as appears from Psalm cxxxv. and Ezra iii. 11, of which I have given some account in my preface to the Paraphrase of the Book of Psalms. Which justifies, or rather commends, our way of read-
And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter: therefore the name of it was called Marah.

And the people murmured against Moses, saying, What shall we drink?

and found no water.

This was the more grievous, because they had wasted this refreshment three days.

And the people murmured against Moses, It is the conceit of Abarbain, that Moses brought them from the Red Sea without the direction of the cloud which conducted them thither: but then left them to his guidance. Which made the people think it was Moses's fault that they were in distress; who did not know how to lead them to the most commodious and likely places for the finding good water. And therefore from Marah they stirred not, till the cloud again led them; because it is said (xvii. 1), they journeyed from Sin, by the commandment of the Lord. But all this is a mere fancy, to excuse his forefathers; who should rather have prayed to God than murmured against Moses. For we read expressly, God did not take away the pillar of the cloud by day, and the fire by night, from before the people (xiii. 22), that is, it constantly guided them in the way wherein they should go, whether they travelled by day or by night. And in that very place, which he builds his opinion upon, where it is said, they "journeyed according to the commandment of the Lord:" it is also expressly recorded, that "there was no water for the people to drink." (xvii. 1).

Ver. 25. He cried unto the Lord; and the Lord shewed him a tree, which when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet: there he made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them.

And the Lord shewed him a tree. We are not told what tree this was, whose wood being thrown into the waters took off their bitterness; but, to increase the miracle, the Jews will have this to have been a tree of bitter taste (which Jonathan calls Ardphe), the wood of which name seems to be the name, if they had been sweet. Demetrius mentions this wonderful cure of the waters, in Eusebius's Prepar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 29.

Which when he had cast into the waters,] By the order of the Lord, who showed him the tree. For the wonder did not consist (as Huettus thinks, in his Questiones Anaspectae), or come by chance, from the wood itself (for that may be done naturally, as Pliny shows), but that he found this wood in the wilderness, by the direction of God; as Elisha found, by the same Divine direction, that the throwing in of meal would make water sweet: which the same Pliny saith is a natural remedy.

There he made for them.] Proposed to them, or appointed them.

A statute and an ordinance.] This seems to signify, that for their better government, God now gave them a few rules to be observed for the present, till he should more fully declare his will to them from Mount Sinai. And it is a most ancient constant tradition of the Jews, that now he commanded them to observe the Sabbath, (which they understand by statute), and to do justice; particularly honour their parents; which they understand by ordinance or judgment, as the Hebrew word imports. And they instance especially in keeping the Sabbath, and honouring of parents; because those two commandments are pressed upon them in Deuteronomy, with this particular enforcement, Thus saith the Lord, who now commanded them (Deut. v. 12, 16), which they will have to relate unto this command at Marah (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 9, p. 314, 333, &c.). And perhaps these two might be in the number; but it is probable there were more commands besides these, which were now given them; as the following verse seems to intimate.

And there he proved them.] He began there to make a trial of their obedience, whether they would observe these laws or no.

Ver. 26. If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God.] This was the main thing he required of them, as Jeremiah observes, v. 22, 23.

Where, he saith, Godspake nothing to them, "in the day when he brought them out of Egypt; but in this time," concerning burnt-offerings and sacrifices, but only commanded them, saying, "Obey my voice." And this Malmiones confesses in his More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 32, "It appears from the Scripture, and the Cabala also, that the first precept which God gave us after we came out of Egypt, was not concerning burnt-offerings and sacrifices: but it was that given us at Marah. If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God: where he gave us a statute and a judgment. And it is a certain tradition, that the statute was the Sabbath; and the judgment was the taking away all iniquity." e. d. doing justly.

I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I

27 And they came to Elim, where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm trees: and they encamped there by the waters.

to the number of the twelve tribes; and seventy palm trees, according to the number of the elders of Israel, says the Jerusalem Targum and Jonathan's Paraphrase. Which Nachmanides so much believed, that he said each tribe pitched their tents about one of these fountains; and the seventy elders sat down under the shadow of the palm trees; giving thanks to God for the benefits they now received upon dry land, as lately they had done in the sea. But there is no reason to think that the high court, consisting of so many elders, was now constituted, as I have observed before: of which see Mr. Selden, lib. l. de Synedr. cap. 15, p. 636, &c. There is nothing in the story neither to warrant what Ezekiel says in the place before named, that these twelve springs all gushed εκ μικρον πνημον, "out of one rock," which was in this beautiful plain. No more than there is for what follows in him, concerning a marvellous strange bird, such as no man ever saw before, as big again as an eagle, of various colours and a most sweet voice, which appeared to them upon this occasion. Which he seems to have had out of some Talmudical fable.

Palm trees] This tree delights in watery places; and therefore no wonder so many were planted here by these fountains. For it is noted by Pliny, that gaudet irriguit et tato anino bibere amat, "the palm-trees delights in places well watered, and loves to drink all the year." There were two sorts of these trees: the common, and that which was called σπαρτειας, because it bare dates; as Salmassius hath observed in his Plinius Exercit. p. 472, 1326. If these were of the latter sort, they gave them the better entertainment. Encamped there by the waters.] To refresh themselves and their flocks in this delightful place.

CHAPTER XVI.

1 The Israelites come to Sinai. 2 They murmur for want of bread. 4 God promised them bread from heaven. 11 Quails are sent, 14 and manna. 16 The ordering of manna. 25 It was not to be found on the sabbath. 39 An aman of it is preserved.

And they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Israel came unto the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departing out of the land of Egypt.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. And they took their journey from Elim,] After they had rested a good while there; as appears by the end of the verse. All the congregation—came unto the wilderness of Sin.] Not directly; but first they went back towards the Red Sea; which was their next station after they left Elim: as Moses tells us, Numb. xxxiii. 10, where he gives an exact account of all their stations; one of which is here omitted, because nothing remarkable, I suppose, fell out there, and they did not stay long in it. This Sin is different from that where Miriam died (Numb. xx. 1), and written with different letters.

Which is between Elim and Sinai.] So the direct way to Sinai had been into this wilderness of Sin, but, for some reason which we know not, they first returned to some part of that sea where they had been before.

On the fifteenth day of the second month, &c.] Just a

2 And the whole congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness:

3 And the children of Israel said unto them, Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the month after they came out of Egypt. And therefore, it seems, they stayed a good while at Elim, where there was plenty of water and some shade: which was now very comfortable; this second month (which they called Ijar) answering to part of our April and May. Or otherwise, we must suppose they spent some time at the Red Sea: whither God conducted them, perhaps, to put them in mind of his late great mercy to them there; which might incline them to be more obedient to his commands, mentioned xv. 25, 26.

Ver. 2. And the whole congregation of the children of Israel.] Their elders and all are included in these words, they being the same with those ver. 1, which certainly comprehend all that came out of Egypt. Though, it is likely, there were some more pious among them, who were not guilty of what follows: when the generality were so mutinous, that they who were better disposed could scarce be discerned.

Murmured against Moses and Aaron.] This seems flesh pots, and when we did eat bread to the full; for we have brought us forth into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger.

4 "Then said the Lord unto Moses, Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a certain rate to give men bread when they were ready to starve with hunger.

That I may prove them.] Some think this relates to what goes before, concerning his sending them bread every day; which was so ordered, that he might prove whether they would murmur, because they had not enough at once for a whole year; or humbly hope in his mercy for a constant supply. But the following words (which if they will make in my law or so) direct us to a larger sense: which is, that he tried whether they would be obedient to all his commands, when he let them want nothing to support and encourage them in his service.

Prove them.] Not as if he was ignorant; but that it might plainly appear to others, and to themselves, that they were brought from Egypt, to show them that it might openly appear to the world that God sustains him who follows his worship and service, by means that he did not think of. So he expounds this very place (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 24), "That every one may see and know, whether it be beneficial to give one's self to the service of God or not."

Ver. 5. Upon the seventh day they shall prepare that which they shall bring in: They had gathered it, and brought it into their tents, they were to grind and bake it, &c. (ver. 23), and make ready all things that were necessary against the next day, which was to be a festival (viz. the Sabbath) on which they were to do nothing. For the Sabbath was not to be disturbed with such kind of work; but through a thousand years this might prepare their meat and only abstain from labour, yet on this they might not so much as dress their meat: but it was to be done the evening before; on which they were to prepare every thing for the next day. From which preparation this day was called the parasece (Luke xxiii. 51), the preparation for the sabbath.

It shall be twice as much as they gather daily.] Enough, that is, for two days, viz. that sixth day, and the next, which was to be the Sabbath, ver. 23, where what is here briefly said in general, is more particularly and largely explained.

The Talmudists are generally of an opinion, that the fifteenth day of the second month, when they came hither (ver. 1), was the seventh day of the week (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 11). Which, if it be true, they knew nothing of the rest of the Sabbath; for they travelled upon this day. But Mr. Mede hath observed, that it is altogether uncertain, whether or no it was the seventh day from the creation. It might possibly fall out so, by the providence of God, as that the seventh, designed by him for their Sabbath, might be both the seventh in order from the creation, and also from the day of their deliverance out of Egypt. But that which now determined this seventh day, after six days' labour, to be their rest, was their redemption out of Egypt; and the overwhelming of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea: which was upon this very day. The ample of the creation was a reason for sanctifying one day in seven; but the designation of this seventh day, was, as I said, from their wonderful deliverance (see Discourse xv. book 1).

Ver. 6. And Moses and Aaron said unto all the children of Israel. [What God spake to Moses alone (ver. 4), is delivered to the people by Aaron also,
6 And Moses and Aaron said unto all the children of Israel, At even, then ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out from the land of Egypt:

7 And in the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the Lord; for that he heareth your murmurings against the Lord: and what are we, that ye murmur against us!

8 And Moses said, This shall be, when the Lord shall give you in the evening flesh to eat, and in the morning bread to the full; for that the Lord heareth your murmurings which ye murmur against him: and what are we? your murmurings are not against us, but against the Lord.

9 ¶ And Moses spake unto Aaron, Say unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, who was assistant to his brother in the government of them.

At even,] On the evening of this fifteenth day God sent them quails, as we translate ver. 13.

Then ye shall know] Be convinced, that it was by the Lord’s direction and command that you were brought out of Egypt into this place. And therefore you have no reason to quarrel with us, who did nothing of ourselves without his order: but rather to trust in him; who can make as good provision for you here in the wilderness, as ever you saw in Egypt.

Ver. 7. In the morning.] When the manna fell down (ver. 19), and you shall see the glory of the Lord. His great power (some interpret it) in sending them bread from heaven, and flesh also with it. But I take it rather to refer unto the visible appearance of the Divine Majesty, which they saw presently after this (ver. 10), and were convinced of his real presence in that cloud, by the descent of the manna from thence next morning; which no power but the Divine could produce. And so I find Abarbanel himself interprets it: “Their seeing the glory of the Lord, is not to be understood of the bread or the flesh he sent them, but of the fire which appeared to all the people, to reprove them for their murmurings.”

Then ye shall know your murmurings] He is present among you: and takes notice of your ungrateful behaviour towards him.

And what are we, that ye murmur against us?] Alas! we are but poor instruments of his; who hath done all the wonders you have seen, and by that means brought you hither: and therefore why do you complain of us, as if we acted any thing by our own authority?

Ver. 8. When the Lord shall give you] I say again (therefore mark it), when the Lord shall give you flesh to eat in the evening, and in the morning bread to the full; then you shall be convinced that he hath taken notice of your murmurings: which are really against him, who employs us only as his ministers; and will be so gracious as not to punish your discontents, but provide for your necessities.

Ver. 9. Moses spake unto Aaron.] Who was his minister, as Moses was more immediately God’s.

Say unto all the congregation.] Who were all engaged in this undutiful murmuring (ver. 2).

Come near before the Lord.] Before the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, which was in the cloud (as I observe, p. 13), and which I have before mentioned, as a way to break forth upon them in a glorious manner. But, because of their murmurings, the cloud was removed, it is probable, to a greater distance from them than it used to be. Bonfrereus will have it, that they were to come near to the tabernacle of Moses, where the glory of the Lord appeared (xxxiii. 7, 9). But there is no proof that it was wont to be there till that occasion. See upon that place.

He hath heard your murmurings.] He will show that he is the Lord of you, and observes how ungratefully you require him. It is not unlikely that Moses bade Aaron go and speak to the people, because he himself retired to speak to God. That is, to pray for them, and to acknowledge his great goodness in passing by their murmurings.

Ver. 10. That they looked.] They were suddenly surprised, I conceive, with an unwonted brightness: which made them look about to see whence it came. Or Aaron, perhaps, bade them look that way.

Toward the wilderness.] Whither the cloud had conducted them; and stood at some distance from them.

The glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud.] The Divine Majesty appeared in flaming light; such as they had never seen before (see xili. 21). Thus N. Lyra truly expounds, “Fulgor quidam insolitus,” &c. an unusual splendour, representing the Divine power, to reprove the murmurings of the people.

Ver. 11. And the Lord spake unto Moses.] Who was gone, as I said, to pray unto God; whilst Aaron was speaking unto the people.

Ver. 12. And the Lord spake unto the Lord.] He repeats to Moses what he had bidden him tell them (ver. 4—6), and perhaps spake it from the cloud of glory, in the audience of all the people.

Come near before the Lord.] Ver. 8.

And ye shall know that I am the Lord your God.] Who brought you out of Egypt; and will provide for you here in the wilderness.

Ver. 13.] See ver. 6, 8.

The quails came up.] The only person among the Jews, that adventures thus to translate the Hebrew word selau (which is used here, and Numb. xi. 31, and Psalm cv. 40) is Josephus. All others either keep the Hebrew name, or make it another thing than quails. For Jonathan translates it, pheasants; and Abarbanel makes it a kind of sea-fowl; and the Talmudists comprehend four sorts of birds under this name; viz. that which feeds upon figns (which the Greeks call Ixoxizis), and thrushes, and pheasants, and quails (see Bochartus, par. ii. Hierozol. lib. i. cap. 14). But all this is without good ground; for the account which Moses gives of selau in the book of Numbers, agreeth to none of these, nor any thing we have knowledge of, but a kind of locusts; which Job Lulphus therefore pitches upon, and gives very solid reasons for it; as I shall show when I come to that place, Numb. xi. 31.
14 And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderness there lay a small round thing, as small as the hoar frost on the ground.

15 And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna: for they wist not what it was. And Moses said unto them, This is the bread which the Lord hath given you to eat.

16 "This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded, Gather of it every man according to the number of your persons, take ye every man for them which are in his tents.

17 And the children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less.

18 And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack; they gathered every man according to his eating.

Come up,] From the country over against the desert from the sea, saith Aben Ezra; and Josephus, from the Arabian Gulf. Not that they were a sea-fowl; but were in great quantity upon that coast.

Covered the camp:] It seems they fell in the very streets, as we speak; so that they needed not do more than step out of doors, and take up as many as they pleased. This lasted no longer than that evening: for the manna which fell next morning was to be their constant food.

In the morning dew: Besides the morning dew, there was an evening (Hos. vi. 4; Cant. v. 2), and Moses in Numb. xi. 9, mentions the dew that fell in the night. From whence, I suppose, came the opinion among some of the Jews, that there was a double dew in which the manna was enclosed: a dew below it, which fell in the night; and a dew above it, which after the manna was fallen came upon it, and covered it in the morning: by which means, being thus enclosed, it was kept very clean.

Lay round about the host:] Not in the camp; but round about it on the face of the wilderness (ver. 14).

For the camp was not so clean a place, nor so apt to contain the manna that fell with the dew.

Ver. 14. When the dew that lay was gone up:] This shows the dew fell first, and then the manna fell upon it (as we read expressly, Numb. xi. 9), whereby it was kept pure, and free from the dust that was upon the ground.

Upon the face of the wilderness: When the dew was exhaled by the sun, the manna appeared; which covered the wilderness round about them.

There lay a small round thing:] This word is nowhere else to be found in the Holy Scripture; which hath made it differently rendered. But our translation is authorized by what is said, ver. 31, that it was like coriander seed: which hath respect not to its color, but to its form and figure. And so the LXX. here understood it, when they translated it σατήν χορίον τεσσαυρόν.

As small as the hoar frost:] This seems to relate to the colour, which was white: but expresses also that it was very small, like a drop of dew frozen to the ground.

Ver. 15. When the children of Israel saw it:] Which was, as soon as they rose in the morning, and went out of the doors of their tents.

It is manna:] The Hebrew words man hu, are thought by some to signify as much as manah-hu, i.e. What is it? So Philo, Josephus, and a great number of the ancient and modern expositors, who take man as an Egyptian word, signifying as much as the Hebrew manah. But it doth not seem likely, that they joined an Egyptian word to a Hebrew; as hu is acknowledged to be. Therefore it may be better expounded, it is a gift, or a portion. For manah signifies to appoint or order one’s diet (Dan. i. 10), and as kow comes from kach, by casting away the last letter; so may man, in like manner, from manah. And the meaning is, This is the gift of God; or, This is it which God hath appointed us: not knowing (as it here follows) determinately what to call it.

seems to have thought of this, when he defines it to be הקבלות פירות ים, so Drusius, in his Quest. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 63.

For they wist not what it was:] Had not a distinct conception what kind of food it was, not having yet tasted it; not knowing certainly (as Abarbinel fancies) whether this was the bread, that Moses bade them expect: who therefore tells them, in the next words, that it was that which the Lord hath given you.

This is the bread which the Lord hath given you:] You rightly called it, a Divine gift (as Abarbinel goes on), for this indeed is the bread which the Lord bestows upon you for your sustenance, according to his promise which he made you by me (ver. 4).

Ver. 16.] Here now Moses shows how the use of this food was to be regulated.

Gather of it every man according to his eating:] As much as will suffice for his and his family’s sustenance for one day.

An omer for every man:] That they might be sure to have enough, he allows every person among them to have an omer: which was something less than half a peck of our measure. Here Abarbinel hath a part of the sense; that, being a Divine food, was not to be used as common things are, which men gather into heaps, lay up in barns, traffic withal, or lay up for their children: but it was to be spent as a gift of God both to poor and rich. Some can get more of worldly goods, and some less; by which means some give, and others receive; but here all received from the bounty of heaven; and God ordered it so, that they who were poor should not want, and they who were rich should have nothing beyond their wants, to lay up, or to sell, as they did other things. For every one was to have only as much as he could eat: and no man could eat above an omer. Which doth not signify that they gathered it by measure, but as much as they thought would amount to that quantity: with an intention, that if they had more than they needed, others should have it, who had gathered less than they needed.

Take ye every man for them which are in his tents:] For the old and the young, who could not go out to gather for themselves.

Ver. 17.] And the children of Israel did so, &c.] Gathered what they thought would be sufficient for themselves and their families: according as they were larger, or less in number. And when they came home, they dealt to every one the proportion which God ordered.

Gathered, some more, some less:] They were not all alike able (it is like) to gather, not alike diligent; and so did not gather an equal quantity. But the true reason I have given already, viz. that some families did not require so much as others.

Ver. 18.] When they did mete it with an omer:] When it was brought unto their tents (ver. 16), then the father of the family, or some of the rulers of the congregation (ver. 22), measured what they had gathered with an omer; and gave to every one according as God directed.

Had nothing over:] Had no more than his omer.
And he that gathered little had no lack: he that had not gathered enough to make an omer for every man, had it made up to him, and that of other men’s store, who had had more than enough. Abarbinel will have it, that they were so directed by a miraculous providence, as to gather just so much for their several families, that every person’s share would come to an omer, and neither more nor less. And so Greg. Nyssen calls this the second miracle which was in the manna, having observed one before, ver. 14. But others think, that if any part of it remained after every one in the family had an omer, it was food for their cattle; which in the wilderness wanted grass sufficient for them. And this seems the more probable, because otherwise we must make a new miracle, that every man, woman, and child, should be able to eat an omer; which all grant was sufficient for the sustenance of an army whatsoever; but was too much, sure, for a child.

Ver. 19. Moses said, Let no man leave of it till the morning.] It was therefore to be all spent, one way or other, the same day it fell. Which was the law of all the holy feasts, particularly of the passover (xvi. 10), and of the sacrifices of peace-offerings (Lev. xi. 17) would have them depend upon his providence, and trust him for fresh supplies every day; as Aben Ezra well notes. And R. Levi ben Gersom; “He that kept it till the morning betrayed his want of faith, and feared God would send no more:” for if he believed, to what purpose should he be at the pains to keep it?

Here was a new wonder, that, as it fell every day for forty years together, both in winter and in summer; and likewise fell in such quantity, that every one had an omer, and none wanted this measure; so it would not keep till the next morning; which it might have done in its own nature, and did once in a week; and in the ark was preserved to many generations.

Ver. 20. They hearkened not.] Either through unbelief, or mere negligence, or a wanton inclination to make an experiment, some among them disobeyed his command.

Bread worms, and stank: this was a wonder also, that such a heavenly food, so pure and simple, should not only breed worms, but also stink. Which was a punishment for their disobedience, though a merciful one, in that God did not inflict it upon themselves, but upon their food.

The Jews commonly take these words to be transposed; things being wont first to putrefy, and then to breed worms; and in that order Moses relates this matter, when it was laid up for the Sabbath (ver. 29). “That it might be a sin, and neither was it any wonder therein.” But Abarbinel thinks that Moses here speaks of it according to the order wherein they found it: which was, that first worms appeared in it to their eyes, and then it smelt the stink. But in speaking of what fell out on the seventh day, he follows the natural order, and saith it did not stink, neither was there any worms therein.

Moses was wrath: Chid them severely for their disobedience to him, who had bestowed such a singular benefit upon them.

Ver. 21. And they gathered it every morning, every man according to his eating: and when the sun waxed hot, it melted.

And it came to pass, that on the sixth day they gathered twice as much bread, two-omers for one man: and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses.

And he said unto them, This is that which man according to his eating: This is not needlessly repeated; but a further explanation of their care and diligence, to furnish themselves early in the morning with as much as was necessary, before the sun grew hot and melted it; or (as some of the Jews add) raised the wind, which blew dust upon it.

When the sun waxed hot, it melted.] That it might not be trod upon, or putrefy. Which seems to be spoken of that which remained in the open field ungathered; though, Abarbinel will have it, that what they had brought into their tents melted also when the sun grew hot; which obliged them not only to gather it early, but to bake and prepare it presently, while it was yet hard and not dissolved. But I see no ground for this; nor is it likely that they were constrained to prepare it all together; but might any time that day be happy, and prepare it according to their liking. Others of the Jews fancy, that, being melted, it made little brooks and rivulets in the fields, &c.; but the plain sense is, that the sun which melted it, exhale it also into the air, from whence it came, and returned again the next morning.

Ver. 22. (In the sixth day.) According to the command of God, ver. 5. It appears by this place, where it is called bread (as it is ver. 4. 12), that it was of a hard substance when it fell, though it dissolved by the heat of the sun; being like the corn of which bread is made.

And all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses.] He had hidden them gather a double quantity on the sixth day; but had not told them the reason of it (ver. 5), and therefore they come to inquire what they should do with it. By this one would think they were the rulers, who saw a distribution made to every one, in a just proportion; or, that they appointed overseers to take care of it.

Ver. 23. This is that which the Lord hath said.] This is the commandment which I have received from God about this matter.

To morrow is the rest.] Or shall be the rest. Of the holy sabbath: To be kept holy, so as to do no work therein. And therefore you must not so much as go in the field and gather your food; which is the reason why you are ordered to make two provisions in one. The words in the Hebrew (which we translate the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord) may be rendered, as they lie in order, the sabbath, the holy sabbath unto the Lord. Which Abarbinel explains, as if the word Sabbath, being repeated, signified, that it was to be a cessation from all manner of work, because it was the Sabbath of the Lord himself, wherein he ceased from his works.

At this time, and not before, the rest of the seventh day seems to have been appointed. They performed religious offices upon one day in seven; but did not cease from all labour until now. These very words seem to show, there had been some observation of a Sabbath, heretofore, and was not wholly a new thing; for if it had, they could not have understood Moses, nor known what he meant. See what I have noted upon the second of Genesis: where I thought it reasonable to assert, that God intended to preserve a memory of the creation in six days, by appointing the seventh day to be kept holy. And therefore the more the Lord said, To morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord: bake that which ye will bake to day, and seethe that ye will seethe; and that which remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning.

24 And they laid it up until the morning, as Moses bade: and it did not stink, neither was there any worm therein.

25 And Moses said, Eat that to day; for to day is a sabbath unto the Lord: to day ye shall not find it in the field.

26 Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the sabbath, in it there shall be none.

27 ¶ And it came to pass, that when they went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none.

28 And the Lord said unto Moses, How long beginning. And therefore Moses here only gives an account why this precept was renewed at their coming out of Egypt: when there was a new religious observation added to it, which was not necessary before, viz. resting wholly from all manner of work. There is an excellent discourse on this subject in a late and author, J. Wagensel (in his Confutation of R. Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 559, &c.), who well observes, that this precept having a peculiar respect to the Jews, we are not bound to observe the rest of the Sabbath with such strictness as they did; but only as the patriarchs did before the giving of the law (p. 564). As for the translation of the day from the seventh to the sixth, it is impossible for the Jews to prove, that the day they observe is the seventh from creation. And besides that, the whole world cannot be tied to the circumstance of time precisely: for in some parts of it, the Sabbath will fall eighteen hours later than in Palestine; as he evidently shows, p. 572, &c.

29 And six day ye shall not find it in the field.] This Moses said to them, as Abarbinel thinks, in the evening of the Sabbath; which, in effect, a prohibition to them, not to go out to gather it on that day.

Ver. 26. Six days ye shall gather it, &c.] The same author thinks this is repeated to signify that as long as they continued in the wilderness, they should gather it six days in a week, as they did now; but never find any on the seventh.

There shall be none.] As you rest, saith he, from doing any thing about the manna, so God will cease from sending it unto you. Upon which he makes this pious reflection: That in this world we must work for our souls, if we would be happy in the next; while, whereby we do this, he means, that he labours in the evening of the Sabbath, shall eat on the Sabbath. To the same purpose Origen, long before him (Hom. vii. in Exod.).

Ver. 27. The same wicked disposition remained in them, which made them on other days keep it till next morning (ver. 19, 20).

Ver. 28. How long refuse ye to keep my commandments, &c.] These chiding words are full of indignation: and yet signify the long-suffering patience of God, with an untoward generation. Abarbinel expands this passage, as it, upon this occasion, he upbraided them with all their other transgressions; saying, "You kicked against me at the Red Sea, and believed not the words I spake to you at Marah also you murmured; and uttered very discontented words at Elim. Nay, after I had given you manna, you violated my precept, in reserving it till the next morning. And now you break my Sabbath; what hope is there that you will observe any of my laws?"

Refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?] He speaks thus, say some of the Jews, because that in which they now offended is a thing upon which the whole law, all his commandments depend. So the same Abarbinel. Because the Sabbath instructed them in the creation of the world, upon which all the law depends, therefore he saith, My commandments and my laws.

Ver. 29. See,] Consider.
refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?

29 See, for that the Lord hath given you the sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days; abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh day.

30 So shall ye lay up the sabbath-keeping on the seventh day.

31 And the house of Israel called the name thereof Manna: and it was like coriander seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey.

32 ¶ And Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commandeth, Fill an omer of it to be kept for your generations; that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt.

33 And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the Lord, to be kept for your generations.

34 As the Lord commanded Moses, so Aaron laid it up before the Testimony, to be kept.

35 And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited;

For that the Lord hath given you the sabbath, &c.] You have no reason to seek it on the Sabbath, being provided beforehand with as much as is sufficient for that day.

Let no man go out of his place] The Jews say that a man went out of his place, if he went above two thousand paces from his dwelling. That is, if he went beyond the suburbs of his city (Numb. xxxv. 5).

You gave them manna; and the solemn renewal of the precept (ver. 29), wrought so much upon them, that for the present they rested upon this day. And they not having been used to this rest, God did not immediately punish their disobedience in going abroad to gather manna: though afterwards he ordered a man to be stoned for gathering sticks on this day; for he had often repeated this law to them before that time.

Ver. 31. Called the name thereof Manna] This is repeated again, to show that the name which they gave it at first (ver. 15), continued to it afterward: being so apt and proper to signify God's providence over them, that they could find no better.

It was like coriander seed] Of a round figure, like that seed (ver. 14).

White] Being like bedolah, as Moses saith, Numb. xi. 7, which signifies pearl, as Bochart shows in his Hierozoic. (par. ii. p. 675), where he observes the Talmudic doctors (in the title Joma) expressly say it was like margarith (or margarit), i. e. pearl.

The taste of it was like wafers made with honey] All things of a pleasant relish are compared in Scripture to honey. Whence those words of David, Psalm xix. 11, cxix. 130. Onkelos saith, manna tasted like escarites: which was a delicious food at Rhodes (as Bochart observes out of Julius Poltux), between bread and cake (like biscuit, I suppose), which was so grateful, that they who did eat it were never satisfied, but still desired more.

In Numb. xi. 7, 8, manna is said to taste like fresh oil. Which doth not contradict this: for, as Abbarinell and others observe, the meaning is, that when it first fell, before it was prepared, it tasted like honey-water; but when it was baked, then it tasted like fresh oil.

And so the words, Numb. xi. 8, plainly import; "They took it, and beat it in a mortar, and baked it, &c. and the taste of it (i.e. thus prepared) was like the taste of fresh oil." Nay, the Jewish doctors commonly say it had all manner of pleasant savours, according to men's different palates; and whence they fancy it is called (ver. 29) the bread mishebe (which we translate of two days), because it was changed according to the diversity of those that did eat it; children, young men, and old. Which conceit the author of the Book of Wisdom follows (xvi. 20, 21).

Ver. 32. Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commandeth.] I have this further command to deliver from God concerning the manna.

Fill an omer of it] Just as much as was assigned to every one for his daily bread (ver. 16).

To be kept for your generations] For your posterity in future ages.

May see the bread wherewith I have fed you, &c.] For seeing with one's eyes (said ISAAC ARAMAH) mightily confirms a thing; and leaves one in no doubt of it. And he took care they should see both the manna itself, and God's providence which he bountifully allowed to every one of them.

Ver. 33. Moses said unto Aaron.] What God commanded Moses, he now commands Aaron to do.

Take a pot] He saith nothing of the matter of this pot, or urn; which some say was an earthen pot, others say of lead, brass, or iron: and ABABINEL thinks it was of glass, that one might see what was within. But the apostle hath settled this controversy, by calling it a golden pot (Heb. ix. 4), and so do the LXX. in this place. And indeed all the vessels of the sanctuary being of gold, it was but reason that this, which contained such a precious monument of God's mercy, should be of the same metal.

Lay it up before the Lord.] i.e. Before the ark of the testimony, as it is explained in the next verse; which shows that this command was given after the building of the tabernacle; and is here mentioned, because it belongs to the same matter which Moses relates in this chapter. Others suppose it was spoken by way of prolepsis; which seems not to me so probable.

Ver. 34. So Aaron laid it up.] When the tabernacle was built.

Before the Testimony.] This is the same with before the Lord, in the foregoing verse. For the Divine glory dwelt between the cherubims, which were over the ark; which is commonly called the ark of the testimony (xxx. 6, xl. 3, 5). But here, and xxxv. 36, is simply called the ark of the testimony, without leaving out the first word, which is very usual in other instances: for thus it is called the ark of God's strength (2 Chron. vi. 41), but elsewhere the first word being omitted, it is called only his strength (Ps. lxxxvii. 61, cv. 4). And therefore the ark is called the testimony: partly because there God gave them a special token of his dwelling among them; and partly because the two tables of stone were in the ark, which are called the testimony (xl. 20): where it is said, Moses put the testimony into the ark: and then immediately (ver. 21), he calls it the ark of the testimony.

Ver. 35. And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years.] Within a month; which wanted to make complete forty years. For it began to fall just thirty days after they came out of Egypt (on the 15th of April), and ceased to fall on the 15th or 16th of March, the day after the passover, which they kept in the fortieth year (Josh. v. 11, 12). Now in all writers, some days under or over are not wont to be considered, when there is a round number.

But there are those who fancy these words were
CHAPTER XVII.

1 The people murmured for water at Rephidim. 5 God senteth them for water to the rock in Horeb. 8 Amaleck is overcome by the holding up of Moses' hands. 15 Moses buildeth the altar JEHOVAH-nissi.

1 And all the congregation of the children of Israel journeyed from the wilderness of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the Lord, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink.

2 Wherefore the people did chide with Moses, two former stations: which is the reason they are here omitted. So Abarbinel judiciously observes. Moses would not set down in this history any of their stations but those in which some new and notable thing happened: the rest, in which no such thing was done, he describes in the book of Numbers, xxxiii.

Ver. 2. The people did chide with Moses. Exposit and with him in such an undutiful manner, that it may be translated soidled with him.

Give us water. The word for give is in the plural number: and therefore this was spoken both to Moses and to Aaron; though Moses be only mentioned as the person they contended with. For there was no need (as Aben Ezra and others observe) to mention Aaron, because not the sins of the people but by him. Abarbinel carries it further, and will have this speech directed to Moses and to God, because they came hither by God's commandment: which made them insolently say, if by God's providence we were brought to this place, let him take care we be not killed with thirst. You said unto me, Wherefore thinkest thou me? Who brought you hither by God's order. Wherefore do ye tempt the Lord? And why do you distrust his power, and goodness, and faithfulness to his promise?

36 Now an omer is the tenth part of an ephah.

And they did eat manna, until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan.

put into this book after Moses's death: for which I can see no ground. For it is certain he lived the greatest part of the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt, and brought them to the borders of Canaan, within sight of it (Deut. i. 3, xxxiv. 1, 2, &c.). And therefore may well be supposed to have added these words himself to this history, as he did the foregoing (ver. 32), that all belonging to this matter might be put together in one place. Until they came to a land inhabited.] i. e. To Canaan, or the borders of it, as it here follows. For these words, saith Aben Ezra, have respect to the wilderness in which they now were, which was not inhabited. Until they came unto the borders of—or Canaan.] That is, saith he, to Gilgal, which was the borders, when they had passed over Jordan: when they did eat of the corn of the land, and had no farther need of manna.

Ver. 36. An omer is the tenth part of an ephah.] From hence also some would fail to conclude that Moses did not write this: because, say they, it is not usual, when measures are in common use, to tell in other words how much they contained; which then only is proper when they are grown out of use. But such observations seem to proceed from a humour of cavilling. For why may not an author set down discussed things very well known in his time, that posterity also may have as distinct a knowledge of them? Besides, the very same men complain, on other occasions, that the writers of history have omitted to give us an account of several things, which in their time were most notorious; whereby posterity suffers much for want of such information. Nor do I see any proof that these measures were not as common in aftertimes as they were when Moses lived.

Several learned men have taken a great deal of pains to reduce these measures to those of the Greeks and Romans, particularly Salmasius in his epistles (n. lxxvii.), and Herman. Conringius, in a treatise on this subject, de Mensuris Hebraicos. But none have done it so clearly and exactly as a very learned person of our own country (Bishop Cumberland, in his Scripture Weights and Measures, chap. 3), who computes an ephah to have contained seven white-gallons, a bottle, and half a pint: so that an omer was near three quarters: which, if any one imagine too great a proportion to be allowed to one person every day, he propounds these things to be considered: that manna, being of a globular figure (like coriander-seed), must needs have many empty spaces between every three or four grains; and those vacuities may reasonably be estimated a third part of the vessel's capacity: and it being a light, aerial food, must needs be inwardly porous, and of a spongy contexture of parts. So that it wasted something in dressing by fire, as it melted by the sun when it grew hot: and consequently three quarters might, it is probable, be reduced to three pints of an oily liquid substance. Which was not too much in a hungry desert, where they might well be thought to have refreshed themselves thrice a day. See also what I have noted before, ver. 18. and said, Give us water that we may drink. And Moses said unto them, Why chide ye with me? wherefore do ye tempt the Lord?

3 And the people thirsted there for water; and the people murmured against Moses, and said, Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us up out of Egypt, to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst!

4 And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, there was no water in this place (ver. 1), which made them chide with Moses, for bringing them into such an inconvenient station. But if we consider it well, we shall find it a necessary explication of the growth and progress of their discontent. For, as Abarbinel hath well observed, as soon as they came to Rephidim, they saw it was no commodious place, because it would not supply them with water: which made them begin to quarrel with Moses before they needed; merely out of fear, that when the water they had brought from Elim was spent, there would be none for them. And now, when after a day or two it was all gone, they were really very thirsty, and so fell into the murmuring here spoken of from a sense of their misery, as before only out of a fear of thirst.

Murmured against Moses.] They proceeded from a lower to a higher degree of discontent; which made them at first only expostulate and argue with him; but now they murmur against him; and at length fell into such a rage, that they seemed to be ready to stone him (ver. 4). It is necessary to stop such moods in their beginning.

Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us up out of Egypt?] This shows the necessity of preserving the remembrance of God, and of his benefits, in our minds. Which if this people had done, they could not have fallen a third time into such a discontented fit, as made them speak reproachfully of their deliverance, and slight the wonderful deliverance itself, which God had lately given them out of cruel servitude. The character which Plato (in his Axiocchus) gives of the vulgar sort of people, belongs to the Israelites above all other; viz. that such is ἄχρεος, ἄχρον, ὑπόν, βασιλιωτός, ἔκαστον (tom. iii. p. 369).

They all us—with thirst?] Children, as Abarbinel observes, can less endure thirst than grown men; and cattle need abundance of water, which is the reason they mention them.

Ver. 4. Moses cried unto the Lord.] Which he did not upon their first complaint (ver. 2), because their necessity was not so urgent: but now, seeing their distress, and the height of their discontent, he prays God to take care of them: hoping he would supply them with drink, as lately he had done with bread.

What shall I do unto this people?] He said enough, no doubt, to quiet them; by remembering them what God had already done for them, and what reason they had still to trust in his good providence: but this would not satisfy them, unless their thirst was presently quenched; which he could not do for them, and therefore knew not how to appease them.

They be almost ready to stone me.] He represents to God not only their importunity, but his own great danger. For having promised to bring them to Canaan, he was afraid (as Abarbinel fancies) that if they continued to think they should die with thirst, they would take him for a false prophet, who had deceived them with lies; and consequently inflict the punishment upon him, which the law enacts against a false prophet, which was stoning. But the law being not yet given, this could not be in their thoughts.

What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me.

5 And the Lord said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smitest the river, take in thine hand, and go.

6 Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that much less follow them in their journeys, as this did. For this was a continued fountain of water, which flowed out of the rock (Psalm cxiv. 8), and made this part of Arabia habitable in future ages, which no man dwelt in before. Moses doth not add, “and the people drank, and their cattle,” because (as Aben Ezra observes) he studied brevity; and this was easily understood.

In the night of the elders] That they might be able to testify to the people the truth of this miracle, whereby they were relieved in their distress, and preserved in their travels through the wilderness: the fame of which, no doubt, reached other nations; the memory of it being remaining in several of their fables. For there is a manifest allusion to it in Euphrasie, lib. ii. ver. 703, where he makes one of them smiting the rock at Clitharon, and waters gush out of it.

This I find observed by Bochartus, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 16; and Huettus hath observed many more such instances out of Nonnus, Pausianias, and divers other authors, in his Alcanetane Questiones, lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 18. And he thinks it very probable, that the fable of Janus was forged from hence; for which he alleges many arguments (in his Demonstratio Evan.), and among the rest; that Albinus describes his image holding a rod in his left hand, with which he smites a stone, and out of it water flows.

Ver. 7. He called the name of the place Massah, and Meribah, &c.] That place which before was called Rephidim, was after this called Massah and Meribah: with respect to their chiding there with Moses, which is here put in the name of Massah, not for they were heretofore chiding with God, which is the signification of Massah. Some think this one place was not called by two names; but that, upon the second striking of the rock, almost forty years after this, it was called Meribah, and till then only Massah. But in that story it is not said the place was called Meribah, but the water (Num. xxx. 13).

Is the Lord among us, or not?] Doth he take care of us, or not regard what becomes of us? For God is said to be among, or (as the phrase is in the Hebrew) in the midst of those whom he protects, and provides for, by a special providence, as we find Deut. vii. 21, xxiii. 14; Josh. iii. 20, and many other places.

Ver. 8.] The ground of their unbelief is commonly thought to be the absence of Moses, the head of the tribe of the Israelites, and the deliverer of them: And this is the common reason why the Canaanites, and most nations of the world, left their state of slavery to become free, and to live in peace, so that they might be left in possession of their own lands, and be the masters of them. But while the power of the Israelites was so small, and the confidence of their enemies was so great, they could not expect such success as they did. But these two things were nothing to the Canaanites, though they had a most powerful monarchy, and a great number of men, they were nothing to the Israelites, who were but a small and indigent people.

Ver. 9. Moses said unto Joshua, &c.] Nothing but a strong confidence in God could have animated men, inexperienced in the arts of war, to encounter such mighty enemies.

Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill.] The Jews do but conjecture with this Hurus; but we may be sure that it was of great esteem for wisdom and piety, otherwise he would not have been joined with the leaders of God’s people, Moses and Aaron. We read, indeed (1 Chron. ii. 19), of one Hur, who was the son of Caleb, and grandfather of the famous Bezealeel, who was of the tribe of Judah. But there is nothing to persuade us that he was the person here spoken of, nor that he was the son of Moses’s sister, as some of the Jews tells us. See Pirke Eliezer, cap. 45, where strange stories are told of him. But it is more probable that he was Miriam’s husband, as Josephus affirms (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 2), though we cannot tell whence he himself was descended.

Ver. 11. When Moses held up his hand.] Lifting up the hands was a posture of prayer, and imploring the Divine aid, as we find in many places; particularly Lam. iii. 40, “Let us lift up our hearts with our hands to God in the heavens.” And it implies great earnestness in prayer; as doth also lifting up the eyes, and lifting up the soul (Psalm xxv. 1, exxii. 1, &c.). But though this be true, and no doubt Moses and his companions prayed to God most earnestly, yet this was not the occasion of his lifting up his hand; which was to advance the rod of God, which he held in his hand, and lifted up as their standard or banner, to which they should look and hope for help, from the
12. But Moses' hands were heavy; and they took a stone, and put it under him, and he sat thereon: and Aaron and Hur stood up on his hands, the one on this side, and the other on the other side; and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun.

mighty power of God, who had done such wonders by that rod.

Moses prevailed.] The sight of the rod of God inspired them with such courage, that their enemies could not stand before them.

When he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed.] Their spirits flagged when they did not see the rod; and they began to give ground: imagining, perhaps, that Moses despaired of victory; who (the fight being long) was not, or always to keep his amakel and his people.

Ver. 12. Moses' hands were heavy;] Through weakness, by long holding them out upon the stretch.

And they took a stone, and put it under him, and he sat thereon;] It seems he had been standing before, which gave them the greater advantage of seeing the rod, but made him the more weary.

Ver. 13. Joshua discomfited Amalek, &c.] Were his supporters; which is probably so in this manner. Sometimes Moses held up the rod in his right hand, and sometimes in his left (for ver. 11, he speaks only of one hand which was lifted up, or let down), and Aaron stood on one side of him (suppose his right hand), and Hur stood on the other: who, by that means, helped by turns to uphold his hands in that posture: for if they had done it both together, they might have been as weary as he.

His hands were steady, &c.] Were kept up stretched out, without falling down, till sun-set.

Ver. 13. Joshua discomfited Amalek, &c.] Routeled their whole army. One would think the name of their kings was Amalek (as the kings of Egypt were called) to be always to keep his amakel and his people.

Otherwise, if Amalek signifies collectively the Amalekites, then his people must signify those who were confederate with them.

Ver. 14. The Lord said unto Moses,] He appeared, it is likely, to him again in this place (as he had done, ver. 6), and gave him this order.

I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek: ] Have a perpetual quarrel with them, till they be quite extinct; as they were partly by Saul (1 Sam. xv.), and partly by David (1 Sam. xxx. 17), and partly by the children of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 43). Balaam also prophesied of their utter destruction (Numb. xxiv. 23). Which may seem a harsh sentence; but it was (as Maimonides observes) to terrify others from the like malice. For as particular persons are sometimes punished very severely, for an example to others; so are families and nations. And Amalek, being the very first that drew a sword against Israel, unpro

13. And Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven.

voked, God passed this heavy doom upon them: whereas Ammon and Moab (seith he) who out of mere covetousness, had committed what they did against Israel, and wrought mischief to them by craft and subtility, had only this punishment inflicted upon them, that Israel should not contract affinity with them, &c., Deut. xxivii. 3, 4; xxv. ult. (More Noevoch. par. ili. cap. 41).

Ver. 15. Moses built an altar.] Commonly alters were built for the honours of Moses: One of whose altars was offer'd in thankfulness to God for his benefits, particularly this great victory. But they were also built sometimes only as memorials (Josh. xxvii. 26, 27), as this perhaps was: he thinking it fit to preserve the memory of this victory, not only by writing, but by this monument also, and the inscription he left upon it. [Hieroch.-pol. lib. i. cap. 6.].

Ver. 16. Because the Lord hath sworn, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, the hand upon the throne of the Lord. Which is commonly interpreted, the Lord hath sworn that this throne shall be for ever. The Aben Ezra; and the Chaldee, whose paraphrase is, "this is spoken with an oath, from the face of the terrible One, whose Majesty is upon the throne of glory, that the Lord will have war with Amalek, &c. That is, saith Maimonides, he hath sworn by himself (More Noevoch. par. i. p. 9), for in this, and all other places, the word base (i. e. throne) signifies his magnificence and power: which is not any thing without his essence; but is himself.

But here being no mention of lifting up the hand, which is the phrase for swearing (Exod. vi. 8; Deut. xxvii. 40), it may more simply be expounded, "because the hand of the Lord, sitting upon the throne of his Majesty, is stretched out, and holds up his banner, to fight with Amalek throughout all generations. For Moses seems to allude in this phrase to what he had said, ver. 11, 12. "When Moses lifted up his hand, then Israel prevailed," &c., and bids them take notice, it was his hand, i.e. the omnipotent power of God, which gave them this victory: and would perpetually prosecute Amalek, till they were destroyed from under heaven.

Joseph Scaliger would have Kes-juhls to be but one word, and to signify the same with Kese; which, according to him, is the last day of the month, on which this battle was fought. And so this to be a part of the inscription upon the altar; as if he had
CHAPTER XVIII.

15 And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it JEHOVH-nissi:

16 For he said, Because the LORD hath sworn, said, "this pillar was set up on the last day of the second month, to declare γενομένων αὐτοῦ, irreconcilable war with Amalek for ever" (lib. iii. de Emanuel. Temp. p. 293). But this is too bold a conceit, and is confuted by Hackspan and Glassius. There is a more ingenious conjecture (which I have somewhere met with), if there were any thing in Scripture to warrant it, that laying the hand on the throne was a form of swearing: as touching the altar was among some nations, which was as much as our laying the hand on the Bible: a principal external character of a solemn oath. Whence Juvenal saith, atheists do intrepidis altaria tangere, "touch the altars boldly without trembling; i.e. make no conscience of an oath.

And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it JEHOVH-nissi: that the LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation.

But the marginal translation, after all, is very literal, and makes the sense exceeding plain and clear: "because the hand (of Amalek) is against the throne of the LORD (i.e. against God himself), therefore the LORD will have war with Amalek, from generation to generation." This is dry and natural, and agrees with the whole history: that because they came out and opposed the design of God, who in a visible and most glorious manner conducted the Israelites to the land he had promised to give them, he would never be reconciled to them. For it was a high affront to his Majesty, who had lately done such astonishing wonders as were famed, no doubt, in all the neighbouring nations (xv. 14, 15).

CHAPTER XVIII.

1 Jethro bringeth to Moses his wife and two sons. 7 Moses entertaineth him. 27 Jethro departeth.

1 When Jethro, the priest of Midian, Moses' father in law, heard of all that God had done for Moses, and for Israel his people, and that the LORD had brought Israel out of Egypt;

2 Then Jethro, Moses' father in law, took Zipporah, Moses' wife, after he had sent her back,

3 And her two sons; of which the name of the one was Gershom; for he said, I have been an alien in a strange land:

4 And the name of the other was Eliezer;

Ver. 1. Jethro, the priest of Midian, &c.] Many ancient and later versions have it, prince of Midian: (see ch. ii. 16).

Ver. 2. Zipporah, Moses' wife, after he had sent her back;] It is uncertain when Moses sent her back to her father: but it is likely it was done at her own desire, when she saw how difficult his work was likely to prove in Egypt (see iv. 26). The Hebrew word seems to some to intimate a divorce, as the Mauritanian Jews take it, But all Christian versions, and that of the German Jews, and the Persian, understand it as we do (see Selden de Uxor. Hebr. p. 529).

Ver. 3. Her two sons;] Whose names carry in them a thankful remembrance of God's great mercy to him.

Ver. 4. Gershom.] See ii. 22.

Ver. 5. Eliezer.] Who is thought to have been born a little before he left Midian, and went out of Midian into Egypt by God's special direction (see iv. 25).

Ver. 5. Jethro, &c. came—unto Moses] Took a journey out of Midian to give him a visit, into the wilderness: into the same wilderness where Moses and the Israelites were now. Where he encamped at the mount of God.] viz. At Horch, which was not far from Midian, it appears from iii. 11, where we read that when Moses fed Jethro's flock, he led them hither to this mount. Which is called God's mount, because there he appeared first to Moses (iii. 2, &c.), and had lately appeared there again upon the rock (xvii. 6), unto which place he bid Moses lead the congregation (xvii. 5), who were now, I suppose, encamped thereabout, after the fight with Amalek in Rephidim; which was not far from it.

Ver. 6. He said unto Moses.] By a letter which he sent him from the place where he was encamped (of which these were the contents), to give him notice of his coming. Which was but necessary; that he might without any impediment pass the guards, which we may well think Moses had set very carefully, after the fight with Amalek; who had suddenly surprised the hindmost of the people (Deut. xxv. 18).

I thy father in law Jethro am come unto thee, &c.] Am upon the way, and come near to thee.

Here it may be fit to take notice that there is a great dispute among interpreters, about the time when Jethro came from Midian, with Moses's wife and children: whether immediately after the fight with Amalek, as it is here set down; or some time after, when the Israelites were better settled. One would think, that he could not but take the first opportunity to visit Moses, and to bring him and his nearest relations together, after he heard the news of their coming out of Egypt, and their passing the Red Sea, &c. the news of which could not but reach him, who was a borderer upon this wilderness. Yet the Hebrews are generally of an opinion, that this fell out after the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, and many Christians have been of the same mind; particularly such great men as our most learned prince Usher, ad A. M. 3514, and Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 2, 7 And Moses went out to meet his father in law, and did obeisance, and kissed him; and they asked each other of their welfare; and they came into the tent.

8 And Moses told his father in law all that the Lord had done unto Pharaoh and to the Egyptians for Israel's sake, and all the travail that had come upon them by the way, and how the Lord delivered them.

9 And Jethro rejoiced for all the goodness which the Lord had done to Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians.

10 And Jethro said, Blessed be the Lord, who hath delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of Pharaoh, who hath delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians.

11 Now I know that the Lord is greater than all gods; for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly he was above them.

12 And Jethro, Moses' father in law, took a burnt offering and sacrifices for God; and Aaron came, and all the elders of Israel, to eat bread with Moses' father in law before God.
13 And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses sat to judge the people: and the people stood from Moses by the morning unto the evening.

14 And when Moses' father in law saw all that he did to the people, he said, What is this thing that thou doest to the people? why sittest thou thyself alone, and all the people stand by thee from morning unto even?

The foregoing verse: and then the meaning is, that the Lord confounded them that proudly contended his authority, saying, "Who is the Lord," &c. (v. 2), when the law was given, and this pardon (see 27), and at last drowned him and his host in the Red Sea, when they said, in a haughty boasting manner, "I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil, my lust shall be satisfied upon them," &c. (xv. 9). And to this purpose the Chaldean expounds it: "in that very thing wherein they thought to judge (i.e. to punish or destroy) the Israelites, they were judged themselves:" i.e. drowned in the sea, as they intended to drown all their male children.

Ver. 12. Jethro, Moses' father in law.] He is constantly thus described (ver. 1, 2, 5—8, and everywhere else but ver. 9, 10), to distinguish him from any other Jethro, to whom these things might possibly be thought to belong.

Burnt offering] Which was to be wholly consumed upon the altar, and nothing of it eaten by any body (Lev. i. 9). This now may be thought to have been done, after the giving of the law at Mount Sinai: which Moses here mentions, because he put together all that belongs to Jethro's story (though not all done at the very same time), just as I said he did when he referred the history of the manna, xvi. 32, 33 (see there).

Sacrifices] i.e. Peace-offerings: of which the people as well as the priests were to be partakers (Lev. vii. 34; Deut. xxxvi. 7). And regularly there never were any burnt-offerings made, which were wholly consumed upon the altar, but peace-offerings attended upon them; if they were not offerings for the whole congregation, but for particular persons; that so they who brought them might feast also with God upon the sacrifices. For feasting upon sacrifices was an appendix unto all sacrifices whatsoever, one way or other; if not by themselves, yet by the priests, who ate of the sin-offerings, as the proxies of the people. Of the burnt-offerings the Jews after the law was given, but among other people, who had this custom antecedent to it: as appears from Num. xxv. 2, where the Midianites invite the Israelites "to the sacrifices of their gods, and the people did eat," &c. Which they did not learn from Moses, but derived from higher antiquity; it is probable even from Abraham himself.

For God.] To be strictly understood: Who offered them we are not told: but it should seem by the word took, that Jethro himself (who was a priest) was permitted to perform this office; in token that they owned him to be a faithful servant and minister of the most high God, as Melchizedek was. And accordingly it follows that Aaron was invited, with the elders of Israel, to come and feast with him upon these sacrifices.

Aaron came.] This seems to signify, that Aaron was but a guest, and had not been the priest who offered the sacrifices. For though we suppose the law to have been now given, yet it is likely Aaron and his sons were not yet consecrated, nor the service of God as yet ordered, according to the law that had been delivered: no more than judges-

15 And Moses said unto his father in law, Because the people came unto me to enquire of God:

16 When they have a matter, they come unto me; and I judge between one and another, and I do make them know the statutes of God, and his laws.

17 And Moses' father in law said unto him, The thing that thou doest is not good.

Ver. 13. To partake of the sacrifices that had been offered: for this comprehends the whole meal (Gen. xliii. 25).

Before God. Before the tabernacle where God dwelt. Or, if that was not yet set up, in the place where God appeared in an extraordinary manner, which it was likely was in the tent of Moses (xxxix. 7).

Ver. 15. It came to pass on the morrow.] The next day after this solemn sacrifice: which the Jews (I observed above) say was on the eleventh day of Tisri. So Neher Mechilta, and others from thence, as Mr. Selden hath noted (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 2, p. 75).

That Moses sat] That was the posture of judges.

To judge] To hear causes and determine them.

The people stood by Moses, &c.] That was the posture both of the plaintiff and the defendant. And there were now so many causes brought before him, that they took up the whole day; so that he had no time to eat at all, and was forced to live by what he could get.

Ver. 15. When Moses' father in law saw all that he did] He either was present and observed himself; or was informed by others what insupportable pains he took.

He said, What is this thing that thou doest to the people?] What a burden is this, to judge the causes of a whole nation!

Why sittest thou thyself alone?] Take more upon thee than any one person is able to bear.

All the people stand by thee from morning unto even?] Till both thou and they are tired.

Ver. 15. Because the people come unto me] I cannot refuse to do justice: and there is none but myself to declare what the law of God is in such cases as are brought before me.

To enquire of God.] Doth not signify here, to desire him to consult the Divine Majesty for them: but to decide their controversies according to the mind of God; declared in the laws he had given him. So the LXX. to seek for judgment from God: and the Vulgar, to seek God's sentence. For what was determined according to the law was the judgment of God, and so it is called by Moses (see Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 15, p. 610).

Ver. 16. When they have a matter.] Of controversy.

They come unto me.] That I may decide it.

I judge.] Determine where the right lies.

I do make them know the statutes of God, and his laws.] This explains what is meant by inquiring of God, i.e. what was the law of God in the case brought before him. From which we may probably gather, that the law was already given from Mount Sinai, and all the other laws and statutes which follow (ch. xxi. xxii. xxiii), before this happened. Unless we will say, as some do, that Moses was directed, upon the spot (as we speak), by a secret inspiration, how to determine every cause.
18 Thou wilt surely wear away, both thou, and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thyself alone.

19 Hearken now unto my voice, I will give thee counsel, and God shall be with thee: Be thou for the people to Godward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God:

20 And thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws, and shalt shew them the way wherein they must walk, and the work that they must do.

21 Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens:

22 And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter

Such as fear God.] Men truly religious; who would fear to offend God by doing injustice, but not fear to offend men by doing right.

Men of truth.] Honest, upright men; whose love to truth would make them sift it out; by hearing both sides patiently, with impartial attention and unbiased affection.

Hating covetousness.] Not greedy of money; but abhorring bribes, and all base ways of gain. Which, as Demosthenes says, ἐφρονοσ καὶ παραπόλης καὶ τοις ἐξαιρετικοῖς, "make judges beside themselves, and no better than mad."

For all these good qualities they were to be eminent and noted among the people, as Moses's words import (Deut. i. 13, _et cetera_; and the Talmudists discourse upon it very largely, in the forementioned place, _ibid._, de Synedr. cap. 15, p. 615). Where he shows, that _Decemvirs_, for instance, was not only one set over ten; but one of the ten judges of which a court consisted; and so the rest may be interpreted. But the most ancient and most received sense is, that he doth not speak of the number of judges (for what a strange court would that be in which there was a thousand judges!) but of the people, of whose causes they were to take cognisance; and it is commonly thought also there was but one ruler over a thousand (families or men, it is uncertain which), and so of the rest: though the words may import more than one in each case, of which we may judge from the context. The Talmudists make a prodigious number of judges of each sort: but it is most rational to think that Jethro's meaning was, that he should constitute greater and lesser judicatures, according to the division of their several tribes, into thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, and appoint a competent number of persons to be judges in those greater or lesser courts.

For, that their tribes were divided into thousands (for instance) is apparent from several places, Josh. xxii. 14; Judg. vi. 15, (where Gideon saith, _my family_ (in the Hebrew _it is my thousand_ is the _meanest in Israel_) 1 Chron. xii. 20; _Mie. v. 2. These thousands Corn._. Bemazmus takes to be families, whom the Hebrews call _house_; which were divided into so many heads, as they call them, as the tribes were into families. And of these, he thinks, Jethro advises him to make such rulers as are here mentioned, of several degrees. But others (particularly Herm. Conningius de Republ. Hebr. sect. 19) think we are to understand only rulers over a thousand men, not families: as it is certain in military affairs, the captains of thousands were only of a thousand soldiers (Num. xxxi. 14).

_Rulers of hundreds_, _fifties_, and _tens_; _there were_ four orders of these rulers: but whether there was a subordination of the lower order to the higher, as in armies there is of the captain to the colonel (as they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee.

23 If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure, and all this people shall also go to their place in peace.

24 So Moses hearkened to the voice of his father in law, and did all that he had said.

we now speak), and the inferior to him, I cannot determine.

Ver. 22. Let them judge the people at all seasons.

Sit every day, some or other of them, in their several districts (see ver. 26).

Every great matter they shall bring unto thee, Not if they were able to determine it themselves. For they had power to hear all causes; but when they found a cause that put them out of business, they brought it to be heard by Moses himself. So R. Levi ben Gersom explains it: "Every great cause, in which they know not what to judge, they shall bring to thee, and thou shalt show what is right:" or how it is to be decided.

There are those, indeed, who think there were several sorts of causes, that might not be brought before these inferior courts; but were to be reserved for Moses's hearing and judging. These they make to be four: First, all sacred matters or things belonging unto God; which they gather from ver. 19. Secondly, all matters of equity; where the rigour of the law was fit to be mitigated. Thirdly, all capital causes. And lastly, such as the "judicatures," i. e. rulers of thousands, and the other judges referred to him. But this is said without ground; for it is plain, all sorts of causes might be determined by the inferior courts, if they were able to make an end of them, whether civil or sacred. Only those which were too difficult for them; that is, when they did not find a law to direct them, or it was obscure, or they could not agree about the punishment, then they brought it before Moses. So he himself charges; not that the people should bring such causes to him as they thought difficult, but that the judges themselves should bring them; i. e. order an appeal to him; (Deut. i. 17), "Bring it unto me (speaking to the judges) and I will hear it." Which shows the cause had been before the other courts before, and that it was not unlawful for them to meddle with it if they had been able to determine it. And accordingly we read here below (ver. 26), that the judges did so. In short, these words do not intimate that there were some causes the other judges might not try, if they were able; but only that such things as they found themselves not skilful enough to determine, they should bring to him (see Mr. Selden in the fornamed book, p. 633, &c.).

But every small matter they shall judge.] Hitherto Moses had heard all causes promiscuously, great and small: but Jethro well advises him to delegate the labour of judging all causes liquidi juris (as the lawyers speak) where the right was clear; and to reserve no part of the judicature to himself, but where the law itself was either defective or obscure.

So shall it be easier] Thou wilt ease thyself of a great burden, by appointing others to take their share of it.

Ver. 23. If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so, If thou wilt follow this advice, by God's approbation; who was to be consulted whether he allowed it. Then thou shalt be able to endure] Thy days will be prolonged; which otherwise will be shortened with this intolerable labour.

Go to their place in peace.] Go home very much satisfied, with such quick despatch, and happy composure of their differences.

Ver. 24. Moses hearkened to the voice of his father in law, &c.] Followed his counsel, by God's approbation, with whom no doubt he advised (ver. 25). Here the Samaritan copy inserts those words of Moses ascribed to God (Deut. i. 9, &c.), "I am not able to hear you myself alone, the Lord your God hath multiplied you," &c. Which he spake indeed, when he made this constitution, but did not set it down in this book, where he intended only a short account of these transactions.

Ver. 25. Moses chose able men.] Out of those who were presented to him by the people (see ver. 20).

Ver. 26. Judged the people at all seasons.] Whencever they resorted to them: for some court or other sat every day that was not appointed by God for other business, i. e. for religion.

Hard causes they brought unto Moses.] It is plain by this that the judges, not the people, brought the hard causes unto Moses, for the people could not know whether they might not have a remedy nearer hand (than by going to him on all occasions) till they had tried.

Ver. 27. Moses let his father in law depart:] After he had stayed some time, and he could not prevail with him to stay longer (which he earnestly desired), and go with them to see the accomplishment of God's promises to them; as those words, Numb. x. 29, &c. are thought to signify. But perhaps that Hobah there mentioned, was not Jethro himself, but his son; whom Moses also persuaded not to return to his own country: for he makes no reply, much less denies to stay with Moses, when he pressed him the second time, though he refused at first (ver. 32). But this I shall consider in that place.

He went his way into his own land.] To make his children, or the people of the land, proselytes, saith the Chaldee paraphrase. Which it is probable he endeavoured (i. e. to bring them to true religion) and effected in some measure: so that pety was propagatated in some families among them to future generations. For the Rechabites came out of this country (1 Chron. ii. 55), whose virtue Jeremiah praises in the latter end of the Jewish church (ch. XXXV.).
CHAPTER XIX.

1 In the third month, when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the same day came they into the wilderness of Sinai.

2 For they were departed from Rephidim, and came to the desert of Sinai, and had pitched in the wilderness; and there Israel camped before the mount.

Chap. XIX.

Ver. 1. In the third month.] Or, in the third new moon. For the Hebrew word chodesh signifies a new moon, as well as a month: nay, that is the prime signification, from whence the other is derived. And so we are to understand it here; that on the new moon, i.e. the first day of the third month (called Sivan), after their coming out of Egypt, they came into the wilderness of Sinai. Which was just forty-five days after they departed out of Egypt. For, if we add to the fifteen days of the first month twenty-nine, which made the second, these put together, with this new moon, make forty-five. Unto which, if we add that day when Moses went up to God (ver. 3), and reported, when he came down, the message God sent by him to the elders of Israel; and the next day after when he returned their answer unto God (ver. 7, 8), with the three days more, which God gave them to prepare themselves for his coming down among them (ver. 10, 11), there were just fifty days from their passover to the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai: which laid the foundation of the great feast of Pentecost.

Same day] i.e. On the forementioned new moon of the third month.

Wilderness of Sinai.] So called from that famous mountain Sinai, which gave the name to the wilderness which lay before it. This mountain was also called Horeb (Deut. iv. 10), they being only different tops of one and the same mountain; but this higher than Hadnim, the highest peak of the Red Sea from thence, as they that have travelled in those parts affirm, who say it is now called by the Arabians, Tur; and by Christians, the Mountain of St. Catharine.

Ver. 2. Departed from Rephidim, &c.] They began to move from Rephidim towards that part of the mountain called Horeb, upon their un murmuring for want of water (xvii. 5, 6). But seem to have returned thither to fight with Amalek (ver. 8). And then they were led by God to this other side of the mountain, which is called the wilderness of Sinai.

Israel camped before the mount.] For the glorious cloud having led them hither, rested upon the mount; as appears from the words following.

Ver. 3. Moses went up unto God.] Whose glorious majesty appeared upon the mount.

And the Lord called] Or rather, for the Lord called to him out of the mountain, where the Divine glory rested: unto which he would not have presumed to go, if the Lord had not called to him to come up thither. Which was upon the second day of the third month.

Say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel.] There was some reason, sure, for calling them by these two names, the house of Jacob and the children of Israel; which perhaps was to put them in mind that they, who had lately been as Jacob when he went to Padan-aram, were now grown as great as God made him when he came from thence, and was called Israel.

Ver. 4. Ye have seen.] There needs no proof, for you yourselves are witnesses.

What I did unto the Egyptians.] Smite them with divers sore plagues, and at last drowned them and their chariots in the Red Sea.

How I bore you on eagles' wings.] Kept you so safe, and placed you so far out of the reach of your enemies, as if you had been borne up on high by an eagle. Which are observed to carry their young ones, not in their feet, as other birds are wont to do, but on their wings; and to soar so high, and with so swift a motion, that none can pursue them, much less touch them. Bochartus hath observed all the properties ascribed to the eagle; with respect to which, interpreters have thought God's care of his people to be here compared with that bird (Hierozoic, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 5). But after all he judiciously concludes, that Moses best explains his own meaning, in his famous song, Deut. xxxiii. 11, where the eagle's fluttering about her nest, and making a noise, to stir up her young ones to leave their dirty nest, and try their wings, represents the many means God had used to rouse up the drooping spirits of the Israelites, when they lay miserably oppressed under a cruel servitude, and encourage them to aspire after liberty, and to obey those who lead them, even the Lord, out of the Red Sea.

Brought you unto yourself.] And by that means brought you hither to live under my government. For this was the very foundation of his peculiar empire over them, that he had ransomed and redeemed them out of slavery, by a mighty hand and stretched-out arm (as he speaks, xiii. 5; Deut. iv. 34), so as he had not delivered any other nation: and thereby made them his own, after an extraordinary manner, peculiar to them alone. This Joshua also recalls to their mind, when he was near his death, and renewed this covenant of God with them (xxiv. 5, 6, &c.).

Ver. 5.] Having wonderfully delivered them, and supported them in a miraculous manner, by bread from heaven, and water out of a rock; he now proceeds to instruct them in their duty, as Greg. Nyssen observes, L. de Vita Mosis, p. 172.

If ye will obey my voice indeed, &c.] If you will sincerely obey me, as your king and governor, and keep the covenant I intend to make with you, then you shall be mine above all the people of the earth; for I will cause them to inherit the land, as well as yours; but you shall be my peculiar inheritance; in which I will establish my kingdom and priesthood; with such laws as shall not only distinguish you from all other nations, but make deed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people; for all the earth is mine:

6 And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel.

7 ¶ And Moses came and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which the Lord commanded him.
8 And all the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the Lord.
9 And the Lord said unto Moses, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may you to excel them. This is the sense of this verse, and the following.

A peculiar treasure unto me [i.e. of God] is the temple (c.s. and the Lord in the temple), even the whole kingdom of priests (ver. 6). The word is given by Moses, but the people, in the words of the verse, do not say it, but only consent to it. For they cannot say, "We will not be a peculiar treasure unto thee, for all the earth is mine;" nor "I will not be a kingdom of priests," for then they would need not to be king over others, nor will they say, "We will not be unto thee a kingdom of priests and an holy nation.

For all the earth is mine." But they say, "We will do all that the Lord hath spoken we will do." But the meaning of the word of the Lord is that they should not be a kingdom of priests as against all the world (in contradistinction to the priests of the Gentiles), but be a kingdom of priests as against the nations of Israel. For the word of the Lord signifies, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests;" and the people say, "We will do as the Lord saith, if we be the kingdom of priests, and the Lord shall bless us as a people.

Ver. 7. Moses came] Down from the mount, where he had been with God (ver. 3).

Moses returned the words of the people unto the Lord. [This seems to have been done the next day, which was the third day of the third month. Upon which report made to God for the people's consent, he pronounced the blessings of the preceding verses, after this manner: "Ver. 8, 9. Laid before their faces all these words. Plainly declared to them, what God had given him in charge: which they went and propounded to the people of the several tribes, whom they represented."

Ver. 8.] All with one consent declared as here follows:

All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. They consented to have the Lord for their king; and promised to be obedient to his will.

Moses returned the words of the people unto the Lord. [This seems to have been done the next day, which was the third day of the third month. Upon which report made to God for the people's consent, he pronounced the blessings of the preceding verses, after this manner: "Ver. 8, 9. Laid before their faces all these words. Plainly declared to them, what God had given him in charge: which they went and propounded to the people of the several tribes, whom they represented."

Ver. 9.] The Lord said unto Moses, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud. In a thick cloud. In a darker cloud than that which had hitherto gone before them to conduct them; so that they should see nothing but flashes of lightning which came out of it, in a very frightful manner (ver. 16, 18). For, that there was fire in it, appears from Deut. iv. 11, v. 22, 23, though at first, perhaps, only a thick cloud appeared, as a token of his approach. "That the people may hear when I speak with thee." Though they saw no similitude, yet they plainly heard a voice speaking unto Moses, and declaring their duty. Maimonides, indeed, thinks that the words were directed only unto Moses; and that the Israelites heard merely the sound of the words, but did not distinctly understand what was said (More Nochot, par. ii, cap. 33). Which is directly against what Moses says (Deut. iv. 12), "The Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire," &c., and (v. 4, 5), "The Lord talked with you face to face in the mount, &c., hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moses told the words of the people unto the Lord.

10 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Go unto the people, and sanctify them to day and to morrow, and let them wash their clothes; and be ready against the third day: for the third day the Lord will come down in the sight of all the people upon mount Sinai.

11 And thou shalt set bounds unto the people round about, saying, Take heed to your-selves, that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: whosoever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death:

12 There shall not an hand touch it, but he shall surely be stoned, or shot through; whether it be beast or man, it shall not live: when the trumpet soundeth long, they shall come up to the mount.

14 ¶ And Moses went down from the mount unto the people, and sanctified the people; and they washed their clothes.

Ver. 11. Be ready against the third day.] He doth not mean the third day of the month, but the third day after this command to sanctify themselves. In which they were bound to spend two entire days; and then the Lord promised to come down in all their sight upon Mount Sinai. That is, when they were fit to receive him, by their professing themselves a holy people, of which that outward washing was a token.

For the third day the Lord will come down, &c. Not from the mount, but from heaven, upon Mount Sinai. On which the Shechinah descended in a cloud, which struck a great awe into them: for it was darker than the pillar of the cloud by which they had been conducted either on the way or in the place of their encampment, and glimpse of a glorious majesty that was in it, broke forth upon them.

Ver. 12. Set bounds unto the people round about.] To keep them at a due distance, out of a just reverence to the Divine Majesty.

Take heed to yourselves, &c.] This caution also was given them, to work and preserve in their minds a most profound reverence of the Divine Majesty; and to those laws which were to be delivered from this mount.

Ver. 13. He shall surely be stoned, or shot through:] Be stoned, if he were near at hand; or shot through with darts or arrows, if at a distance. So Aben Ezra. And so Jonathan, likewise, translates the latter clause, they shall throw darts at him: and so our old translators, broken through with darts. But the Talmudists, and the greatest lawyers among the Jews, expound both these clauses of stoning, which was twofold, as we read in the Misna Tit. Sanhedrin, cap. 6, either by throwing stones at a malefactor, or throwing him down from a high place upon stones. And thus this last phrase imports in the Hebrew, and may properly be translated, projecting a prodigious stone; which he shall be violently thrown down; or, thrown down headlong. It is the very same word with that (xxv. 4) concerning the casting of Pharaoh's chariots into the sea. And this was a punishment, as Mr. Selden observes, like that among the Romans, from the Saxum Tarpeian, which the Jews inflicted upon some captive Edomites (2 Chron. xxv. 19), and Jehu inflicted upon Jezebel (2 Kings ix. 33). On which story R. Levi ben Gersam observes pertinently, that as she caused Naboth to be stoned, so she was punished herself in the same kind; for stoning, saith he, was either by throwing stones at malefactors, or throwing them down upon stones: to justify which, he alleges this place in Exodus. And David Kimchi makes the same observation (see Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 5, p. 74, &c.).

When the trumpet soundeth long.] When the sound of it is protracted, or drawn out; and, consequently, was less terrible than while it was shorter and broken (see ver. 16).

Ver. 14. Shall come up to the mount.] To the foot of it (ver. 17), that they might more plainly hear the voice of God.
and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly.

19 And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice.

20 And the Lord came down upon mount Sinai, on the top of the mount: and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount; and Moses went up.

21 And the Lord said unto Moses, Go down, charge the people, lest they break through unto the Lord to gaze, and many of them perish.

22 And let the priests also, which come near

Sanctified the people.] Commanded them to sanctify themselves (as the author of Sepher Cosri explains it, par. i. sect. 87), both with internal sanctification and external; among which the principal was, separation from the company of women, as it here follows (ver. 15). Washed their clothes.] See ver. 10. Unto which add, that it is no wonder they used this purification before the giving of the law: which had been anciently in use among their ancestors, upon solemn occasions. As appears by what I observed on Gen. xxxix. 2, where Jacob, before the building of an altar to God in Bethel, as he had vowed, cleansed his family after this manner. For so Aben Ezra truly expounds these words be clean, wash your bodies: which was the old rite of cleansing (see there).

Ver. 15. Be ready against the third day.] Prepared to hear the words of God: for this time was set apart for solemn fasting and prayer; that they might be fit to converse with God, by having their minds abstracted from earthly things. Washed their clothes.] See ver. 10.

There were thunders and lightnings.] Which broke out of the thick cloud, to awaken them to attend unto his Majesty, who was approaching.

Thick cloud.] In which a flaming fire presently appeared (ver. 18), so that the mountain could not be seen; as Greg. Nyssen explains it, de Vita Mosis, p. 179.

Voice of the trumpet.] The heavenly ministers, who were attendants on the Divine Majesty, made a sound like a trumpet: by which they were to come and appear before God, and receive his commands.

Exceeding loud.] Beyond what the blast of any men could make: for it made the whole camp quake, as the following words tell us.

Ver. 17. Moses brought forth the people.] When their trembling was abated, by the remission, as we may suppose, of the sound of the trumpet.

The people.] That they might be espoused to him.

Stood at the nether part of the mount.] Below at the foot of it, not presuming to touch it; which they were severely forbidden, ver. 11, 13 (see Deut. iv. 11).

Ver. 18. Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke.] Nothing could be seen but smoke, mixed with a flame. Because the Lord descended upon it in fire:] The Shechinah came down into the thick cloud (ver. 9, 16), with a glittering company of angels, who appeared like flames of fire, unto which they are compared by the Psalmist (ver. 4). Thus Moses himself seems to expound it (Deut. xxxii. 3). He came with ten thousands (or myriads) of holy ones (i.e. of angels) from his right hand was a fiery law for them.] Which plainly relates to this appearance at Mount Sinai.

The smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice. And the Lord came down upon mount Sinai, on the top of the mount: and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount; and Moses went up.

And the Lord said unto Moses, Go down, charge the people, lest they break through unto the Lord to gaze, and many of them perish. And let the priests also, which come near
EXODUS.

23 And Moses said unto the Lord, The people cannot come up to mount Sinai: for thou chargest us, saying, Set bounds about the mount, and sanctify it.

24 And the Lord said unto him, Away, consecrated. The Jews (it is commonly known) readily answer, they were the firstborn whose pre- sentation was to minister to God, as his priests, till the law of Moses ordered things otherwise. But I have often observed this not to be true; being con- futed by several examples of others who sacrificed and were not the firstborn. And lately there is a learned man, who, in a just discourse, hath over- thrown this opinion (see Campeg. Viripringa, Observ. Sacrorum, lib. ii. cap. 25), which was called in question, and briefly censured some time before, by a very learned friend of mine, Dr. Outram (de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 4). Conradas Pellicanus, in the beginning of the Reformation, seems to have given a better account of the priests here mentioned, which were the prime and most honourable persons in the several tribes; the elders, and such as administered the go- vernment under Moses: among which there might be some of the firstborn, nay, it is possible, many of them; but not by any special right which they had to this office.

Which come near to the Lord.] To perform Divine services. By which one would think he speaks of those who had been already employed in this office; for having before this built an altar (xxiv. 15), some think it probable sacrifice was offered upon it. But if it were only a monument, and no sacrifices were to be offered till they came to the mount of God, who was to appoint them; then Moses picked out the most excellent persons (as I said before) to perform this service when they came there (xxiv. 5).

Sanctify themselves.] Nothing was said before of their sanctification; which is here enjoined by itself, because their high office required a peculiar separa- tion to prepare them for it.

Lest the Lord break forth upon them.] Lest when they come near to sacrifice, God should be offended with their uncleanness, and destroy them. This sup- poses that they might go nearer than the people.

Ver. 23.] He thought it needless to go down to restrain the people; having given them the charge which God commanded him (ver. 11, 12), and set bounds about the mount (as it here follows), by drawing a line, perhaps, beyond which they should not pass, and thereby separating the mount from them; which he calls sanctifying it.

Ver. 24. And the Lord] Or, but the Lord.
Get thee down.] He knew the people’s inclinations better than Moses did; and therefore commanded him to make no delay, for fear they should grow more bold than he imagined.

And thou shalt come up.] After he had delivered this new charge to them. Which was the more ne- cessary, because Aaron being also called up, they might think likewise of sharing this privilege.

Aaron with thee.] Unto whom God did this great honour, because he was to be called shortly to the dignity of the high priest; and would be the more respected by the people, when they saw him ad- mitted far nearer to God than they were.

But let not the priests and the people break through, &c.] But let not anybody else, as they love their lives, presume to press beyond their line; no, not the priests, on whom I have bestowed the honour of coming nearer to me than other men (ver. 22).

Ver. 25. So Moses went down unto the people, and spoke unto them.] Delivered the message to them, and to the priests, as he was directed; and then (as he was also ordered) returned to the mount, and his brother with him; but not to the top of the mount where he was before (ver. 20), as appears from the nineteenth verse of the next chapter; which shows that Moses was there where the people might speak to him; and therefore, if he went up now to the top of the mount, he came down again, when the Lord spake audibly to them, and stood in a place where he might be a mediator between them. So he himself said (Deut. v. 4, 5) that when the Lord talked with them face to face in the mount, he stood between the Lord and them. And accordingly it follows (ver. 23, of that chapter), that when they heard the voice out of the midst of the darkness, they came near to Moses, and stood, &c., which shows he was not far off from them, though nearer to God than they.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1.] After the trumpet had summoned them all to attend, and sounded a long time louder and louder, there came a voice from the Shechinah, or Divine Ma- jesty, out of the midst of the fire (as we read Deut. iv. 2, v. 4, 29), that is, of the angelical host which encircled him, and appeared like flames of fire: which made the apostle say, the law was ordained by angels (Gal. iii. 19), who were then in attendance upon the Divine Majesty, as his retinue, when he spake all these words, that follow to the end of the seventeenth verse; which are called the ten words, or commandments, in xxxiv. 28. And he spake them with so great a voice (Deut. v. 29), that all the people, who were very nume- rous, plainly heard them, which was very wonderful.
3 Thou shalt have no other gods before me.
4 Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth:

This was upon the sixth day of the third month, called Sivan (see Selden, lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 11).

Ver. 2. I am the Lord thy God, &c.] In this preface to the ten commandments, he asserts his right to give them laws, not only in general, as he is Lord of all, but by a peculiar title of his own Divinity; which he had taken to himself, after a special manner, to be his people, by bringing them out of the land of Egypt, and the servitude under which they groaned there. This was a benefit fresh in their minds, and most apt to affect their hearts: and, therefore, he doth not say, as the author of Sepher Cosri observes (par. i. sect. 17), 'I am the Lord of heaven and earth,' or, 'I am the Lord of the universe.'

When he became their king by a special title (as I observed, iii. 10), and, upon that account, gave them these laws, whereby they were to be governed: and gave them peculiarly to them (as the forenamed author notes), who were left to the observation of them, by virus of their deliverance out of Egypt, and God's placing his glory among them. Whereas, if they had been tied to them by virtue of their creation, they would have belonged to all nations as much as unto them. Thus he. Maimonides will have these words, 'I am the Lord thy God, to signify the existence of God; and the next (ver. 3), his reign over them, as the great foundation of religion (More Nevroh. par. ii. cap. 33).

And, indeed, the word Jehovah, or Lord, is generally thought to signify, he who is of himself. And the next word Elohim, which is the most ancient name of God in Scripture, learned men of late derive from the Arabic word alaha (there being no root in Hebrew remaining from whence it can so regularly come), which signifies to worship, serve, and adore. Hottinger hath taken a great deal of pains, in his Hexameron, and elsewhere, to confirm this out of that, and out of the Ethiopic language also. The Jews say, indeed, that Elohim is the name of judgment, as Jehovah is of mercy: but Abarbanel confutes this, to establish a notion of his own (viz. the omnipotence of God): wherefore, the name Elohim, as much as he doth the former. And therefore most, I think, now rest in the forenamed notion, that it properly signifies Him, who only is to be religiously worshipped and adored; as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt have no other gods.] That is, believe in one God: or, believe there to be no other God but me, as Naaman assents it; and, consequently, worship no other God. This is the great foundation (as the Hebrews speak) of the law: for whosoever confesses any other God, he denies the whole law. And they truly observe, also, that this negative precept includes the affirmative, viz. a command to worship him, the only God. As when Naaman saith, he would no more offer burnt-offering or sacrifice to any other God but the Lord; it is plain he meant, that he would sacrifice to him (1 Kings v. 17). See Selden, lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 1.

Before me.] As they were not to forsake him and worship some other God; so not to worship any other God, together with him, as many did (2 Kings xvii. 33). For his presence in the has not endure any competitor.

Vol. I. 37

5 Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me;

Ver. 4. Graven image, &c.] The difference between pe'Ish, which we translate graven image, and temunah, which we translate likeness, seems to be, that the former was a protubrancy image, or a statue made of wood, stone, &c., and the other only a picture, drawn in colours upon a wall or board, &c. Both which, if they were of the nature of things shaped to resemble so much as to make; whether it were the image, or picture, of the stars, or birds, or men, or beasts, or fishes, for fear they should be drawn to worship them. Thus, it is certain, Origen understood this commandment, when he said, there was not permitted to be so much as 'nymyfoio xainc omeplomococv "e "po tov wotiov owtco, &c., a picture-drawer, or a maker of statues in their countenance: to take away all occasion of drawing men's minds from the worship of God (lib. iv. contra Cels. p. 181). Clemens Alexanderinus was of the same opinion (lib. v. Stromat. and Tertullian, L. de Spectaculis, cap. 23). Which they derived, in all probability, from the Jews, who, from the time of the Maccabees to the destruction of Jerusalem (more especially as the people, from the time of the Maccabees to the destruction of Jerusalem), thought they were forbidden by this law to make an image or figure of any living creature, especially of a man. This Hermannus Conringius hath plainly demonstrated (in his Paradoxa de Nummis Ehresonii, cap. 5) out of many places in Philo and in Josephus. The latter of which tells us (lib. xviii. Archeolog. cap. 5), that all their governors before Pilate were wont to use the word without the image of Cesar in them, because their law forbade them eicwos ypaer, "the making of images." And when Vitellius was to lead the Roman army through Judea, against the Arabsians, with images in their ensigns, the people ran to meet him, beseeching him to forbear it, ou yap aoutvai eicwos atpoc wpoicrpsi eicwos ol cpt allied parceos, "for it was not consonant to the laws of their country to see images brought into it." But whether this was the ancient exposition of the law before those times may be doubted. The Talmudists think it was unlawful to make any figures of celestial bodies, either prominent or plain, though it were for ornament's sake: but as for animals, they might make prominent statues of them, except only horses; and the Jews were not allowed to make any plain (see Selden, lib. i. de Jure N. et G. cap. 6—8): which distinctions most look upon as ungrounded; and the common opinion is, that Moses did not forbid the very making of an image; but that they should not make them to set up in the place of Divine worship.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them.] If they saw an image (as they must needs do in other countries, though we suppose they had none among themselves), he requires them not to use any gesture, or to do any thing that might signify reverence or honour given to them. Such were pros-trating themselves before them, bowing their bodies, kissing their hands; much less to offer sacrifice, or to burn incense, &c. To offer sacrifice to a picture is a plain case in this commandment; three things being here forbidden, if we take the first part of it to signify that they might not so much as make a graven image or any likeness of any thing, for fear they should be tempted to idolatry. But though this may be supposed to have been a sin, yet not so great as the next, to bow down to them; which was a degree of honour too high to be paid unto any image: but was not the 6 And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.
7 Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.
8 Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy.

This was a law so well known to the ancient heathens, that the best men among them would suffer charges to be set up in their names falsely. For, Num. viii. forbade this to the Romans, which he learned, as Clemens Alexandrinus thinks, from Moses. Inso-much that, for the space of a hundred and seventy years, though they built temples, yet &gamda; odi, otei, kaiotvet, ovei vnd wovestov toupovstov, "they made no image, neither statue, nor so much as a picture (6. i. Spiritual)." But the Christian religion was排行 in the life of Numa Pompilius, and adds this reason, that he thought it a great crime to represent the most excellent Being by such mean things; and that God was to be apprehended only by the mind. The ancient Persians pretend to have received the same law from their Zarosator; who, in a number of things, is so like to Moses, that Hester thinks (not without reason) his story was framed out of these books.

Ver. 6. Shewing mercy unto thousands] To invite their obedience, he promises to be kind unto them and their posterity for many generations (so thousands signifies), who were loyal and faithful to him. Such is the infinite goodness of God, that he delights more in showing mercy than in showing severity; there being such a disproportion between the one and the other, as there is between three or four and a thousand. Which made the heavy punishment of idolaters the more reasonable, because they might have enjoyed such great and long-continued blessings, if they would have kept close to their religion.

Of them that hate me.] He looked to him alone, as the only object of worship and adoration; with such an affection as a chaste wife bears to her husband. For God now espoused this nation to himself (as the prophets taught them to understand it), and therefore all the idolatry which is forbidden in these commandments is called going a whoring from him.

Keep my commandments.] Not only professed to be his entirely, but proved it by observing his precepts. Which keeping or observing of his commandments, is mentioned here, perhaps, and not in any of the following commandments, because this and the first were the principal, upon which the rest depended; there being no reason to mind what he said, if they acknowledged any other God but his.

Ver. 7. Shewing mercy unto the children,] By the name of the Lord, in Scripture, is meant the Lord himself: and, or, lift up his name, is to swear by him. So this word nasa sometimes signifies, without the addition of God's name, (Isa. iii. 7.) jism, he shall lift up in that day; which we truly render, in that day he shall swear: which they did then, with the hand lifted up to heaven, and to take his name or swear in vain, is to swear falsely. That is the principal meaning undoubtedly, that they should not call God to witness unto a lie; promising in his name that which they meant not to perform; or affirming or denying with an oath that which they knew not to be true. For so the word shew fre-quently signifies in Scripture, a lie. This relates not to their appearance before a judge upon oath (of which he speaks afterward in a distinct command), but to their intercourse and commerce one with another. For an oath, saith R. Levi, of Barcelona, ought to establish every thing: and thereby we declare ourselves to be as much resolved concerning that which we swear, as we are concerning the being of God.

Heathens themselves accounted an oath so sacred a 9 Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work:
10 But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thing, that it was capital for a man to forswear himself, as Hen. Stephanus (in his Fontes Juris Civiles, p. 7) observes out of Diodorus Siculus, lib. i.; and the reason he gives of it is this: that such a man committed two heinous crimes, by violating his piety to God and his faith to men in the highest degree.
But besides this, both Jews and Christians always understood swearing lightly, upon frivolous occasion, as having come from a want of sober gravity, to be here forbidden. R. Levi, before mentioned, saith this precept may be violated four several ways, besides swearing that which we mean not to perform. And Salvian applies this to the trivial naming of God and our Saviour, upon all occasions, and sometimes upon bad occasions. Nihil jam pene vanus quam Christi nomen esse vindicare, &c. Everybody that is amiable may to Christ he would do this or that, though of no consequence whether he did it or no, or perhaps a thing which ought not to be done (lib. iv. de Geburn, Dei, p. 88, edit. Baluz.).
They that understand this of swearing by false gods (which are called vain things in Scripture) do but trifile; that is condemned in the foregoing commandment; it being a piece of worship to swear by them.
For the Lord will not hold him guiltless, &c.] If men did not punish the false swearer, the Lord threatens that he will. And so mankind always thought, as appears by the law of the twelve tables (mentioned by Hen. Stephanus in the book quoted above), a trivial pretense was needful, and a heavy decree: "The divine punishment of perjury is utter destruction; the human punishment is disgrace or infamy." And Alexander Severus was so sensible of this, that he thought, jurisjurand' contempita religio, satis Deum ulterem habet: "The contempt of the religion of an oath hath God for a sufficient avenger." For every bond that is amiable may to bind them to truth and fidelity, as Cicero speaks, (lib. iii. de Offic. cap. 31). Witness, saith he, the twelve tables; witness our sacred forms in taking an oath; witness our covenant and leagues, wherein we plight our faith to enemies; witness the animadversions of our censors; qui nulla de re diligentius quam de veritate prudenter examinavit, "who judged of nothing more diligently than of an oath."
Nor was the other sort of vain (that is, light and idle) swearing, without any just occasion, suffered to go unpunished: for Mr. Selden observes, out of Maimonides (lib. ii. de Synod. cap. 11, p. 497), that if any man was guilty of it, he that heard swear was bound to excommunicate him (what that was he shows in the first book), and if he did not he was to be excommunicated himself. And there is great reason for these civil laws which have provided a punishment for this crime; not only because it is a great disrespect to God, to use his name so lightly on every trivial occasion; but because such contempt of the Divine Majesty makes men fall into the fearful sin of perjury.
Ver. 8. Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. Be mindful of the day called the Sabbath; to make a difference between it and all other days; so that it be not employed as they are.
Ver. 9. Six days shalt thou labour,] This is not a precept requiring labour; but a permission to employ six days in a week, about such worldly business as they had to do. Which permission also God himself thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates:
11 For in six days the Lord made heaven abridged, by appointing some other festival days; as all governors may do upon some special occasions.
Ver. 10. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: ] Appointed by his authority to be a day of rest from your labours. In it thou shalt not do any work,] Herein the peculiar respect to the seventh day consisted: on all other days they might work; but on this they were to cease, as a sort of conclusion or conclusion of their work. In which very thing was the sanctifying of this day; it being hereby separated and distinguished from all other days in a very remarkable manner. But then it naturally followed, that, having no other work to do, they should call to mind the reason why it was thus sanctified, or set apart from other days.
And the reason, say the Jews themselves, was, "That having no other business, they might fasten in their minds the belief that the world had a beginning: which is a thread that draws after it all the foundation of the law, or the principles of religion." They are the words of R. Levi, of Barcelona.
Besides which, there was another reason, which I shall mention presently. But by this it appears, that the observance of this day was a sign, or a badge, by whom they belonged; a profession that they were all the servants of him who created the heaven and the earth, as God himself teaches them to understand it, (xxxii. 13, 17). And that their minds might be possessed with this sense, he ordered this solemn commemoration of the creation of the world to be made every seventh day; in several instances, if it might be returns of it, their secular business might have been too much hindered; so, if it had been delayed longer, this sense might have worn too much out of their minds.
Thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, &c.] They might no more employ others in their worldly business on this day than do it themselves: but their children, though they understood not the reason, were to rest: that in time they might learn this great truth, that all things were made by God.
Nor thy cattle.] Their oxen, and asses, and all other creatures wont to be employed in their labours, were to enjoy the benefit of this rest as well as themselves, (Deut. v. 14). Which was absolutely necessary; it being impossible for their servants to rest, (as is here also required) if they were to set the cattle on work.
Nor thy stranger that is within thy gates:] No stranger, who, by being circumcised, had embraced the Jewish religion. But other strangers might work; who only dwelt among them, having renounced idolatry, but not taking them from the obligation to observe their whole law. Yet if any one person was a servant to a Jew, his master might not employ him on the Sabbath-day in any work of his; but the man might work for himself, if he pleased, being not bound to this law (see Selden, lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 12).
Ver. 11. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth:] There were two reasons for the sanctification of this day. One was, because God rested from his work of creation on the seventh day, which is mentioned here; the other was, because he had given them rest from their labours in Egypt, which he mentions in the fifth of Deuteronomy. There is nobody hath explained both these better than Maimonides (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 31): "There are two diffand earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it.

12 ¶ Honour thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

"Let children honour their parents." And thus Ulpian expresses it, filio semper honesta et sancta persona patris videri debet. And afterward, filium patrem et matrem venerari oporet. With much more that Hen. Stephanus hath collected, in his Fontes et Riva Juris Civilis.

That thy days may be long upon the land, &c.] As disobedience to parents is the first commandment of God, threatened to be punished with death; so, on the contrary, long life (which is the greatest worldly blessing) is promised to the obedient; and that in their own country, which God had peculiarly enriched with abundance of his blessings. Heinshas also gave the same encouragement, saying, that "such children should be dear to the gods, both living and dead." So Eusebius observes.

"Curses et rei rectius et filio eis.
Ole etae et quae deae filiis dabit.

And this famous Senarius, mentioned by the same Hen. Stephanus, with many other notable passages.

"Inamoratis venustas genetricum non narrant.

"Thou shalt live long (or, as long as thou canst desire) if thou nourish thy ancient parents." Whence children are called by Xenophon, and others, Героики.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not kill.] After the command about the respect due to parents, naturally follows the regard we ought to have to all other men who spring from them. And the greatest commandment we can do otherwise is to take away his life; whereby he is deprived of all the enjoyments of this world, and human society itself is also wounded, which cannot subsist if its innocent members cannot be safe. Innocent, I say, for this commandment doth not hinder men from defending themselves from violence (xxii. 2), nor forbid magistrates to punish those with death who commit crimes worthy of it; for this is to preserve the lives of other men (xxii. 18–20).

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not commit adultery.] Next to a man's self, his wife is nearer to him than any other person; they two being one flesh. Which makes the injury done to him in her person a breach of human society next to murder. Nay, the LXX. place this commandment before the other, "Thou shalt not kill!" Virtuous women valuing their chastity more than their lives; and the crimes to which mere pleasure tempts men being more grievous, in the opinion of the great philosopher, than those to which they are stimulated by anger. Whoredom is also forbidden in the law of Moses, and incest; as wounding any man is, as we have said; after these ten words, which are a short abridgment of their duty, it was sufficient only to mention the principal things of every kind which were hateful to God and injurious to men.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt not steal.] This was to injure men in their goods and possessions; either by open rapine, or by craft and cheating; against which God intended to secure them by this precept. Several sorts of this sin are afterward mentioned in particular laws.

Ver. 16. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.] As our neighbour is not to be injured by us in deeds, so not in words, by giving a false testimony against him before a judge, which is the chief sin of this kind. This is both an injury to our neighbour and an affront to God; in whose place the judge is, whom we go about to deceive.

Large commentaries on these commandments are not to be expected, which may be found in many authors commonly known.

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, &c.] Here is forbidden so much as the designing any mischief to others, in any of the things forementioned. For as all injuries in word or deed are prohibited in the four preceding commandments; so in this he prohibits those which are only in the heart or counsels of men, but never come to light. And in the enumeration of the things they were not to covet, he begins first with that which was last mentioned, and so backward to the other. For he saith, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house," by designing to bear false witness, or to commit theft. And then follows, "thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife," by intending to abuse her, if opportunity served; "nor his manservant, nor his maid-servant," &c., which are his principal goods. He saith nothing of thirsting after his life, which is supposed to be unlawful, because less than that is forbidden.

Menander hath something like this:

Μονοθεία ἐναί αἰσθήμα αἰσθήμα, Ὠ γὰρ οὐκ ἔχεις ἐναί πλεῖον κομίνα.

"Do not so much as covet the thread of a needle, for God sees thee, being intimately present with thee" (see more in Grotius's Prolegomena in Excerpta ex Stoboe.)

Ver. 18. All the people saw the thunderings, &c.] Seeing being the principal sense, it is frequently put for understanding, and translated by them sensibly perceived, &c. (see Gen. xiii. 1, and Drusius's Questions Hebr. i. cap. 10).

Thunderings and the lightnings.] See xiii. 16.

Noise of the trumpet, &c.] Which ceased, while God spake the ten words to them: but now began again, together with thunders and lightnings, when they were ended. For as they were introduced in a most majestic manner, to raise their attention, and strike an awe in them; so they were closed, that they might be the more sensible of the dreadfulness of that Majesty who spake to them; and that they might have a greater reverence to his law.

They removed, and stood afar off.] They were at the bottom of the mount while God spake to them; but now he that feared those flames they saw upon the mountain (Deut. v. 25), and perhaps flashed from thence in a terrible manner, should devour them. How far they removed we know not; some think to the place where they were encamped before this glorious appearance, out of which Moses brought them to meet with God (xiii. 2, 17).

As, and they said unto Moses.] By the heads of their tribes and their elders (Deut. v. 23), who came from the people to Moses while he remained still in his place. For he saith there, they came near unto him, when they spake these words; which signifies they were at some distance before.

CHAPTER XX

with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die.

20 And Moses said unto the people, Fear not: for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not.

21 And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was.

22 And the Lord said unto Moses, Thus

Speak thou with us, and we will hear: &c.] They desire that what God had farther to command them, he would be pleased to acquaint Moses with it; and they would receive it as his own words; but should die with fear if they heard him speak any more with his own voice. This is more hardly placed than Deut. 24, 25, &c.; and accordingly God afterwards communicated to Moses alone the rest of his laws, both concerning religion and civil government.

Ver. 20. Moses said unto the people.] He bade the elders return this answer to the people that sent them.

Fear not.] Be not afraid of your lives. No hurt shall come to you.

For God is come to prove you.] God intends, by this dreadful appearance, to discover unto yourselves and others whether you will be such as you pretend (xiii. 8).

And that his fear may be before your faces.] And that you may have an awful sense of him in your mind, by having before your eyes continually the glory of his majesty, of which you were lately sensible (ver. 18).

Sin not.] Let this be your only fear, not to offend God by disobeying his commands.

Ver. 21.] And the people stood afar off.] In their tents, within their camp. For God commanded him to bid the elders to go to the tent from whence they came; where, I suppose, the rest of the people were (Deut. v. 30). But he bade Moses stay with him; and he would, as they desired, tell him all the rest of the things which he intended to enjoin them (ver. 31).

Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was.] Who called him to him again, as he had done (ver. 19). To this the following observation in Pirke Eliezer, that the Hebrew word here is not nesgh, he approached, or drew near, as we translate it; but niggshe, he was drawn near: the angel Gabriel, or Michael (as he fancies), coming, and taking him by the hand and leading him up to God (cap. 41). But this signifies rather that he did not go up of his own accord, but was called by God to draw near to his Divine Majesty. Which he did the next day, upon the seventh day of Sivan: and received fifteen-seven laws (besides the ten which God himself delivered), partly civil and partly religious: which were explications of the dialogue.

Ver. 22. And the Lord said unto Moses.] When they were together in the thick cloud before mentioned.

Unto the children of Israel.] When thou goest down again to them.

Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven.] The apprehension of one sense (as Maimonides phrases it, More Nevech. par. i. cap. 46), is usually in Scripture put for the apprehension of another. As, ye see the word of the Lord (Jer. ii. 31), that is, hear it, or mark it diligently. Or, the meaning here may be, you saw, i. e. perceived, by the thunderings, and lightnings, and all the rest of the tokens of a majestic presence, that it was I who spake from above.

EXODUS.

 thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven.

23 Ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold.

Ver. 23. Ye shall not make with me] The Hebrew writers here make a pause, or full stop, as if it were a complete sentence. And the meaning is explained in the Talmud to be, Ye shall not make the similitude of the ministers that minister before me above, as the sun, the moon, the stars, or the angels (Gem. Bab. upon Avoda Zura). And so Maimonides upon the same subject; it is unlawful to form the images of the sun, the moon, the stars, the celestial signs, or any other image of the creatures), nor of any image. Nay, then (as it is written, Ye shall not make with me; i. e. nothing like the ministers that minister to me above (see Selden, lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 6, p. 198). But if we join these with the following words the sense is the same; that, as they acknowledged no other gods but him; so they should not make any image to represent him. To enforce which, the word make is repeated in the end of the verse, whereby greater efficacy is added to the command.

Gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold.] He gives this caution, lest by the splendour of these metals they should be tempted (being prone to superstition and idolatry) to make such kind of representations. For by gods are meant images to represent God, which was the first image of the glorious, glittering, like the heavenly bodis; but afterward they proceed to worship images of mere wood, or stone.

The coherence of this with the foregoing verses is something obscure: unless we observe how this is reported in the book of Deuteronomy: where Moses puts the ten words together, and which is written, Ye shall make the day that God spake with them in Horeb (iv. 15), and therefore ought not to "make them a graven image, the similitude of any figure," &c., ver. 16—19. Accordingly the meaning is here, "ye have seen that I talked with you from heaven," (i. e. you heard only a voice, but saw no similitude of man, or any other creature), therefore ye shall not represent me by any image of the things of heaven, but only by names. And Greg. Nyssen seems to have understood it, de Vita Mosis, p. 180. God gave Moses many divine commandments, the chief of which is, 1 εισιναι, και το τσα μετασοσα εκσηλοσεις περι της θεω σατυν ισεις, "piety toward God, and to have becoming notions and conceptions of the Divine nature," as transcending all visible things, may, all our thoughts, and like to nothing that we know. And therefore he bids them, in their conceptions of him, not to look at any thing they saw, nor like inη την του πατρος ιερουρμης φως, "the nature which transcends the whole universe," to any thing that they were acquainted with.

There was the greater need of this precept, if the Egyptian worship in these days was the same with that in other times; when Osiris was adored in the form of a golden ox, or an ox of wood all gilded over, as Plutarch calls it βως διαγρωνος.

Ver. 24. An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me.] For the better observation of the foregoing commandment, he orders that his altars should be made as plain and simple as might be. Either of sods and turfs of earth (which were easily prepared, in most places, whilst they stayed in the wilderness), or of rough and unpolished stone (if they came into rocky places where no sods were to be got), that so there might be no occasion to grave any image upon them.

Such altars, Tertullian observes, were among the ancient Romans in the days of Numa: when, as they had many sumptuous temples, nor images, so they had only temeraria de cespite altarum, "altars hastily hadled up of earth without any art" (Apolog. cap. 25), which Jamblichus calls μονή ανταρτοποιου, "ex tempore," altars (as we would now speak) "thrown up on a sudden." And so Scelopius pretends he found some MSS. have it in that place of Tertullian, note to "temeraria," but modern scholars make the present use, not to remain after the sacrifice was done. Nay, Fortunatus Senecelius will have it that Moses here commands them to make the earth their altar; as the words may be translated out of the Hebrew: which he thus interprets, "Thou shalt mark out a place upon the bare ground, and there offer sacrifice." (Moses, cap. ii. 2. Elwencrys, p. 19.)

Sacrifice (thereby) thrst burnt offerings.] This form of worship, as Maimonides himself acknowledges, was appointed by God, because it was used in all the world. Which moved him, not to abolish it, but to translate it, from created and imaginary beings, to his own most adorable name. Therefore he commanded us, saith he, to make him a sanctuary (xxxv. 1), and consecrate an altar to his name, and offer him sacrifices (for which he alleges this very text), and on the contrary prohibits us to do such things to any other being (xxxii. 20; xxxiv. 13, 14. More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 32).

In all places] This shows that the foregoing commandment hath a peculiar respect to the time they were in the wilderness, and consecrated an altar to his name, and offered sacrifices (for which he alleges this very text), and on the contrary prohibits us to do such things to any other being (xxxii. 20; xxxiv. 13, 14. More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 32).

Where I record my name] Or cause it to be remembered, acknowledged, by some token or symbol (that is) whereby he signified that he would be worshipped there. Which sense the Chaldee seems to me to have expressed most exactly; "in every place where I shall make my glory (i. e. the Shechinah) to dwell, from whence I will bless thee:" i. e. hear their prayers. This must be the meaning here; because the ark, which was the memorial of God's presence with them, was not yet made. Or else, he means the sacrifices and altars before mentioned, which Mr. Mede thinks may be here pointed at; because these were rites of remembrance whereby the name of God was commemorated and recorded, and his covenant with men testifed and renewed (see book ii. p. 450, &c.). And, indeed, the word or record, not only signifies, not only remem-ber or record, but to worship and to perform sacred offices: so the meaning may be, "in every place where I exhibit myself to be worshipped and honoured."

I will come unto thee, and meet with thee.] Upon which account the tabernacle of the Lord was called God's meeting, and the tabernacle of Meeting, not house of the people's meeting there to worship (as is commonly supposed, when we translate these words the tabernacle of the congregation), but of God's meeting there with his people, as Mr. Mede observes (p. 38), from many plain places of Scripture (Exod. xxix. 42, xxx. 36; Numb. xvii. 4).
25 And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone: for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it.

I will bless thee.] Give thee testimonies of my gracious presence and acceptance. The gentiles believed their gods were present where their images were worshipped. But he promises to be present in all places whatsoever, where he would have his name celebrated (i.e. where he would be worshipped), though their sacrifices were offered upon the most mean and simple altar.

Ver. 25. If thou wilt make an altar of stone, &c.] If it cannot be made without stone (saith Maimonides, par. iii. More Novoch. cap. 45), take care that the stones remain in their own natural form, and that they be not polished, &c. This was to avoid idolatry; for fear they should make any figure with the tools they employed, in shaping and fashioning the stones, after an artificial manner: or should reserve the pieces of stone that were pared off for superstitions or magical uses. Just, saith Maimonides, as he forbids planting a grove near his altar, for that was to imitate idolaters (Deut. xvi. 22). See Deut. iv. 15, 16, which plainly shows this was the reason of the command.

In short, these altars were built like those of turf, on a sudden, without any art: only by piling stones one upon another. Such an altar David built upon a special occasion (2 Sam. xxiv. 25), and after him Eljah, 1 Kings xvii. 31, 32, and Fortunatus Senechus makes it probable that it was such a one which Ezra built their tabernacle of: for own country (iii. 2, 3, Myrotheo, ii. Sacr. Elmorechys. cap. 59), where he represents the form of such an altar among the heathen, out of an ancient monument. (p. 555).

And there is little doubt, I think, that the altars built by the patriarchs were of this sort; particularly that which Abraham erected whereon to offer his son Isaac (Gen. xxii. 9), for it was raised so suddenly that no art could be employed about it.

I omit other reasons which the Jews allege for this law, for they seem to me to be fanciful. And shall rather observe, that Plato in his Laws ordered all things belonging to the service of God should be very simple and plain, without any cost or ornament: and therefore forbids gold, silver, or ivory, because they were "of sacrilegious" (ξηραποθηραναι), and brass and iron he would not have used, because they were θαλαμεν ἀριστομα, "the instruments of wars!" but one single piece of wood or stone should serve for an image, and that made in a day's time, (lib. xii. de Legibus, p. 955, 956, edit. Serran).

It seems difficult also to reconcile these two verses with God's own ordinance, not long after, in the twenty-seventh chapter of this book; where he bids Moses to make him an altar neither of earth, nor of stone; but of shittim-wood, covered with brass, for the use of the tabernacle, where he recorded his name. But it is to be considered, that these two verses speak only of occasional altars (as I may call them) which they might have use of, not only before, but after, the tabernacle was erected. These God doth not forbid, when there was a special reason for them; but he intending there should be no stated altar, but that at the tabernacle, he would have these made of unpolished stones, laid one upon another, that they might be thrown down as soon as raised; and that they might not draw people from the tabernacle, nor administer occasions of idolatry; but with an artificial workmanship and imagery. Now that there were such altars raised upon certain great occasions, but not to continue, appears from the sacred history. For (xxiv. 4), Moses built one at the foot of Mount Sinai, by God's command it is likely, and of this fashion. And he gave order for building one of stone after they came to Canaan (Deut. xxvii. 1—2), which Joshua performed, according to this rule, as is expressly said, Josh. viii. 30, 31. Of this sort were those of Gideon and Manoah (Judg. vi. 24, 25, xiii. 19).

And we read of altars built by Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 17), and by Saul (xiv. 33), and David, as was before observed (2 Sam. xxiv. 25), and Solomon (1 Kings iii. 2, 34), besides the altar which was in the tabernacle and the temple.

Ver. 26. Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar.] This was most suitable to the state of travellers, to have their altars low, not lofty. Besides, he would not have them to imitate the gentiles, who ascribed to high places; imagining their sacrifices were most acceptable when they were nearest to heaven. Whence the Egyptians, living in a flat country wherein were no mountains, built altars of a very great height, which could not he well done by sands of earth, or stones loosely laid together. Nor would God have it done, when he ordered Moses to make an altar of brass and wood at the tabernacle: which it is evident was so low, that a man might stand and minister there without being raised from the earth; for it was but three cubits high (xxvii. 1), which is less by one cubit than the ordinary stature of men.

Go up by steps.] There were steps in the temple built by Solomon unto the brazen altar, which was ten cubits high: and Ezekiel expressly mentions them in his description of his temple (xiii. 17), which seeming to disagree with this command, interpreters are much concerned to reconcile them. And the renowned Fortun. Senechus, cap. 63, contends earnestly that no altar was higher than three cubits; and therefore those steps mentioned by Ezekiel did not belong to this altar; but to one anterior to Solomon, or upon which it stood. But this is said without good ground, for we read expressly that Solomon's altar was ten cubits high (2 Chron. iv. 1), at which therefore the priest could not minister, without some steps, whereby he ascended so high, as to be able to lay on the wood and the sacrifice upon it, &c. By steps therefore (to omit other conjectures) I understand "by the steps of the ladder" (Ex. xxxix. 35), and the gentiles had to go up to their Baaloth, or high places; as we see by one of the pyramids in Egypt, and the high tower at Mexico; to which they ascended by a hundred and eighty steps. But a very few served for Solomon's altar; and they were so contrived also, as, the Hebrew writers tell us, that there was no danger of that which God intended hereby to prevent in the words following.

That thy nakedness be not discovered thereon.] The Hebrews say it was a kind of causeway, or bridge, whereby they went up to the altar; which rose by little and little, till they came to the place where they were to stand (see L'Empereur upon the Codex Midoth, cap. 3, sect. 3). Or else the steps were so broad and far distant one from another, and the ascent thereby made so easy and equal, that there was no need of lifting up their legs high, and therefore no danger of discovering the lower parts of the body (their thighs, buttocks, and secret parts) which might have been seen by those below (had they ascended by many large and high steps) under such loose garments as were worn in those countries, and the priests might have been exposed to contempt, and the people moved to laughter, or had bad thoughts excited in them. In short, the meaning is, they should not go up many steps, far distant one from another, so that one must have taken large strides to ascend them.
Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon.

The Jews say, particularly Maimonides (par. iii. More Nevooch. cap. 45), that the worshippers of Baal- peor were wont to discover their nakedness, that is, their secret parts, before him. Which he takes to be the reason of this command: lest any such thing should happen in God's presence; and this was the reason also of another law, that the priest should have breeches made for them, which none of the people wore, in those times, but the priests alone; and that only when they ministered. The Gemara Hierosolym. upon the story of Balaam, gives a long account of this im- moral worship, as it likewise does upon the story of Midrash. Upon this Midrash, cap. 3, sect. 4. But there is no proof of this from any ancient author: and the Babylonian Gemara gives a different account of the worship of Peor; which looks as if the Jews studied how to make it ridicu- lous, as well as filthy. But if there were any solid ground for it, it would afford the clearest explication of this place.

CHAPTER XXI.

1 Laws for menservants. 5 For the servant whose ear is bored. 7 For wencheservants. 12 For manslaughter. 16 For stealers of men. 17 For curers of parents. 18 For smitters. 22 For a hurt by chance. 28 For an ox that goreth. 33 For him that is an occasion of harm.

1 Now these are the judgments which thou shalt set before them.

2 If thou buy any Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve; and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing.

3 If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself: if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him.

4 If his master have given him a wife, and she have born him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be his master's, and he shall go out by himself.

Levi Barzelonica, adorned with and full of the noblest qualities, which are benignity and mercy.

This year of release also being a sabbatical year, the whole land being holy to the Lord, so that no man might challenge any right or propriety in it, to sow his field, or reap that which grew of itself, &c., it was sa- crifice for any master to keep a servant from his free- dom when the year came which was the Lord's re- lease, as we read expressly Lev. xxv. and Deut. xv.

Whence it was, that, because the Jews were so profane as to break this law, and not give their servants liberty (as we read in the thirty-fourth of Jeremiah), God punished them with a captivity of seventy years, in which the land lay waste, till it had fulfilled the years of rest which they would not observe; as Mr. Mede hath truly noted, Discourse xxxvi. latter end.

Ver. 3. If he came in by himself.] That is, a single man without a wife; so he was to depart. But if he was a married man when he was sold, as the master was not to let his wife and children want food, and rai- ment, and habitation, while he continued his slave; so, when he was free, he was not to meddle with them or detain them from their father and husband (Lev. xxv. 41).

Ver. 4. If his master have given him a wife.] Unto such a servant as this, who was sold by the court of judgment, his master might give a gentle maid to wife (and no other Hebrew, but such as he, might marry a gentle), that he might beget children of her, who were to be the master's servants or slaves for ever. The Hebrew doctors say, the master could not do this unless such a servant had a lawful wife and children before of his own, who were not to be kept from him; but he might beget children for himself, as well as for his master; who could not impose upon him more than one maid-servant to be his wife. He that sold himself also was not subject to this law. But as his master could not impose a wife of this sort upon him, so neither was he bound, when the servant went free, to bestow any gift upon him; which was due only to him that was sold by the court for theft (Deut. xx. 12), to whom the ancient Jews say he was to give thirty shekels.

Born him sons or daughters.] During his service.
CHAPTER XXI.

5 And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free:

6 Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever.

7 ¶ And if a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant, she shall not go out as the maidservants do.

The wife and her children shall be her master's.] For the wife was a slave as well as himself when he married her. And she was given to wife, merely that he might beget slaves of her. Who therefore continued with the master, as well as their mother, when the man had his liberty; for they were not so much his, as his master's goods; who had such a power over them, that he might circumcise them, as he did his own children, without their consent (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure N. et G. cap. 7, and de U. see Hebr. lib. i. cap. 6, p. 39).

Ver. 5. If the servant shall plainly say.] In the Hebrew the words are saying, shall say; i.e. stand in it (as we speak) and steadfastly resolve, by saying it not in a fit, but constantly.

His master shall bring him unto the judges.] That it might appear he was not fraudulently or forcibly detained against the law, but with his own consent, or rather at his desire.

He shall also bring him to the door.] After the case had been heard, and the judges had given sentence.

His master shall bore his ear through with an aul;] In token that he was now affixed to his house, and might not so much as step over the threshold without his leave; but let his case be decided (see Selden, supra, for the laws) as to the foreigner.

This is to be understood only of one that was sold by the court; not of him that sold himself. And though the Hebrews take this to have been a mark of infamy, set upon a man who chose servitude before liberty; yet it being chosen out of love to his master, I cannot think that they intended by this act to disgrace him; but look upon it only as a solemn addiction of him to his master's service; which was done, it is likely, in the presence of the judges. This custom of boring the ears of slaves lasted a long time after this in Syria and Arabia, as Bochartus shows out of Juvenal, sat. i. and Petronius (lib. iii. Hieroz. cap. 6, p. 1).

He shall serve him for ever.] Till the year of jubilee, or till his master died (for his son was not to detain him when his father was dead) unless he would release him, or he was redeemed.

Ver. 7. If a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant.] Besides the two former sorts of persons sold to be servants, there was a third here mentioned, which is thus expounded by the Hebrews; that she was to be a virgin under age; that is, less than twelve years old and a day. For if she was more than that it was not lawful for him to sell her; and when she came to be of age it put an end to her servitude, as well as the year of jubilee did, or redemption, or the death of her master. Besides, her father might not sell her, unless he were reduced to extreme poverty. If he did without such necessity, he was forced by the court of judgment to redeem her. And she was not to be sold neither, unless there was some hope her master or his son might take her to wife.

She shall not go out as the maidservants do.] There were other and better conditions for her, than for the servant mentioned ver. 3, 4, particularly, her master could not marry her to anybody but himself or his son.

Ver. 9. If he have betrothed her unto his son.] This shows she was sold to him upon the presumption he would take her for his wife; and there was such a previous agreement about this, that there needed no other espousals; but if, after this, he changed his mind, and did not like her enough to make her his wife; then God ordinates as follows.

Then shall he let her be redeemed.] She was to serve her master six years, if she was sold for so long; unless she was redeemed (which her master is here required not to refuse) or manumitted; or set free by the year of jubilee; or by the death of her master; or (which was peculiar in this case) the signs of her being ripe for marriage appeared (see Selden in the place before mentioned).

To sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power.] No man had power to sell a Hebrew servant to one of another nation: and therefore, by a strange people (as the word is here in the Hebrew) must be meant an Israelite of another family, that was not of her kindred, nor had any right of redemption.

Seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her.] Frustrated her hope of marriage.

Ver. 9. If he have betrothed her unto his son.] Which was expected from him, if he did not think fit to marry her himself, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters.

If the word he relate to the father, the meaning is, he shall give her a portion, as if she were his own daughter. If it relate to the son, the meaning is, he shall treat her like a wife.

Ver. 10. If he take him another wife; her food, &c.] If after the son had married her, he took another wife besides, he was still to perform to this all those things that belong to a wife, viz. give her food, and raiment, and at certain times (which were determined by law in some countries) cohabit with her as her husband. From this place the Hebrews have made a general rule, that these three things are owing to all wives from their husbands, viz. alimony, clothes, and the conjugal duty. For howsoever the Vulgar Latin understands the last word, the Hebrews generally take it for that which St. Paul calls due benevolence, i Cor. vii. 3 (see Selden, de Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 4). Now what was accounted sufficient for clothes, he says cap. v., and what belongs to the other, cap. vi. The Hebrew word gonata, which we translate duty of marrying, properly relates to the stated and determined time wherein every thing is to be done; and therefore here signifies the use of marriage, certo tempore et modo, as Bochart hath well expounded it (lib. ii. Caman, cap. 11). Many indeed will have it derived from p,' from which comes vol. i. 38.
11 And if he do not these three unto her, then shall she go out free without money.
12 ¶ He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death.
13 And if a man lie not in wait, but God de-

14 But if a man come presumptuously upon his neighbour, to slay him with guile; thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die.

and laid wait for him to execute his design, it was justly judged to be wilful murder, and punished with death. Which was far more equal than Plato's law, that such a man should only be banished for three years; as he that on a sudden killed a man in his anger only for two (lib. ix. de Legibus, p. 867).

Upon his neighbour.] The Hebrew doctors by neighbour understand only an Israelite, or a proselyte of justice, because they were to be put to death if an Israelite killed one of them. Which was more at intent of this law; whereby God would have all men that lived among them safe and secure from being murdered.

To slay him with guile.] By which it appeared the act was designed and deliberate. For two things are denoted by this word with guile; first forethought, and then determination of the act of murder (see D'Emperour in Bava kama, cap. iii. sect. 6).

Thou shalt take him.] If it be inquired who should take him, it seems to be determined, Deut. xix. 12, where the elders of the city were to fetch away a wilful murderer from the city of refuge. In after-times the king ordered it, as Moses did while he lived; but thereafter only was it allowed, and then only upon the condition that if a man refused to come from the altar (being judged upon proof to be a wilful murderer or other high offender), he might be there killed, as George, Ritterhusius shows (L. de Jure Asylorum, cap. viii.), where he observes, out of Plutarch in his Laconia, that Agesilus declared publicly at the altar of Pallas, where he sacrificed an ox, that he thought it lawful to kill one that treacherously assaulted him, even at the altar. And thus the practice was among Christians (as he there shows) when their temples became sanctuaries to malefactors.

From mine altar.] This was an asylum, as well as the citites of refuge; but under many limitations, both with respect to the part of the altar, and to the persons that fled to it. And to the crime they had commit ted; as Mr. Selden shows in the place above men tioned (p. 475).

That he may die.] Though he was the high-priest, and in the act of sacrifice, he was to be taken away without delay if he had committed wilful murder; if it was involuntarily, then he was to be taken from thence and carried to the city of refuge; for God would not have a pious place (as Conrado Pellicianus glosses) be a protection to impiety (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 8, p. 100).

Maimonides's observation is pertinent enough upon this occasion; "That the mercy which is shown to wicked men is no better than tyranny and cruelty to the rest of God's creatures: and therefore, though each person sought the right of God for his patronage, by making himself black and blue, as we speak (Selden, lib. lii. de Synedr. cap. 13, p. 556).

Shall be surely put to death.] Strangled (say the Hebrews, see ver. 12), by the sentence of the judge, there being competent witnesses of the fact, as in other cases. The giving them saucy words, or makpug, "a habitation!" as if it signified here the es citation of a man with his wife. But Aben Ezra rather refers it to rgo, from whence comes rgo, "time!" whence gona signifies the set and appointed time when in every thing is done. And so the Chaldee uses the word gona, for the term prescribed to every thing (as the same author observes), that it may be done in due time and manner.

Theodoric Hackspühler says Moses here speaks of the Book of Deuteronomy, Deut. xix. to xix., to which all the precedent and subsequent acts belong, and not to the son.

Ver. 11. If he do not these three unto her.] i.e. Nei ther marry her to himself, nor to his son, nor suffer her to be redeemed.

Then shall she go out free without money.] When she came of age, and was ripe for marriage, she was to be married as we speak: nothing for her freedom: nay, on the contrary, he was to give her something, as appears from Deut. xv. 12, 13, 17. What the signs of puberty were, Mr. Selden shows, Lib. de Successionibus, cap. ix.

Ver. 12. If that smiteth a man, so that he die.] That is, commit wilful murder, as we now speak.

Shall be surely put to death.] By which we find this word mawath (death) absolutely, without any addition, it always signifies strangling. They are the words of R. Levi Barzelonitin. But the Jewish doc tors will not have this law extend unto proselytes of the gate, much less to gentiles, whom, if any Israelite killed, he was not to suffer death for it (see Mr. Selden, Lib. iv. de Juris N. et G. cap. 1). But Plato, in his case of the murderer (Lib. ix. p. 872), hath determined more justly than these rabbes, that in the case of murder the same laws should be for strangers and for citizens.

Ver. 13. If a man lie not in wait.] Do not design to kill another.

But God deliver him into his hand.] But he happens was not his design, to kill a man by that action which aimed at another end. This the Scripture expresses more religiously, by acknowledging God in every thing that falls out, who permits such things as are mentioned, Deut. xix. 5, whereby a man is killed, without the intention of him who was about such actions.

Then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee.] He may fly to one of the places which I will appoint for his security. Which place, the Jewish say, was the camp of the Levites, while they continued in the wilderness: but when they came to Canaan, there were cities appointed for this purpose, as we read Numb. xxxv. 11, 12; Deut. xix. 2, 3, &c. And there being several kinds of involuntary killing men, the Hebrews make these israpel, or israpel, or "places of re fuge," to belong only to one of them, for the rest did not need them, as Mr. Selden shows (Lib. iv. de Juris N. et G. cap. 2). An officer of justice was not bound to flee if he chanced in the execution of his office to kill a man that resisted him: nor a master if he killed his scholar, or a father his son, when he gave him common cause.

Ver. 14. If a man come presumptuously.] The Vul gar Latin rightly translates it industriously, or with design to kill him; for it is opposed to ignorance. The Hebrew word also carries in it a signification of boiling anger, which doth not alter the case: for if a man in the height of his rage resolved to kill another, ing mouths at them, which signified contempt, was punished also with whipping. There was no need to speak of the mode: for such a crime the man was punished with death. And Solon, it is commonly noted, made no law about this; because it was not to be supposed any man would be so wicked. Nor was this crime known among the Persians, as Herodotus saith, in his days. Nor do we find any mention of it in the law of the twelve tables. But in aftertimes there were most severe punishments enacted against particide, which are described at large by Modestinus, and Diodorus Siculus tells us of the like among the Egyptians (see Hon. Stephans in his Fontes et Rivi Juris Civilis, p. 18). Plato would have him that killed either father or mother, brethren or children, not only to be put to death, but to be disgraced after his execution, by throwing his dead body naked into the city, and afterwards to have his registers, in the name of the people, should every one of them throw a stone at his head, and then carrying him out of the coasts, leave him without burial (lib. ix. de Legibus, p. 873).

Ver. 16. He that stealeth a man.] By a man the Hebrews understand an Israelite; whether he was a freeman, or had a servant; as Mr. Selden observes (lib. vi. de Jure N. et G. cap. 2). Selleth him.] No Israelite would buy him, and therefore such plagiaries sold him to men of other nations, which made the crime to be punished with death; because it was a cruel thing, not only to take away his liberty, but make him a slave to strangers.

Or if he be found in his hand.] Though he had not actually sold him yet his intention was sufficiently known by his stealing him.

Shall surely be put to death.] I observed above, ver. 12, they interpret this phrase everywhere to signify strangling. If it be said anywhere, his blood shall be upon him, it signifies stoning. Maimonides makes this the reason why such a man was condemned to die. Now these things: for to kill him, whom he violently carried away (at least, as I understand it, if he could not find means to sell him), More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41.

Ver. 17. He that curseth his father, or his mother, &c.] The Hebrews take this law to concern those who cursed their dead parents, no less than those who cursed them when they were alive: but not without premonition and witnesses, as in other capital crimes; and not unless they cursed their parents by some proper name of God, as Mr. Selden observes out of the Jewish doctors (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13). This and the other law (ver. 15), enacted death as the punishment of such crimes, because they were a sign (saith Maimonides, More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 41) of so great and audacious wickedness, as being a subversion of that domestic order which is the prime part of good government (see Lev. xx. 9). And thus far the Athenians went in this matter, that by their law a son was disinherited who reproached his father. And if the father did not prosecute such a son, he himself became infamous. So Sopater ad Hermogenem: Τῶν ἐξερτατῶν τῶν αὐτοῦ πατρία μη μετέχει τὴν αἷμα, καὶ τοῦ ἐξερτατοῦ πατρίδος ἐπὶ δοξητα τῷ πατί ἀτυχον εἰναι. By the same law, also, if he struck his father both his hands were to be cut off; as we read in Herelides Ponticus, in Allegor. Homer. and in Quinellius, Declam. 372. "Qui potrem pulsaverit, maus at incarnatur." And by another law he was to be stoned to death, as the author of Problematen Rector, tells us: Νῦμος ἐλεκτας τὸν τύματα αὐτοῦ τὸν πατέρα λευκοδός, and that without any formal process against him ὕπο τοῦ δήμου ἁρατος.

Ver. 18. If men strive together.] Fall out and quarrel.

One smite another] So that from words they proceed to blows.

With a stone.] Men usually in their anger take up any thing that is next at hand to throw at him against whom they are enraged; or, finding nothing, smite them with their fists.

He die not, but keepeth his bed.] Sometimes the blow falls in such a place that sudden death follows: or such a wound or bruise is given as confines a man to his bed.

Ver. 19. If he rise again, &c.] If a man recovered so far as to get up and walk abroad, after the stroke, it was presumed (though he died not long after) it was by his negligence, or something else, not of the blow he received; and upon the hearing of the cause, the judges were to acquit the man that gave the blow; i.e. he was not to die for it.

Only] The Hebrew particile rak signifies but, or truly, as well as only: and here expresses, that the man who gave the blow should not escape all punishment, but suffer something for the hurt he had done. Yet if we take it to signify only, the sense is not much altered; for the meaning is (as Constant: L'Empereur observes in Bava kamma, cap. viii. sect. 1) by this word to exclude death, but not other punishment in his purse.

He shall pay for the loss of his time, &c.] The Jews say, in Bava kamma, cap. viii. sect. 1, that satisfaction was to be given him for the loss he had sustained in his hands and in his body; and for the time he was absent, and had to rot; also for the pains he had undergone; the charge of physician and surgeon; and the disgrace: all which they there endeavour to prove out of the Scripture. Two of them are plainly here. The first of which the doctors upon the Missa consider with great nicety, as L'Empereur observes upon the forenamed treatise; some men being able to earn more by their labours than others; and the disability the stroke brought upon them being, more or less, of a larger and shorter continuance; with respect to all which a proportionable compensation was made to them.

Shall cause him to be thoroughly healed.] Here they also distinguished between the cure of the wound, bruise, or swelling, caused by the stroke, and of any other labours breaking up the stones or bones at the same time. He was bound to pay for the cure of the former, but not of the latter. And if after a man was cured he fell ill again, he that struck him was not bound to take care of his cure.

The same provision is made in the civil law, as L'Empereur notes, which perfectly agrees with this constitution of Moses: Judex computat mercedes medici presitis, cestaque impendit, que in curatione facta sunt: preterea operas quibus caruit, aut caritu- rus est ob id, quod inutilis factus est.
20 ¶ And if a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished.

21 Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money.

22 ¶ If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine.

23 And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life,

24 Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, 25 Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.

26 ¶ And if a man smite the eye of his ser-

According to Plato's laws, he that wounded another in his anger, if the wound was curable, was to pay to διαδοσις την διοδομαν, "double to the damage the wounded man sustained thereby." If it was incurable, he was to pay fourfold; and so he was to do likewise if it were curable, but left a remarkable scar. If the wound was caused involuntarily, he was to pay only simple damages: Ταξιαν ανεπιπλοπες επικεφαλειαν: "for no lawgiver is able to govern chance" (lib. ix. de Leg. p. 578, 879).

Ver. 20. If a man smite his servant, &c.] A slave; who was not an Israëlite, but a gentle.

He shall be surely punished.] With death, say the Hebrew doctors (in Selden, lib. iv. de Jure N. et G. cap. 1. p. 461), he that wrongs his servant, but is not guilty of cruelty, or injured him badly, and was beating him: for that is meant by dying under his hand. But it seems more likely to me that he was to be punished for his cruelty, as the judge who examined this fact thought meet. For his smiting with a rod, not with a sword, was a sign he intended only to correct him, not to kill him. And besides, no man could be thought to be willing to lose his own goods, as such service.

Ver. 21. If he continue a day or two.] A day and a night, as the Hebrew doctors interpret it.

He shall not be punished.] Because it might be presumed he did not die of those strokes.

He is his money.] His death was a loss to his master; who therefore might well be judged not to have sustained a loss value enough to be punished for as he was inexactly punished by losing the benefit of his service.

Ver. 22. If men strive, and hurt a woman with child.] Who interposed between the contending parties; or came perhaps to help her husband.

So that her fruit depart from her.] She miscarriage.

Yet no mischief follow.] She do not die, as the Hebrew doctors express it (see Selden, lib. iv. de Jure N. et G. cap. 1. p. 461).

He shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him.] Her husband may require a compensation, both for the loss of his child, and the hurt or grief of his wife. Yet he was not to be judge in his own case; but it was to be brought before the public judges, as it here follows.

He shall pay as the judges determine.] Who considered in their decree what damage was done; which was estimated by the hurt his wife received in her body; and by the lessening of her price, if she were a slave and might be sold. Unto which several other mulets were added, to be given to the woman herself, as Mr. Selden observes in the place above named.

Ver. 23. If any mischief follow.] If the woman did die.

Thou shalt give life for life.] In the interpretation of this, said Jarchi, our masters differ. For some by life understand that which is properly so called, or the person himself: so that it should signify being put to death; but others understand by it, a pecuniary compensation, which would be paid to the heirs, as the person killed might have been sold for. The LXX. carry it to quite another sense; which is, that if a woman miscarry, and the child was μη εικανομισωρ, not yet formed and fashioned, that the man who occasioned the miscarriage was to pay a fine. But if it were formed, then life was to be given for life. So that this whole law is to be understood of an abortion; and according to the condition of the abortive (not the life or death of the mother), so the punishment was to be inflicted. And thus Philo takes it, and hath a large discourse upon it (see Selden, lib. iv. de Jure N. et G. cap. 1. p. 464, and Constantine L'Empereur in Bava kama, p. 200, &c.).

Ver. 24, 25. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, &c.] These and all the rest that follow to the end of the twenty-fifth verse, the Hebrews understand to signify pecuniary mulets; as may be seen in their Comments upon this place. And Maimonides gives three reasons for it, which he says Constantine L'Empereur takes notice of, and endeavours to confute in his Annotations upon Bava kama, p. 157, &c. 198, &c. But after all, there seems to be a great deal of reason, at least in many cases, to admit of a compensation. As in that mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (lib. xii.) where the one-eyed man complained of this law (which was among the heathen), as too rigid; for if he lost the other eye, he should have been punished less than the man who had only one eye left. Upon such considerations Phavorinus argues against this law, which was one of the twelve tables, as not possible to be justly executed, according to the very letter of it. For the same member of the body is far more valuable to one man than it is to another. For instance, the right hand of a scribe, or a master, captives, he is well supplied as the right hand of a singer. And therefore the law of the twelve tables concerning taliones (like for like), was with this exception—Ni cum eo pacere: that is, if he who had put out a man's eye, or taken away the use of any other member, would not come to an agreement, de talione redimenda, "to make hit satisfaction," and redeem the punishment, he was to suffer in the very like sort. So Sex. Caecilius expounds it in Anulus Gallius (lib. xx. cap. 1).

Ver. 26. If a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, &c.] It is but reason that this should extend to all servants, though of another nation, not merely to those who were Jews. And so Maimonides seems to allow, when he saith, "This is a precept of piety and mercy to poor wretches, who should not be any longer afflicted with servitude when they have lost a member of their body" (More Noch, par. iii. cap. 41). And therefore the common resolution of their doctors is very cruel, that gentle servants (whom they call Canaanites), who were not circumcised, should not have the benefit of this law. For it which L'Empereur takes notice of, and distinguishes servants of another nation. Some were circumcised and baptized; others still remained gentiles, or were only proselytes of the gate. The former kind might be set free three ways; by being redeemed by a price paid by themselves, or any friend; by manumission; and by virtue of this law, upon the loss of any member. For though only an eye and a tooth, are here included all the rest of the principal members of the body, which, being mutilated, cannot be repaired; which they reckon to be four-and-twenty in all. If they did not dismiss such a servant thus mained, the court of judgment, upon an appeal to it, compelled them to give him his liberty with a certificate of it. But the second sort of gentle servants could be made free only by the first two ways, having no benefit (according to this doctrine) by this third way here mentioned (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et G. cap. 8). But heathens themselves were more merciful than these doctors; for the civil laws (as L'Empereur observes upon Bava kama, cap. 8, sect. 3), made better provision for slaves when they were hardly used.

Ver. 27.] The loss of a tooth was not so great as that of an eye: yet to prevent cruelty, God ordained a master should lose the service of his slave for so small a loss as this.

Ver. 29. [The ox shall be stoned.] This was not punishment to the ox, as the Sadducees, saith Maimonides, cavil against us, but to his owner: who was admonished hereby to look better after his cattle: for which reason also the ox was not to be eaten (More Nevoch, par. ii. cap. 40).

CHAPTER XXI.

29 But if the ox were wont to push with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death.

30 If there be laid on him a sum of money, then he shall give for the ransom of his life whatsoever is laid upon him.

CHAPTER XXII.

27 And if he smite out his manservant's tooth, or his maidservant's tooth; he shall let him go free for his tooth's sake.

28 If an ox gore a man or a woman, that they die: then the ox shall be surely stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit.

31 Whether he have gored a son, &c.] Because as the judges thought equal, and to take care the like happened not again.

Ver. 29. If the ox were wont to push, &c.] In the former case, the owner was only punished with the loss of his ox; it being the first time that it had been known to push. But if the ox had formerly been known to have been so unruly, and he had been told of it, and yet did not take care to prevent further mischief, then he, as well as the ox, were to be put to death. The Jewish doctors, indeed, have softened this by divers exceptions; as, first, they say it was to be proved that the ox had pushed upon three several days; for though it appeared he pushed a great many times in one day, it would not make the man liable. And, secondly, it was to be testified, not only to the owner, but before the magistrate, that he had pushed so often. And, lastly, they interpret the last words of this verse (the owner also shall be put to death), of punishment by the hand of Heaven: that is, they leave him to God (see Bochart in his Hierozoic, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 40). But though Abarbanel propounds this as the opinion of wise men, yet he was sensible of its absurdity. For he confesses that God doth not always give his support to be taken upon the owner of the ox: only he thinks that he remits something of the strictness of it in the next verse. And there are three cases here mentioned relating to this matter: one in the foregoing verse, where the ox is ordered to be stoned: another in this, where the owner is also made liable to be put to death: and a third in the next verse, where a pecuniary mulct is only set upon him.

Ver. 30. If there be laid on him a sum of money.] By this it appears there might be a case wherein the owner of the ox should not be put to death, but only be fined, though the ox had been wont to push, and was told of it. And the interpretation of this and the foregoing law, which is given by Constantine L'Empereur, is not that, that the owner should be punished upon the owner of the ox: but that the owner is also liable to be put to death: and a third in the next verse, where a pecuniary mulct is only set upon him.

31 Whether he have gored a son, &c.] Because...
31 Whether he have gored a son, or have gored a daughter, according to this judgment shall it be done unto him.
32 If the ox shall push a manservant or maidservant; he shall give unto their master thirty shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned.
33 ¶ And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man shall dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an ass fall therein:
34 The owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them; and the dead beast shall be his.
35 ¶ And if one man’s ox hurt another’s, that he die; then they shall sell the live ox, and divide the money of it; and the dead ox also they shall divide.
36 Or if it be known that the ox hath used to push in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox; and the dead shall be his own.

CHAPTER XXII.

Is a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep.

Ver. 1. If a man shall steal an ox—and kill it.] Before the theft was discovered to be done by him.
He shall restore five oxen for an ox, &c.] There is a smaller satisfaction required in other things (ver. 9); and here is also a disproportion observable between the stealing of an ox and of a sheep. The reason of both was this; that money, goods, garments, jewels, which men keep in their houses within towns and cities, are better guarded, and not so easily stolen.

Cap. XXI. 1 Of theft. 5 Of damage. 7 Of trespasses. 14 Of borrowing. 16 Of fornication. 18 Of witchcraft. 19 Of bestiality. 20 Of idolatry. 21 Of strangers, widows, and fatherless. 23 Of usury. 26 Of pledges. 28 Of reverence to magistrates. 29 Of the first-fruits.

Is a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep.

Ver. 1. If a man shall steal an ox—and kill it.] Before the theft was discovered to be done by him.

The reason of both was this; that money, goods, garments, jewels, which men keep in their houses within towns and cities, are better guarded, and not so easily stolen.

Ver. 1. If a thief be found breaking up, and be smitten that he die, there shall no blood be shed for him.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. If a man shall steal an ox—and kill it.] Before the theft was discovered to be done by him.
He shall restore five oxen for an ox, &c.] There is a smaller satisfaction required in other things (ver. 9); and here is also a disproportion observable between the stealing of an ox and of a sheep. The reason of both was this; that money, goods, garments, jewels, which men keep in their houses within towns and cities, are better guarded, and not so easily stolen.

Cattle in the field: and of cattle in the field, an ox was more easy to be stolen than a sheep: for sheep feeding in flocks may be all in view of the shepherd; but oxen, feeding scattered one from another, are not so easily observed and kept by the herdsman. Thus Maimonides, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41. But the true reason of the difference between an ox and a sheep seems to be, that an ox was of greater value, and likewise useful to more purposes in husbandry (as ploughing, carrying in and treading out the corn, &c.), which made the punishment of steal-
3 If the sun be risen upon him, there shall be blood shed for him; for he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft.
4 If the theft be certainly found in his hand, alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double.
5 If a man shall cause a field or vineyard ing an ox greater than that of stealing a sheep. Yet there was a difference between a thief who came and confessed his sin of his own accord, and him that stood out till he was apprehended and convicted of it: the latter case, last of the twelve tables, required only the restitution of that which was stolen, with the addition of a fifth part of it, and a sacrifice (Lev. vi. 4, 5). All this is far more equal than Plato's constitutions, which for all thefts require the same punishment, which was paying double;
6 If fire break out, and catch in thorns, so that the stacks of corn, or the standing corn, or the field, be consumed therewith; he that kindled the fire shall surely make restitution.

For if he did accuse himself, and had neither sold nor killed that which he stole, he was not to restore double. He that stole from another thief was not accounted, as Maimonides thinks, to restoration. But in case a thief killed what he had stolen, and after that consecrated it to God, he was obliged notwithstanding to restore fourfold; though if he consecrated it before he killed or sold it, only to restore double. For though the sanctification of a thing, after the sin was committed, did not take away the guilt: yet before he aggravated his fault by killing or selling what he stole, he had no such measure of the punishment (see L'Empeur in Bava kama, cap. 7, sect. 1, 2).

Ver. 2. If a thief be found breaking up.] Some translate it, if a man be found with a digging instrument; or, it may signify any sort of weapon: yet he was to be taken in the very act of breaking up or digging, "And be smitten that he die, &c." The master of the house might kill the robber in this case; because it might well be thought he intended to kill him rather than steal. The other case, last of the twelve tables, allowed this, as A. Gellius relates (lib. xi. cap. 18), duodecim tabulae nocturnum furum quoquo modo, diurnum autem, si se telo defendiderit, intericri impune voluerant. It was one of Plato's laws, also, that if a thief entered a man's house in the night, he might innocently kill him:

Ver. 3. If the sun be risen, &c.] When they might possibly know who he was; and it might be presumed he might be able to steal, not to kill; then to kill him was to be accounted murder.

He shall be sold for his theft.] For six years. But the Hebrew doctors have many mollifications of this law: for they say a woman was not to be sold; nor a man, but for the principal sum. For double, or four or five-fold, he was not to be sold; but have credit for it, till he was able to pay. And he was not to be sold who robbed a Samarian; nor if he had stolen less than he was worth when sold, &c., with many other, which so mitigate, that they almost abrogate it. But the law of the twelve tables thought it reason, a thief should be delivered to him whom he robbed to be his slave, as A. Gellius tells us, lib. xx. cap. 1 (see Bohchart, Hierosolitis, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 40).

Ver. 4. If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, &c.] There was a great difference between killing, or selling, after the stealth; and having these cattle found alive with him. In the former case he was punished four or fivefold (ver. 1), but in this only double. Because the former concealed his theft with more industry, and left less hope of discovery and restitution than in the latter, as Bohchart there observes. Where he also takes notice of the like law at Athens, mentioned by Demosthenes and by A. Gellius (lib. xi. cap. 18). But the Hebrews here also have their exceptions; and will not have this extended to women, children, and servants.

He shall restore double.] In case he did not confess the fact himself, but was otherwise found out, to be eaten, and shall put in his beast, and shall feed in another man's field; of the best of his own field, and of the best of his own vineyard, shall he make restitution.

Ver. 5. If a man shall cause a field or vineyard to be eaten.] This our rabbins, saith R. Levi of Barcelous, understand concerning the damage done by beasts eating another man's grass or corn, &c.

And shall restore the stand of the damage that may be done by their feet, in treading down the tender grass or corn. Of the best of his own field, &c.] What is determined in this case, the Jews extend to all other: that men should make satisfaction for the wrong done to their neighbours in any kind with the best of what they possessed of that kind. So the Misna, Bava, cap. 7, sect. 40, and Amori on this place, damages are paid out of the best. Which made men very careful in looking after their beasts, that they did no hurt in their neighbours' ground. For which Plato orders only such satisfaction to be made as the

Ver. 6. If fire break out, &c.] The Hebrew word properly imports that which breaks out of itself (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes), so that the meaning of this law is, that though a man kindle a fire within his own bounds, and it spread further to the damage of his neighbour, he shall be guilty, though he had no hand in putting the fire to the stacks of corn which were burnt by it; because he should have looked better after it when he had kindled it. For every man, saith he, is bound to watch the fire that he kindles, lest it do mischief; it being its nature to break out, and catch hold of any thing that is near it. And therefore Plato ordains in the place mentioned (I Phebus who changed the former verse) that

Ver. 7. If a man set fire to any combustible matter, and do not take care his neighbour receive no harm by it, he shall pay such damages as the magistrates judge just." But here the Jewish lawyers consider, at what distance the fire was kindled; and resolve, that if there was a fence of four eubits high, or a public highway, or a
If a man shall deliver unto his neighbour money or stuff to keep, and it be stolen out of the man's house; if the thief be found, let him pay double.

If the thief be not found, then the master of the house shall be brought unto the judges, to see whether he have put his hand unto his neighbour's goods.

For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, or ass, for sheep, for taiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall examine:

river between the fire and the field, or stock of corn that was burnt, the man that kindled it was free; (see Bava kama, cap. 6, sect. 4, 5, and L'Empereur in his Annotations there).

Ver. 7. The equity of the law contained in this and the following verse, is very well explained by Maimonides, par. iii. cap. 42, More Novoeh. He that takes a neighbour's goods or money to keep for nothing, and hath no profit thereby, doth a kindness to his neighbour, and therefore is not to bear the loss of them; which must fall upon the owner himself. But he that desires to be the keeper of his goods, and receives a benefit by the use of them, or is paid for his care, must make them good if they be stolen. Or if the owner and the keeper equally partake of the profit, they shall equally bear the loss. R. Levi Barzelonita interprets this place of that which a man takes into his custody chinamm (as his word is), gratis, as we speak, without any reward for his care in keeping it.

Ver. 8. Shall be brought unto the judges. The principal judges were called Elohim, gods. And there were to be three of them at least; who were to examine upon oath (ver. 11) and endeavour to find out the truth (see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 5, p. 232).

To see i. e. Find out.

Whether he have put his hand unto his neighbour's goods.] Or, whether through negligence he suffered them to be stolen. In which he was bound to make them good, as Maimonides saith, in the place beforementioned. But he may also say, (as R. Levi Barzelonita interprets it, Precept. liv.), that which originally belonged to judges; and from thence to be translated to God, the Judge above all (par. ii. cap. 2). But of this see xx. 2.

Ver. 9. For ox, for ass, for sheep,] Though these be only mentioned, yet the law reaches to all cattle whatsoever.

Which another challengeth to be his,] There is great variety in the translation of these words, as Mr. Selden shows (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 12); but, according to ours, the meaning is, when a man affirms that he either deposited such things with his neighbour, or lent them to him, or that he took them (as R. Levi Barzelonita interprets it, Precept. liv.), both parties were to be brought before the judge; that he might examine whether they had been put in custody chinam (as Mr. Selden observes in the place now mentioned); when a man brings an action against another about such things as are here mentioned, and the defendant confesses part of the charge, he shall pay double i. e. He who pretended to have deposited the goods (suppose) was to pay double if he brought an unjust action against his neighbour; or he with whom the goods were deposited was to pay it, if it appeared he had dealt fraudulently: but if it were found that the goods were lost by mere chance, he was to bear the loss.

Maimonides explains it thus, according to the opinion of the Talmudists (as Mr. Selden observes in the place now mentioned); when a man brings an action against another about such things as are here mentioned, and the defendant confesses part of the charge, he shall pay double unto his neighbour.

If a man deliver unto his neighbour an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it:

Then saith an oath of the Lord between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour's goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good.

And if it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof.

If it be torn in pieces, then let him bring it for witness, and he shall not make restitution good which was torn.

but dones the rest; he was to restore as far as he confessed; but for the other which he did not confess, he was to be put upon his oath. Or, if he denied the whole, and he that brought the action had but one witness against him, he was to purge himself by an oath; for, by the law, no man was compelled to clear himself by an oath but in three cases, of which this was one, when a man was guilty by one witness.

Ver. 10.] If he lend any of these things to his neighbour, upon certain considerations, or let them for hire: and his neighbour affirms that they died, or were hurt, or driven away by enemies who carried them captive; but there was no witness of any of these allegations; then the cause was to be brought before the judge to find out the truth, in the manner following:

Ver. 11.] If there was no other way to discover the truth, then he to whom they were delivered, was to purge himself by an oath that he had not killed the beast, nor done any thing to hurt it; and the owner was to trouble him no further: nor was he bound to make any satisfaction, provided he had used these goods according to the agreement between them; for if he had employed them contrary to their contract, then he was bound to make them good to the owner of whom they were borrowed or hired. If he refused to take the oath, he was pronounced guilty; and restitution was ordered to be made out of his goods. But there were some temperaments of this law; for there may, by a variety of reasons, a breach of the bond of Elohim, as by an oath. For instance; he that was of such bad a reputation, that they had a suspicion he would not stick to purge himself, was not admitted to be absolved; nor, though he that brought the action required it, &c. (see Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15, p. 530).

Ver. 12. If it be stolen from him.] Through his negligence who was intrusted with it. He shall make restitution] Because he was bound to have looked better after it; by receiving wages for his care and pains in keeping it (as some interpret), or engaging to make it good, if he did not take the same care of it as if it had been his own.

Ver. 13.] If he could produce any part of it, as an evidence that it was torn, and he endeavoured to relieve it, he was not to make it good. The Hebrew doctors make many exceptions: for they would have him make good what was torn by one wolf alone; because they think he might have been able to defend the cattle against one, though not against many. If, also, he put the oxen or sheep into a pasture, wont to be infested with wild beasts or thieves; or, if he did not call in the help of his neighbours, &c. in these and such-like cases, he was to make good that which was torn, as Maimonides reports their judgment (see Bochart, Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44).

Ver. 14. If a man borrow ought of his neighbour,
11 ¶ And if a man entice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her, he shall surely endow her to be his wife.

12 ¶ And if a man entice of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or die, the owner thereof being not with it, he shall surely make it good.

13 But if the owner thereof be with it, he shall not make it good: if it be an hired thing, it came for his hire.

and it be hurt, or die] This the Hebrew doctors think concerns such things as were lent to another out of kindness, without any consideration for the use of them. About which, if there arose any controversy, by reason of some matim that it received, or its death, it was to be determined by the rule following.

The owner thereof being not with it, he shall surely make it good.] These words, and those in the beginning of the fifteenth verse ("but if the owner be with it, he shall not make it good"), seem to signify, that if the owner was with the thing that was lent, at the time of its hurt or death, it was to be presumed he would do his best to preserve it, and see it was not ill tended, and must, therefore, be considered, that the owner was in fault, and therefore bound to make it good. Which, though it may seem hard, was but necessary to make men careful, and do their best to preserve what was lent them in pure kindness. R. Levi, of Barcelona (Precept. lv.), interprets it quite another way, in this manner: that if the owner was with it at the time of its hurt or death, though not present at the time of its hurt or death, the owner was free; but if the owner was present at the time of the hurt or death, but not at the time of lending, he was bound to make it good. For "the matter (saith he) depends upon the beginning of it."

Ver. 13. An hired thing.] Some make the Hebrew word חָיָה, as the old translation hath it, "a hired woman," to relate unto the person; if he be a mercenary; i.e. the man who lends agrees to let the borrower have it at a certain price, &c. But this is the same, in effect, with the sense of our translation, which makes this word relate to the thing itself: which, if it were borrowed with a condition to pay so much for the use of it as the lender required, then the man, if he was not present at the time of its hurt or death, the owner was free; but if the owner was present at the time of the hurt or death, but not at the time of lending, he was bound to make it good. For "the matter (saith he) depends upon the beginning of it."

Ver. 16. If a man entice a maid that is not betrothed.] Whosoever lay with such a maid in the city was thought to have been an enticer only (unless witnesses came and proved that he forced her), because it might be well supposed her voice would have been heard, if she had cried out upon the force in the city. But if he lay with her in the field, where nobody could hear, it was presumed to be a rape. Thus Monimondes and other Hebrew doctors.

He shall surely endow her to be his wife.] This law does not differ much from the old translation hath it, "a hired woman," and take her to be his wife," but only "endow her to be his wife:" that is, give her such a dowry as she might be his lawful wife. So the same Hebrew doctors understand it; who will not have it to be a command that he should marry her (though that was best), but only that he should make satisfaction for taking away her virginity; which was by paying so much, in the nature of a dowry, as would render her fit to be his wife, if both of them could agree. Yet so, that if either he, or she, or her father refused (for it was in the power of any of these, as they say, to hinder the marriage), he paid this mauncel as the dowry of a virgin to her father (see Selden's Unz. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 16). There is another law of 16 ¶ And if a man entice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her, he shall surely endow her to be his wife.

17 If her father utterly refuse to give her unto him, he shall pay money according to the dowry of virgins.

18 ¶ Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.

this nature (Deut. xxii. 28, 29), but it speaks of a virgin deflowered by force: of which see there.

Ver. 17. If her father utterly refuse.] Here is mention made only of the father; not of the man that deflowered her; who, one would think, should have been bound to marry her, if she and her father consented. And Maimonides gives the拉丁文 as נְפֵי-יַעַרְיָה. But if the father of the damsel did not like to give her to him, he was to pay as here is directed.

He shall pay money:] That is, saith Josephus, fifty shekels, סֵכִי הֶשְכִּילַי יְסֵכִי, "as a satisfaction for her reproach." (lib. iv. Archz. cap. 8.)

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.] This law about witches follows the other about virgins; because witches, among other practices, help by evil arts to allure and entice silly virgins to consent to men's solicitations. Epiphanius reports from one that saw it such a magical operation used by a Jew to procure the love of a Christian woman, who was preserved from the δέλμα τοις ουσιον, "power of his witchcraft," by the seal of Christ (as he calls the sign of the cross), wherewith she fortified herself, at the first attempt made upon her (Herod. xxx. n. 7, 8). But such wicked wretches did a world of other mischief, and therefore were to be put to death, whether they were men or women. The Scripture, indeed, mentions a witch only (saith the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 7, n. 10) and translate an., "a woman," for such people held that every plant had its star, and so had every animal, and all metals. For example; they said, 1 Pluck such a leaf, or such an herb, when the sun, or any other planet, is in such a place; let such a metal be melted under such a constellation, or such a constitution of the moon; and then say such and such words and let a fume be made with such herbs or leaves and that in such and such a form, and this or that will follow. This was their doctrine, and such works as these were the peculiar worship of the stars, who were delighted, they imagined, with such actions, words, or fumes, and for the sake of them would do whatsoever was desired.

All this, he saith, is cock out of their books then evident; from which he concludes, that the scope of the law being, that all idolatry should be taken out of the world, and that no virtue should be ascribed to any star of doing good or hurt to men (which opinion led men to their worship), it necessarily followed that all witches and wizards should be put to death, because they were idolaters; though after a peculiar and different way from that wherein the vulgar worshipped idols. And he thinks that a witch is rather mentioned than a wizard (though both intended), because men are naturally more tender towards the female sex, and apt to favour them; and, therefore, it is as if Moses had said, "Thou shalt kill even a woman that is guilty of this crime." But afterwards 19 ¶ Whosoever lieth with a beast shall surely be put to death.
20 ¶ He that sacrifeth unto any god, save unto the Lord only, he shall be utterly destroyed.
21 ¶ Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.

(Lev. xx. 27), he commandeth both men and women to be stoned.

Others of the Hebrew doctors (particularly R. Levi Barzelonina) give this reason why witches were not to live, "Because they directly thwarted God most blessed, who made all things when he created them for such and such purposes; which they perverted, and, by devices of their own, made to serve other ends which God never designed" (Precept. lix.); but this they could not do without the help of evil spirits; and therefore their crime consisted in entering into a familiarity and a league with them, whose assistance upon such occasions they invoked: which was, in effect, a renunciation of God.

This was an iniquity which had overspread the whole world, especially the eastern parts of it. And as for the Romans, we find a law, as old as the twelve tables, against witchcraft; apud nos in duodecim tabulis caput est, quia alienos fructus excaussat, as we read in Seneca (lib. iv. Nat. Quest. cap. 7), where he mentions the like law among the Athenians. For the Greeks, we find, an extremely addicted to this, especially in Thessaly. Of which none, that I have read, spake so plainly as Plato, in his eleventh book of Laws, p. 932, 933, where he orders punishments not only for those who destroyed others by potions, but for those who pretended to be able to revenge themselves on others, ἡ μαγισσια τι τινι καὶ ἡσαβαις καὶ καταδέοιν λογισται, ut licet de certain enchantments, or by charms, or by those spells which are called lies, or knots. Concerning which, he acknowledges, it is hard to know any thing, or to persuade others there is nothing in them. For if a man see anywhere, κραται μαγισσα πεπλαιμαι, &c. 'waxen resemblances,' made and set either at their doors, or in the turning of the ways, or at the tombs of their ancestors; none can pretend to tell him to reject these things, because he knows not what efficacy is in them." And therefore he would have even such people, who used these sorts of witchcrafts, to be put to death, if they were professors of any sort of knowledge (as μάτης καὶ τιποτακωνος), but if they were simple people, he leaves the judges to punish them as they found reason.

Ver. 19. 'Whosoever lieth with a beast!' This is so infamous a sin, and such a dishonour to nature, and the Author of nature (as Conr. Pellicanus well glosses), that it was not fit such a person should live upon the face of the earth, but die without mercy. See Lev. xviii. 23, xx. 15, 16, where this is more largely handled.

Ver. 20.] Say being the principal act of worship in those days, includes in it all other acts of worship and Divine service, which they were required to pay to the Lord alone (xx. 2, 3, &c.): but the punishment of doing otherwise was not enacted till now. Of which he treats more largely Deut. xvii. 2, 3, &c. See there.

Ver. 21. 'Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him.' Here are two distinct commands. The first of which [not to vex a stranger] the Hebrews will have to consist in not upbraiding him with his former state of heathenism, or giving him any opprobrious words: as saying, Remember what thou wast; or what thy father did. And this was neither to be done to a pro-

22 ¶ Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child.

23 If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry:

25 ¶ If thou lend money to any of my people

sebye of justice, nor to a proselyte of the gate, as far as Mr. Selden could judge of their opinion herein (lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 4). The second [not to oppress him] consisted in not using him hardly in their dealings with him, by making him pay, for instance, and any time more than it was worth. Which, the same Mr. Selden (lib. vi. cap. 5, p. 690), thinks, the Hebrews were of opinion belonged only to their usage of proselytes of justice, who were perfectly in their communion. But this is very unreasonable: for (as R. Levi Barzelonina himself observes), by thus treating any proselyte, they might endanger their return to paganism again, out of indignation to be so despised: and much more when they saw they were wronged. Which God took care they should not be, because they were more helpless than other men, and had fewer friends. Which is the reason that this precept (as the Jews themselves have computed) is inculcated in one and twenty places (see particularly xxii. 9; Lev. xix. 33).

For ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.] There could not be a more powerful reason to move them to treat strangers kindly, than the remembrance of their own oppressions in Egypt, from which they were delivered by the mere mercy of God, which they ought to imitate.

Ver. 22. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child.] Give them no trouble either in word or deed, as the same R. Levi interprets it (Precept. lix.); but in all their commerce with them, in buying, selling, or any other intercourse, treat them not only civilly, but kindly, and benigly. And the reason of the precept, saith he, is the same with the former: because widows and orphans have few or none to protect them, or plead their cause; and therefore the law took care of them, as if their husbands and parents were yet alive. See Ver. 21. 'Thou shalt not upbraiding them.' By giving them ill language, or by insulting over them, or destroying their goods; much more if any man smote them, he was liable to the judgment of God, as Nachmanides interprets it.

'They cry at all unto me.'] A child, saith the same R. Levi, cries to his father, and a wife to her husband; but the widow and the fatherless cry unto me, and I will hear them, for I am merciful.

'I will surely hear their cry.+] Punish you for your ill usage of them, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 24. 'My wrath shall wax hot.'] This signifies their punishment should be θεοκρία, "sent upon them from God," who orders no penalty to be inflicted by their judges, because he intended himself to be their avenger, and that in a very remarkable manner, by serving them in their kind; as it here follows.

'I will kill you with the sword; &c.] Here the Hebrew doctors cry out, Measure for measure (as R. Levi observes); for he threatens that the wives of those that afflicted them should be widows, and their children fatherless, and find none to take pity upon them. For with the measure that men mete withal, others shall mete to them: "if a woman (as he goes on) shall afflict them, she shall die, and her husband shall marry another wife, which shall afflict her children."

If thou lend money to any of my people

That is, to an Israelite.
That is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury.

26 If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down:

27 For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?

That is poor by thee,] By a poor man they do not understand one that goes a begging, but one in such want that he is more to be pitied than those who have the confidence to beg in the streets. The foundation of this precept (as the before-mentioned R. Levi observes) was to fix in them the great virtue of mercy, kindness, and clemency; whereby poor people being helped, in this way of lending them money gratis, might recover again to a better condition, by the goodness of God to them.

Thou shalt not be to him as an usurer.] Neither domineer over him, nor make him pray, and entreat, and wait long, as if he were a slave; nor exact any thing for the use of the money.

Neither shall thou lay upon him usury.] Not make him pay so much for it, as to ruin some of them interpret it, this is a precept requiring all Israelites to have no hand in letting out money to usury, either by writing the bonds, or by being a witness to them, or by being bound with others for the interest of money; for the word they observe is in the plural number, ye shall not put upon him usury. Which law concerning usury is fully shewn, in the Deut. xxi. (v. 19, 20, cap. 9, 10), where he shows that some usury was forbidden by the law; and other by the decrees of their wise men. The law forbade them to contract to receive back again any sum of money more than they lent. But it was further required by their wise men, that they should not receive any gift beforehand to induce them to lend; nor any thing afterward by way of gratuity, or to express their thankfulness. Yet this last was permitted in the loan of orphans' money, as Maimonides saith. And what was thus forbidden to be done to an Israelite, was permitted to be done to a gentile. Nay, some will have that to be an affirmative precept which we read Deut. xxiii. 20, obliging them to take usury of a gentile, if they lent any money to him. And that Maimonides contradiction. And therefore are those who think this law only forbade them to take usury of a poor Israelite, but not of a rich: it being unreasonable that he should increase his wealth by the use of his neighbour's money, and have no profit thereof.

Ver. 26. If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment] His clothes, as we speak, or bed-clothes. For it is plain, by what follows, he speaks of that which was to keep him from the cold in the night.

To pledge.] As a security for the payment of the money which he lent him.

Thou shalt deliver it unto him:] This shows he speaks of a poor man; which is more fully declared, Deut. xiv. 12, 13, where it is his covering only.] It was contrary to humanity, to keep from him the only thing he had to keep him warm in his bed; for it was in effect to kill him.

When he crieth unto me, that I will hear:] Punish thee for thy barbarous cruelty (ver. 23), and besides, the Hebrew doctors say, he was to be beaten, by order of the court of judgment.

I am gracious.] And would have you like myself.

Ver. 28. Thou shalt not revile the gods.] i.e. The judges, as no doubt it is to be interpreted (see Mr. Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13, p. 289), and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious.

28 ¶ Thou shalt not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people.

29 ¶ Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors: the firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me.

And the Hebrew doctors give this reason for it; because it tends to terrify them from doing justice, and exposes them to the contempt and hatred of the people: whom it also inclines to sedition. But many of them (see him, cap. i. p. 9), will have another precept contained in this, that they blaspheme not the name of the Most High. Some few also (among whom is Philo) fancy it to be a command not to revile the gods that other people worship, though they be false gods. And so Julian the apostate took it; who is confuted by St. Cyril, as Mr. Selden there observes.

Nor curse the ruler of thy people.] That is, either the prince of Israel, or the president of the great Sanhedrin. So R. Levi Barzalonia (Praecept. lxxviii.). The intention of the Scripture is to admonish us of our duty to him, who is the prince of Israel; with respect both to the dominion of the kingdom, and of the law (as his words are), it being a great crime to speak evil of him, by whose care all differences were composed, &c.

If any man was guilty of this crime, he was to be scourged three times; and if he were the son of a prophet, four. And he that was guilty in the holy city, he was to be stoned. But he that was guilty in the villages, he was to heathens themselves reckoned this among the greatest offences. It was one of the laws of Charondas (as Hen. Stephamus observes in his Fontes et Rivi Juris Civiliis): Ισοτο δι' μηκότα δάκηματα, θεον καταφύσιος και γοίνοι κάπως κτεινά, όταν αρχοται και νόμον αλεξορούν, και εκοινούς ενόπλια εκθέοντες "let these be reckoned the greatest crimes of all, except the gods and voluntary abuse of respect to rulers and laws, and voluntary dishonour of justice."

In like manner Zaleucus ordains, that, next after the gods, and demons, and heroes, γοίνοι τε και νόμοι και αρχοται σύνεργας είνας των τιμάς, "parents, and the laws and rulers, should be equally had in honour." And Plato thought those that would not be subject to the Sovereign, to be deserving of the punishment of the old Titans, who would have pulled the gods out of their thrones, την μνημήνια χαλαση τοιαύταιρη φωνή ειδικούς και μνημοσύνας.

Ver. 29. Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, &c. The Hebrews will have this to be a direction for the bringing unto God, in due order, those things which were to be offered to him. As, first, the trumnah; which was the first oblation that was made out of the corn, when it was newly threshed out: which was to be, they say, a fiftieth part: which was given to the priest. Then the first tithe, which was given to the Levites; and the second tithe, which the possessors ate at Jerusalem, when the tabernacle was settled there. This order, they say, God here requires them not to be suffered, because they had the honor of the old Titans, who would have pulled the gods out of their thrones, την μνημήνια χαλαση τοιαύταιρη φωνή ειδικούς και μνημοσύνας.

30 Likewise shalt thou do with thine oxen, and with thy sheep: seven days it shall be with his dam; on the eighth day thou shalt give it me.

Ver. 30. Likewise shalt thou do with thine oxen, &c.] See xiii. 2, 12, 15. On the eighth day thou shalt give it me.] It was not acceptable to God, because not fit to be offered to him till the eighth day; for the same reason that children were not circumcised till the eighth day. For all creatures, when they are newly born, saith Maimonides (par. iii. More Neocho. cap. 49), by reason of their abundant moisture, are so weak and feeble, that it is doubtful whether they will live or no; and therefore, till seven days be over, they are locked upon as but abortive (so his words are), and scarce numbered among the living. Besides, they are not sufficiently purged till then from the foulsness of their stomach and bowels: which is another reason they were not to be offered unto God; who did not accept that which was imperfect or impure. Whatevsoever was the reason, this law was observed also among the gentiles, as Bochart shows out of Pliny in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50. Yet there was this difference between these and the first-fruits mentioned in the foregoing verse; that though these creatures were fit for sacrifice on the eighth day, yet they might stay longer before they were offered, though not beyond the year, for then they were not accepted (as was observed before, xii. 5), but the first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil, were to be offered presently, as soon as they were ripe.

Ver. 31. Ye shall be holy men unto me:] Because the Israelites were a peculiar people, separated to God by peculiar laws and rites by him instituted (and thence called a holy nation, xix. 6), therefore God commanded them to distinguish themselves even in their diet, from other people; and look upon it as below their dignity to eat such things as the gentiles did. This is the meaning of their being holy to God, as appears from Deut. xiv. 2, 3, 21.

Neither shall ye eat any flesh that is torn of beasts in the field:] Both because the blood was in it and it was devoured by unclean creatures. R. Levi, before mentioned, saith, it was unwholesome; which he makes the reason of the prohibition. But whether it was torn by a wolf, a lion, or a bear, or any other beast, it made no difference, if so be it died presently, or not long after. So the Jews interpret the Hebrew word teremphah, as L’Empeur observes out of Moses Mikkotsi (in his notes upon Bava kama, cap. 7, sect. 2), who saith it signifies “that which a beast tears, or bruises, so that it is near to death, though it be not actually dead.” For if it was dead, they call it nasiy, “a carcass;” which in their language signifies, not only that which dies of itself, but which is killed with a weapon or torn by a wild beast. Accordingly they take teremphah here to signify, not only that which is torn by beasts, but that which any other way is so hurt that it is near to death. As, if it fall from a house, and break its ribs, or other members; or an arrow be shot through its heart or lungs; or any disease have affected those vital parts. If death was more likely to ensue upon such things, it was not to be eaten.

In the field:] Whether it were torn in the field, or any other place, it made no difference; but the field is mentioned, because there commonly such things happen.

Ye shall cast it to the dogs. ] R. Solomon saith they might sell it to the Gentiles, whom the Jews counted no better than dogs. Which agrees with the decree in the Misna (Bava kama, cap. 7, sect. 2), that though it appeared afterward a thief had stolen what was torn, yet he was to make the legal restitution: contrary to the opinion of R. Simeon, who absolved such a thief, because he might not eat it, and consequently have no benefit by it. But most thought he might sell it; and therefore was liable to make satisfaction. If any Israelite did eat of it, he was to be scourged. Sir J. Marsham quotes the like precept out of Phocylides’s verses, which end thus:

καλόν ἐστιν ἔλεος ὡς αἴματι.

“Let beasts be eaten by beasts” (Chron. Egypt. sect. ix.).

CHAPTER XXIII.

1 Of slander and false witness. 3, 6 Of justice. 4 Of charitableness. 10 Of the year of rest. 12 Of the sabbath. 13 Of idolatry. 14 Of the three feasts. 15 Of the blood and the fat of the sacrifice. 20 An Angel is promised, with a blessing, if they obey him.

1 Thou shalt not raise a false report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness.

2 ¶ Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil; neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many to wrest judgment:

should not lay his cause before the judge, in the absence of him that is to answer, though the judge would hear it. And he also adds, that the rabbins take it to comprehend such as report the calumny, or that receive it; or give a false testimony. And Philo thinks the Greeks from thence took that law, μὴ παραφέρεις ἰδιον, “not to make a proof of a hearsay,” which was in the Attic law, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13, p. 576). And it seems to me most rational to take this to relate to witnesses (as the following clause doth), that they should neither calumniate any man, nor bring ungrounded reports to carry a cause.

Put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unright-Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause.

thought not themselves bound to any such kindness for one of another nation. This, perhaps, they gathered from Deut. xxii. 1, 2, where, instead of the word enemy, we find cases uses the word breach. But this should have taught them, to look upon all men, even enemies, as brethren; having the same common original, and bearing the image of the same God.

This verse may be connected with the foregoing in this manner: If you are inclined to show pity, do it in such instances as these, but not in judgment.

Ver. 5. If thou see the ass of him that hatheth the lying under his burden,] His ass is only mentioned, but oxen, and other like creatures, are intended; as appears from the former verse. Yet this likewise the hard-hearted Jewish doctors would have belonged only to an Israelite who hated them. And they put several cases upon this law: as, what if the beast be a beast of a friend, the burden belong to an Israelite; or to the contrary; what is to be done? And if they meet with two beasts belonging both to Israelites, and labouring under burdens; but one the beast of a friend, the other of an enemy; which is he bound to help? In which they resolve, that he is by this precept to have regard to the beast of his enemy; that he may subordinate his own affection, which would persuade him otherwise. How far also the word extends is a question among them: that is, how far they were to go out of their way to lend their help; with suchlike niceties, which I shall not trouble the reader withal.

And wouldst forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him. The sense is clear enough; but the construction of it seems to me the Hebrew is not so plain. For the word azob, which we translate help, signifies to leave or forsake: and so the Chaldee here interprets it; "Thou shalt in that moment dismiss or forsake thy enmity to him, and go and help him." And L. de Dieu to the same purpose; "Rather than leave him under his burden, quit thine enmity to him," &c. Other versions, as the Chaldee, are not able to make out the grammar of the Hebrew words; but Bochart thinks all in vain: unless, instead of the particle le with a waw, we admit it with an aleph: and then it runs clearly in the Hebrew in this manner, "Thou shalt cease (or abstain) from leaving him" (i.e. do not follow thy own inclinations to pass by him); "leaving thou shalt not leave him" (i.e. by no means leave him), viz. to raise up his beast himself, as if it nothing concerned thee. Or, "Thou shalt abstain from leaving it" (i.e. the ass labouring under his burden); "I say, thou shalt by no means leave it." The same thing is repeated, because it is a command so opposite to men's depraved affections; and therefore was fit to be incisively, that they might not lightly pass it over (see Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 40, p. 399).

Ver. 6. Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause. As they might not favour a man because he was poor (ver. 3), so much less might they wrong him; or not do him right, because he wanted money to prosecute it. There seems to be an emphasis (as Conradus Pellicionus observes) in the word thy poor: importing that they had such a relation to them, that they ought to be as much concerned for them as any other member of their body.

But the Jews, fancying this to be sufficiently in-7 Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked.

8 ¶ And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous.

9 ¶ Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger:

included in the precept before mentioned (ver. 3), understand here by the poor, a bad man: who is papas preceptorum, non facultatum, “one that wants virtue, not money.” To whom a judge might not say he was a wicked fellow, and condemn him without any further examination of his cause: for it belongs to God (saith the same R. Levi) to execute judgment upon the ungodly, and not to the judges.

Ver. 7. Keep thee far from a false matter.] i.e. From a false judgment (for he seems to speak to the judges), and neither admit that which is false, nor pronounce it.

And the innocent and righteous slay thou not.] That is (saith the before-named R. Levi Barzel.), beware carefully, lest thou take away the life of him that may innocently suffer from the accusation.

And therefore, he saith, the judges were to condemn no man, but by the testimony of two eye-witnesses. And they make this precept as much as, thou shalt not judge out of conjectures. Nay, if there were two witnesses that did not speak to the same matter, he was not to be condemned. As, if one witness said he saw such a man break the Sabbath, and another said, he saw him commit idolatry; judgment was not to be given against him upon this testimony; because Moses saith, slay not the innocent. Another example of which is still more close, which is mentioned in the T. Sanhedrin: if one said he saw him worship the moon, and another that he saw him worship the sun, the man was not to be condemned who was thus accused, because the witnesses did not speak to the same sort of idolatry (see Selden, lib. ii. de Synod. cap. 13, p. 567). By the same reason they were not to acquit him who was plainly convicted of such impieties.

For I will not justify the wicked.] i.e. Such an unjust judge.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt take no gift.] No, not to absolve the innocent; or to condemn the guilty: as it is in interpreted in Siphri.

For the gift blindeth the wise.] Such presents made to a judge are apt to cast a mist (as we speak) before his eyes, i.e. to corrupt his understanding; though he be otherwise perspicacious enough to discern between truth and falsehood, good and evil (1 Sam. viii. 2). The word which we translate wise, is in the Hebrew piecechim, open or seeing; concerning which consult Bochart, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 16, p. 470.

And perverteth the words of the righteous.] By words seems to be meant the sentence of those who might otherwise have been inclined to be righteous and upright judges.

The Hebrew lawyers say, that not only pecuniary gifts are here forbidden, but such words also (I suppose they mean promises of reward) as may win the affection: and that he who gave the present was guilty, as well as he that received it (see Selden de Synedris, lib. ii. cap. 13, p. 570). But especially Joth, Ccch. ad exempt. Gem. Sanhedrin, cap. i. sect. 10; Annot. 4, where, among other things, he gives this ingenious derivation of the Hebrew word shekoch, which we translate gift (out of the treatise called Chetuboth, where it is said to be as much as shekhu chad, that is, whereby he is one); for the party who receives the gift hath his mind so drawn to the giver, shall eat. In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy oliveyard.

12 Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest: that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger, may be refreshed.

13 And in all things that I have said unto you be circumspect: and make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth.

14 ¶ Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me in the year.

15 Thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread: (thou shalt eat unleavened bread seven days, as I commanded thee, in the time appointed of the month Abib; for in it thou camest out from Egypt; the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth.)

16 In the time appointed of the month Abib,] viz. At the passover, Pentecost, and Shavuat, when they gathered all the fruits of the earth, and dwelt in tabernacles; as it follows in the next verses.

17 This was the first of which was plainly instituted, in memory of their coming out of Egypt. The second, some think, was in memory of their coming into Canaan (rather of the overthrow of Pharaoh in the sea, and giving the law on Mount Sinai). And the third, in memory of their dwelling so long in the wilderness, as the psalmist observes in his More Noevoch, par. iii. cap. 43.

At these three great solemnities three things were to be done: first, they were to make a feast: secondly, to appear before God in the court of the temple; and, thirdly, to rejoice. Besides which, they were to bring certain offerings unto God.

18 This shall be the feast of unleavened bread,] viz. Eusebius thought worthy to transcribe out of him at large, in his Prepar. Evang. lib. viii. cap. 9.

But this precept about the year of rest is more fully delivered in Lev. xxv. 2, 3, &c., where see what I have noted.

19 I the Lord have spoken. He would not have them imagine they should rest less on the Sabbath this year than in others, because this was the first year as kind of Sabbath, and taught them to circumspect in the usual strictness. Which is the reason, perhaps, of the repetition of this precept in this place.

That thine ox and thine ass may rest,] This shows that one great end of instituting the observance of this day at Marah (xxv. 23, 26), was, that men and beasts might rest, in remembrance of the rest that God had given them from their burdens in Egypt; for Lev. xxv. 33 Barzelonita observes, that this precept is repeated in the law twelve times.

20 In all things that I have said unto you be circumspect.] Be cautious, lest you offend in any of the forenamed particulars; but especially in that which follows.

21 Make no mention of the name of other gods.] Such cautions as these, to prevent idolatry, are repeated no less than forty-four times in the law, as the same R. Levi observes. And the meaning of this is, either that they should not swear by other gods, or make any vows in their names; nor consequently enter into society with gentiles, as the best of the Hebrew writers understand it, and as the Vulgar Latin takes it, or that they should not so much as simply name the gods of other nations. They who are of this last opinion differ in their explication of it. For some of them say, only the calling them by such names as attribute some divinity to them, is the thing forbidden; not calling them by their proper names of Moloch or Bel, or the like; and thus Tertullian understood it. But there are others who think it lawful (so far as to use any of their names in common discourse; though there be no mention of their divinity. For Chemosh and Milcom, and such like names, they say, are not mentioned in Scripture but with detestation and reproach (as the abomination of the Moabites or Ammonites), and therefore they think it unlawful to say, I invoke thee on the feastday of such an idol of the gentiles, or the like. Yet some of those who imagine the simple use of their names to be forbidden, except the names of those mentioned in Scripture. So Maimonides; the names of the idols of the gentiles which are mentioned in Scripture it is lawful for us to name; as Peor, Bel, Nebo, Baal, &c. (see Selden, lib. ii. de N. et G. cap. 13, p. 269, &c.). They say this precept binds men and women in all places, and at all times; and the punishment for its violation was beating.

22 Ye shall not pass over,] viz. Eusebius observes in his More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 43. Of these three great solemnities three things were to be done: first, they were to make a feast: secondly, to appear before God in the court of the temple; and, thirdly, to rejoice. Besides which, they were to bring certain offerings unto God.

23 This shall be the feast of unleavened bread,] see xii. 17, &c. xiii. 6, 7.

In the time appointed of the month Abib.] Or in the month of new eorns of corn (see xii. 4). For many learned men (particularly Huetius) think this word Abib not to be a proper name, but an appellative (as they speak), the proper names of months being not yet used among the Hebrews; who spoke of them before the captivity of the Babylonians. Others, according to the order and number wherein they stood, viz. first, second, third, &c. month (see Demonstr. Evang. prop. iv. Cap. de Libro Joshua, n. 2).

24 None shall appear before me empty.] The phrase in the Hebrew (which we translate appear before me) is very remarkable, viz. None shall see my face: which does not signify that they beheld the external symbol of his presence; but that they looked directly that way where it was: and that they should not be accepted by God, unless they brought some present with them. For none approached to an earthly majesty in those countries without a present (as we read in the sacred story), which was a token of love and affection as well as of respect and honour. And therefore this precept did not only pertain to this feast, but to all the others mentioned in the verse before, as appears from Deut. xvi. 16. And accordingly there were special oblations ordained by the law itself, which were then to be made. At the passover, when their harvest began, they were to bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of their harvest, and might not eat any corn till this was done (Lev. xxiii. 10, 14). At the next feast they brought two wares, for a second first-fruits of their wheat harvest (Lev. xxiii. 17); and at the feast of tabernacles, they offered the first-fruits of wine and oil (see Mr. Mede, Discourse xlvii. p. 335). Besides all which, good men brought free-will offerings; which are often mentioned in the law.
out from Egypt: and none shall appear before me empty:"

16 And the feast of harvest, the firstfruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in thy field: and the feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field.

Ver. 16. The feast of harvest.] Called also the feast of weeks (xxxiv. 22), because it was seven weeks after the passover. Mr. Mede, in the place now named, thinks this was called the harvest-feast; because as harvest began at the passover, so it ended at Pentecost. And thus Bochart also: "At the passover they first put the sickle into the corn; and about Pentecost harvest was finished, and all brought into the barn" (Hierozoic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 13). But this seems not to be true; for now only the firstfruits were brought: which were not offered in the end, but in the beginning of harvest. And so it fol-

The firstfruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in thy fields.] Which is not to be understood of all their labours, but of those fruits which were first sown in the ground. It being therefore called the harvest-feast, because the principal part of harvest, viz. the wheat-harvest (as it is expressly called, xxxiv. 22), then was, and that sort of grain was sown before barley, as that was before flax; and therefore here called the firstfruits of their labour sown in the field.

Feast of ingathering.] Called also the feast of tabernacles, Lev. xxiii. 34.

Which is in the end of the year.] By this it appears that their year anciently began in the month Tisri, about autumn; at which time the world itself began, and was called, and a great many other learned men assert, with such reasons as are not easy to be confuted.

When thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field.] At this feast their harvest was completed; the fruits of the earth being not only ripe, but gathered into their barns. Which was the foundation of the great rejoicing we read of at this time; because God now gave them some rest and respiration, as Maimonides speaks, from their employments (More No- voch, par. ii. cap. 43), where he observes that Aristotle himself, in his eighth book of Ethics, mentions such a feast among the gentiles, and upon the same ground, in these words, as he recites them: "An-pleasantly, sacrifices and public assemblies for the sake of sacrifices, were in the gathering of the fruits and products of the earth; as if the sacrifices were offered for their respiration." The Israelites dwelt in booths at this feast for another reason; and their dwelling in booths was now most tolerable (as the same Maimonides there notes) because the weather was moderate at that time; when they were not wont to be troubled either with heat or with rain.

Ver. 17. Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord God.] This verse more fully explains what was said ver. 14, by showing where they should keep these feasts, viz. before the Lord; i. e. in the place where his most glorious majesty should settle: which was first in the tabernacle, and afterward in the temple, and then who should appear before him there, viz. all the males, though others were not bound to it; though some religious people carried their whole families with them, as appears by Elkanah (1 Sam. i.). This command is repeated (xxxiv. 23), and the true reason of it seems to have been this: that while they dwelt in the wilderness they ate no meat at all at their private tables, but what had been first offered up to God at the tabernacle (Lev. xxvii. 4, 5). Which precept was dispensed withal when they came into the land of Canaan, and dwelt, many of them, so remote from the tabernacle, that they could not come up every day to sacrifice (Deut. xii. 21). Instead of these three times and set times appointed in the year: in which every male was bound to come up, and see God at his tabernacle, and there eat and drink before him. Whence the sacrifice which was then ordered, was wont to be called a sacrifice of seeing, as Dr. Cudworth hath observed in his little treatise of the Right Notion of the Lord's Supper. But as the latter part interprets it, they were not to bring their males to appear before the Lord till they were able to walk, in their father's hand, up from Jerusalem to the temple.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice.] That is, the paschal lamb, as Jonathan in express words interprets; and as it appears from xxxv. 25, that the first passover was a sacrifice, I observed before, xii. 27.

With leavened bread.] There being three great solemn feasts appointed in the foregoing verses (ver. 14, 17), in this and the following he prescribes some rules how they were to be observed. And here, in this verse, ordains two things relating to the passover: that it should not be eaten with leavened bread; nor any of the sacrifices, nor their morsels, nor a sacrifice, of which were ordained before (xii. 10, 14, 15), in its first institution; and here repeated, upon its being mentioned again with the other feasts.

It may be fit for me here to observe, that to move the Israelites to keep this passover with the greater care, God calls it both here and in xxxiv. 25, after a peculiary manner, my sacrifice, and my feast, (as the latter part of this verse may be translated), being a feast of a most solemn nature; and a sacrifice then offered of singular use. For which reason he requires them, as not to offer it with leaven (which was at that time forbidden for special reasons), so not to reserve the fat of the offering till the next day: for that was not for the honour of the sacrifice; but being apt quickly to corrupt in these hot countries, and to offend the palate, or the nose, which had been against the dignity of the sacrifice. Which is the reason the Jews give why the flesh of the peace-offerings was not to be kept till the third day (Lev. xix. 6). It was to preserve the manner of the sacrifice: things kept so long being apt to stink. Whence εἰδωλοαἰσθήματα, "yesterday's flesh," is noted in Hippocras the same with σαρκίνα, "corrupt:" and Galen expounds ως διὰ τοῦ θερμοῦ, "to tend to corruption;" as Pet. Castellanus observes (lib. i. de Esu Carnium, cap. 5, p. 42).

Ver. 19. The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the house of the Lord thy God.] This precept hath a respect to the next feast, that of Pentecost. And therefore, though there were several firstfruits, which were all to be offered in their time (which were of seven things, barley, wheat, figs, pomegranates, olives, dates, and grapes), yet here are meant only the two loaves or cakes made of their new wheat, which were to be offered at this feast (Lev. xxiii. 17), for till this was done they might not make use of their corn (see more concerning this matter
Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk.

20 ¶ Behold, I send an Angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared.

21 Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions: for my name is in him.

22 But if thou shalt indeed obey his voice, offering him milk, and Fannus with a kid: and every one knows both these were used in the worship of Bacchus.

Ver. 20. Behold, I send an Angel before thee.] In the twenty-third verse he calls him mine angels; by which the Jews commonly understand Michael: there being but a very little difference between Malachi (which signifies my angel) and Michael. But a great many Christians think this was not a created angel, but an uncreated, viz. the eternal Son of God; who, they suppose, appeared to Moses in the bush, and conducted them all along to Mount Sinai. Which I am afraid to assert, because it seems dangerous to me (as I observed above) to call him simply an angel, i.e. a minister or messenger, without any such addition as that in Mal. iii. 1, The angel of the covenant. For so he was at his incarnation, of which he there speaks: before which I dare not ascribe to him such ministerial works as these, of bringing the children of Israel out of Egypt, and going before them to lead them the way to Canaan. This was properly the work of an angel, to whom Moses attributes it, when he orders his ambassadors to say to the king of Edom (Numb. xx. 16). "When we cried unto the Lord he heard our voice, and sent an angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt," &c. But this angel was a prime minister in the heavenly host, by whom he was accompanied. So he saith to Joshua (v. 14), "I am come as captain of the host of the Lord." Which is the title of Michael in Dan. x. 13, 21. But though we thus understand it here, this doth not exclude the presence of God himself, but rather proves it: for this angel and his host were sent from the Shechinah, who was in the pillar of cloud: which was moved by this angel, and conducted them through the wilderness (see Num. xii. 7, 8).

To keep thee in the way, &c. To preserve and protect them, as well as to direct and guide them, till they came to Canaan; which was the place God had prepared for them.

Ver. 21. Beware of him.] Or observe him. Obey his voice.] Because he did but report what God himself commanded; who was there present with them, as long as they obeyed him.

Provoking him not.] By any disobedience. For he will not pardon your transgressions.] But punish you, when you contumaciously offend me.

For my name is in him.] He acts by my authority, and power, and sustains my person, who am present where he is. For the name of God is said to be there, where He is present after a singular and extraordinary manner (1 Kings viii. 16; 1 Chron. vi. 5, 6). Maimonides expounds it, My word is in him, i.e. saith he, God's will and pleasure was declared by the angel (par. i. Morenoch, cap. 64). In which he seems to follow the Chaldee, who translates it, "for his word is in my name," i.e. what he speaks is by my authority.

Ver. 22. ¶ But if thou shalt indeed obey his voice.] By this it appears that the words of the angel were the words of God; who spake by him: and both are to be understood to be present (see Gen. xxii. 11, 15).

Then I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, &c.] God and the angel seem to me to be so distinguished. V. 1.—40

CHAP. XXIII. 313
24 Thou shalt not bow down to their gods, nor serve them, nor do after their works: but thou shalt utterly overthrow them, and quite break down their images.

25 And ye shall serve the Lord your God, and he shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee.

in this verse, that we should not look upon the angel as God, but as his minister.

Ver. 23. The word Malachiy means, according to the very same letter, which Michael, the author of the Book of Enoch, takes it, as if he had said, "Michael, my proper or peculiar angel," &c.

Bring thee in unto the Amorites.] Who were the principal people in the land of Canaan; and had made themselves masters of the first country which Joshua conquered (see Gen. x. 16).

The Hittites, and the Perizzites, &c.] Concerning these people here mentioned, see Gen. x. 16, xv. 17, xv. 19, &c. The reader cannot but observe that here are only six nations mentioned, whereas there were seven in all, whom God delivered up into their hands (Josh. iii. 10); yet in another place, where he commands them all to be utterly destroyed, Moses mentions but six, as he doth here (Deut. xx. 17). For, as some have conjectured, the Girgasites, who are here omitted, had been subdued by the Amorites, and were mixed with them; who were the most powerful of all the seven nations, and had spread themselves into many parts of the country; as appears from Gen. xiv. 13; Num. xiii. 29; Deut. i. 7, 19, 44.

Ver. 24. Thou shalt not bow down to their gods, nor serve the.] This is a caution against the idolatry of the people of Canaan: into whose country, when he had brought them, he charges them to be so far from doing any honour to their gods, either outwardly by bowing down to them, or inwardly by serving them; i.e. as some of the Hebrews interpret it, praying to them, or giving thanks, &c. (Selden, lib. iii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 19), then he commands them to break them down, and utterly destroy them.

Nor do after their works:] These words are so large, that they may comprehend all the abominable things which were done by the seven nations (mentioned in Lev. xviii. and other places); but here the matter seems to restrain them to their worship, which he would not have them imitate, by building temples or altars in honour of their gods, or offering such sacrifices as they did, or observing any of their religious rites.

Utterly overthrow them.] This relates to the people of the land; as it is explained in Deut. xx. 17.

Quite break down their images.] For they were bound entirely to root idolatry out of the land of Canaan: though in other countries which they might conquer, they did not think themselves bound to break their images, as Selden observes (lib. ii. de Jure N. et Gent. cap. 2).

Ver. 25. Ye shall serve the Lord your God.] Worship him, as he directs, and no other being. I observed before, that none were so senseless as to imagine a figure of any thing made of wood or stone, &c. to be the Creature of heaven and earth: but they worshipped them (as Maimonides well observes) as things intermediate between the Most High and them; which is here forbidden (More Nevoch, par. i. cap. 36).

He shall bless thy bread, &c.] This is a promise that he would abundantly supply them with meat and drink, and also give them health; without which they could take no comfort in that plentiful provision.

Ver. 26. There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfill.

27 I will send my fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee.

28 And I will send hornets before thee, which shall" shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee.

29 I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee.

30 By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land.

And I will set thy bounds from the Red sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river: for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hand; and thou shalt drive them out before thee.

never drove out all the inhabitants, but only made them tributaries.

Thou shalt drive them out before thee.] In such manner as is mentioned in the foregoing verses.

Ver. 32. Thou shalt make no covenant with them.] i.e. With the people of the seven nations. But with other gentiles they might make covenants: only not suffer them to live in their land, unless they renounced all idolatry. Nay, Maimonides is of opinion, that such of the seven nations as renounced idolatry, were to be received into their friendship: for that law in Deut. xx. which requires them to send a summons to every city before they besieged it, with an offer of peace, he extends even to them; and grounds his opinion upon Josh. xi. 19, 20. As for that objection which seems to lie against this, about the Gibeonites, who needed not by craft to have obtained a league with the Israelites, if this were true doctrine, his answer is, that Joshua had sent a summons, with offers of peace to them and all the rest, which they rejected; but would afterward have gladly accepted, and then it was not to be admitted: and therefore they contended that cunning way to be received into friendship with the Israelites. See P. Cuneus, lib. ii. de Republ. Hebr. cap. 20. And Selden, lib. vi. de Jure N. et G. cap. 13, where he quotes a passage out of the Jerusalem Gemara, which says, that Joshua sent three letters to the Gibeonites. But he shows withal, that other Jews contradict this; and expressly declare the seven nations were not to be invited to peace. What the terms were on which others were invited, see there, cap. 14.

All this considered, I am inclined to think Maimonides’s opinion to be true; which that place in Josho very much favours; and so doth the story of Rahab, and the practice of Solomon; who only put the remainders of these nations under tribute (1 Kings ix. 20, 21).

Nor with their gods.] This prohibits them to suffer any of the seven nations to exercise idolatry among them, as R. Levi of Barcelona interprets it. Or rather, he forbids them to make any vows to their gods, or oblige themselves to perform any act of worship to them.

Ver. 33. They shall not dwell in thy land.] If a gentle did renounce his idolatry, he might dwell among them; and was called a stranger, ishob, dwelling, or inhabiting. But if he did not forsake it, they might not sell him a foot of land, nor let him hire a house among them: only he might come and sell commodities to them, as the same R. Levi expounds it. But Maimonides says, they might not so much as suffer them to pass through their country, when they had power to hinder it; which others think too rigid an opinion, as Mr. Selden shows (lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 3, not. 10, &c.).

Lest they make thee sin against me.] All society with idolaters was forbidden, lest they should infect the Israelites with their infidelity (as the same R. Levi speaks), of which there was the greater danger, because they were too prone to follow the gentle customs.

If thou serve their gods.] This caution, being repeated three times over and over, ought to have been the more diligently observed by the Israelites, and made them more fearful of entering into familiarity with idolaters. Who were of various sorts; for not only 32 Thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor with their gods.
33 They shall not dwell in thy land, lest every nation had its proper and peculiar gods, but every city, town, house, nay, every man, made themselves gods according to their fancy.

It will surely be a snare unto thee.] Bring great calamities upon thee, and at last be thy ruin; as it is explained Josh. xxiii. 13; Judg. ii. 3. For instead of driving out the seven nations, they brought Israel under their yoke, and grievously oppressed them; as we read in the story of the Judges, particularly in the fourth chapter.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Moses is called up into the mountain. 3 The people promise obedience. 4 Moses buildeth an altar, and twelve pillars. 6 He sprinkleth the blood of the covenant. 9 The glory of God appeared. 14 Aaron and Hur have the charge of the people. 15 Moses goeth into the mountain, where he continueth forty days and forty nights.

1 And he said unto Moses, Come up unto the Lord, thou, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel; and worship ye afar off.
2 And Moses alone shall come near the Lord:

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. He said unto Moses.] When God had delivered the foregoing law unto Moses in the mount, where he was with him (xx. 21) after he had spoken the ten commandments, he bade him go down (as we read here he did, ver. 3) and set them before the people (xxi. 1). And when he had engaged them in a covenant to observe these laws (ver. 7 of this chapter), then to come up to him again; and bring Aaron, and the rest that are here mentioned, with him.

Come up:] To receive further orders from the Divine Majesty; together with the two tables of stone.

Unto the Lord:] To the mount, where the glory of the Lord appeared; and from whence he had spoken the ten words.

Thou, and Aaron, &c.] But not all to the same nearness unto the Divine Majesty, as appears by the following verse.

Seventy of the elders] This seems to intimate, that there were more than seventy called elders: but these were the chief, being perhaps the heads of those families which came into Egypt, which were just seventy (see xviii. 12). For he doth not direct Moses how to choose them (as Corn. Bertram observes, lib. de Repub. Jud. cap. 5), but speaks as if they were well known, and distinguished from other persons, by the rank they held among them. And therefore called (ver. 11) the nobles, or, as the Latin speaks, magistrates, seu optimates, "the great men, of the best quality in Israel." The reason of their being thus called up to God, was, to be witnesses of Moses's ascending up to the place where the Divine Majesty appeared; and that they also might have some sight of it (ver. 10).

Worship ye afar off.] All of them, before they came to the mount, were, at a good distance from it, to fall down prostrate before God, that they might be possessed with such a holy reverence to him, as not to presume to approach nearer than they were ordered.

Ver. 2. Moses alone shall come near the Lord:] Unto the very top of the mount, where the glory of the Lord abode (ver. 16—18), unto which none was admitted but himself. Who now came nearer than he had done before (xx. 21), for he went into the midst of the cloud (ver. 18).

They shall not come nigh:] Unto that part of the mount whither he went; but keep in a lower station.

Unto the Lord:] To the mount, where the glory of the Lord appeared; and from whence he had spoken the ten words.

Thou, and Aaron, &c.] But not all to the same nearness unto the Divine Majesty, as appears by the following verse.

Seventy of the elders] This seems to intimate, that there were more than seventy called elders: but these were the chief, being perhaps the heads of those families which came into Egypt, which were just seventy (see xviii. 12). For he doth not direct Moses how to choose them (as Corn. Bertram observes, lib. de Repub. And therefore called (ver. 11) the nobles, or, as the Latin speaks, magistrates, seu optimates, "the great men, of the best quality in Israel." The reason of their being thus called up to God, was, to be witnesses of Moses's ascending up to the place where the Divine Majesty appeared; and that they also might have some sight of it (ver. 10).

Worship ye afar off.] All of them, before they came to the mount, were, at a good distance from it, to fall down prostrate before God, that they might be possessed with such a holy reverence to him, as not to presume to approach nearer than they were ordered.

Ver. 2. Moses alone shall come near the Lord:] Unto the very top of the mount, where the glory of the Lord abode (ver. 16—18), unto which none was admitted but himself. Who now came nearer than he had done before (xx. 21), for he went into the midst of the cloud (ver. 18).

They shall not come nigh:] Unto that part of the mount whither he went; but keep in a lower station.
said, All the words which the Lord hath said we will do.

4 And Moses wrote all the words of the Lord, and rose up early in the morning, and builded an altar under the hill, and twelve pillars, according to the twelve tribes of Israel.

5 And he sent young men of the children of Israel, which offered burnt offerings, and sacrificed peace offerings of oxen unto the Lord.

6 And Moses took half of the blood, and put it in basons; and half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar.

7 And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient.

8 And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words.
9 ¶ Then went up Moses, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel:

10 And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness.

11 And upon the nobles of the children of Israel he laid not his hand: also they saw God, and did eat and drink.

12 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Come up to me into the mount, and be there: and I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written: that thou mayest teach them.

As it were the body of heaven] As clear as the purest and serenest sky, when it is all spangled with stars. All which signifies, as I take it, that the glory of the Lord appeared far above the splendours of the greatest brightness, upon a pavement sparkling like the stars in the heaven, when it is most clear. The LXX. instead of the words saw the God of Israel, have, saw τὸν θόν, "the place of the God of Israel." As if they saw a throne, upon which there was a visible majesty, beyond all description. And if this be admitted, then this throne may well be said to have feet, made upon a glorious pavement. And so they translate it in the next verse, where this is repeated.

Ver. 11. The nobles] i. e. The elders before mentioned (ver. 1, 9), called here αριθνία, to signify that they were the prime and choiceest persons among the Israelites. For αριθνία signifies to separate; and consequently these imports men distinguished from others, either by their birth, office, or some excellent qualities.

He laid not his hand.] Did not hurt them. Whereas it was the common opinion, that they who saw God (though it was by one of his angels) should presently die. The splendour of that glorious light was so dazzling, that it was a singularly favourable time for seeing it; and they not put out of his eyes till the light wherein St. Paul saw our Saviour did his. We are told (ver. 17), "The sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire." Which might put them in fear, perhaps, they had been scorched by it, when it flashed out upon them; but they found not the least hurt by it. Thus Jonathan saith in his paraphrase upon the thirty- second chapter of Kings, "From the top of the mount did he come down, the people feared him to be burnt up by the fire, which shone from the presence of God, which there appeared."

This sight of God, which he vouchsafed to the elders, was in all likelihood to convince them that he was among them, and had spoken to them, and sent them the precepts before mentioned by the hand of Moses.

They saw God, and did eat and drink.] After they had seen God, they were so far from receiving any harm, that they feasted with him upon the relics of the peace-offerings, with great joy and gladness. Or we may suppose, the glory of the Lord shone upon them, as they sat down to eat and drink, in token of their full consent to the covenant now made (for so the custom was of making covenants, Gen. xxiv. 30, xxxi. 54), and that notwithstanding they continued to finish their feast, not being dispirited (as good men were sometimes afterwards with glorious visions, Dan. x. 8, 16, 17), but rather strengthened and made more vigorous.

The word for saw in this verse is different from that in the former; importing, I suppose, that this appearance of God to them lasted some time.

Ver. 12. The Lord said unto Moses.] He called to him, perhaps, with an audible voice, from the place where they saw his glory; that they might know how familiar he was with God, and might more readily receive whatsoever commands he brought from him.

Come up to me into the mount.] To the top of the mount, where the glory of the Lord was (ver. 17).
13 And Moses rose up, and his minister Joshua: and Moses went up into the mount of God.

14 And he said unto the elders, Tarry ye here for us, until we come again unto you: and, behold, Aaron and Hur are with you: if any man have any matters to do, let him come unto them.

For hitherto Moses had gone no further than the rest; but was with them when they did eat and drink before the Lord.

15 And Moses went up into the mount, and a cloud covered the mount.

16 And the glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days: and the seventh day he called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud.

17 And the sight of the glory of the Lord seems to have walked with them from the mount, before he returned to go up into it; or, at least pointed them unto it with his finger, that they might there wait for him.

Until we come.] He could not tell how long God would detain him; and therefore commands them to govern the people till his return to them.

Aaron and Hur are with you.] Who seem to have been of greatest authority next to himself; and were with him in the mount when the Israelites fought with Amalek (Ex. xvii.).

If any man have any matters to do, let him come unto them.] In all causes, which were too hard for the elders to determine, he directs them to go to Aaron and Hur, as they were wont to do to him. By this it appears, that these seventy elders were some of the judges appointed by the advice of Jethro (Ex. xviii. 25), which he continued to follow, and orders them to observe in his absence.

Ver. 15. Moses went up.] Having said this, he and Joshua left them; and he went into the higher part of the mount.

A cloud covered the mount.] That part of it where he was: so that the people, and Joshua also, lost the sight of him.

Ver. 16. The glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai.] That terrible majesty which shone in extraordinary splendour, was settled for the present upon the top of this mount.

The cloud covered it.] i. e. Covered the glory of the Lord, not the mount, as Aben Ezra observes. For the cloud was not the glory of the Lord, but encompassed and covered it: so that for six days nothing but the cloud appeared to the Israelites: till on the seventh day the cloud was rent (as I take it) or opened; and the glory of the Lord appeared like flaming fire.

Six days.] Thus long it was hidden in a cloud, so that Moses himself could not see it, but remained wrapped up in darkness; which might have astonished him, if he had not been supported by the Divine power, and a comfortable sense of God, who had often appeared to him and conversed familiarly with him.

Seventh day he called unto Moses.] The second time (for he had called to him before to come up to him, ver. 12, commanding him to approach into his glorious presence.

Out of the midst of the cloud.] Where the Divine glory was, and now broke out and appeared, I suppose, unto Moses. Some think the seventh day might be the Sabbath, upon which God chose to appear to him.

Ver. 17. The glory of the Lord was like devouring fire.] It broke out of the cloud, after six days, so that the people saw it like flaming fire. To which the Psalmist seems to allude (Ps. cxviii. 2, 3), "Clouds and darkness are round about him, and fire goeth before him," &c. Thus the glory of the Lord is described in other places, as within a cloud, and sometimes breaking out of it (Exod. x. 20), where the cloud is said to be upon the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord to fill it with; which (ver. 38) is described like fire (see also Numb. xvi. 42). And thus, at its first appearing, there was a pillar of a cloud and of fire led them (xiii. 21). And it sometimes appear-was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel.
18 And Moses went into the midst of the cloud, and gat him up into the mount: and Moses was in the mount forty days and forty nights.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 What the Israelites must offer for the making of the tabernacle.  10 The form of the ark.  11 The mercy seat, with the cherubims.  23 The table, with the furniture thereof.  31 The candlestick, with the instruments thereof.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering: of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Moses.] Out of that glorious and flaming light where he appeared to him.
Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] When he went down from the mount.

That they bring me] In the Hebrew, take for me, out of their goods.

Offering: The Hebrew word terumah (or as some pronounce it, trumah) is commonly translated a heave-offering, or offering lifted up. Which the Chaldee translates, that which is separated from common use: and in the separation, perhaps, was lifted up towards heaven, in token that they desired God to accept it.

Every man that giveth it willingly] They were only to be moved to it, but not importuned; much less told what quantity they should give: but every man whose heart was willing to obey, should give of his substance, to make all things of the tabernacle in an admirable manner.

3 And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass,
4 And blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair,
5 And black and scarlet and purple dyed linen, and goats' hair, and acacia wood, was left to his own good inclination. And accordingly Moses delivered the mind of God unto them, when he came down from the mount; and they made a free oblation (xxxv. 5, 21, 29). Besides which, there was also a tribute laid upon them for the ransom of their souls (xxx. 12—14), which amounted to a great sum of money, as we find in xxxvii. 24, &c.

Ver. 3. This is the offering] The things which ye shall accept as an offering to me.

Gold, and silver, and brass.] Unto what uses these were to be employed we are told afterwards.

Ver. 4. Blue, and purple, and scarlet] Wool, or yarn, or stuff (or, as Abarbinel will have it, silk), of these colours. About which there is much dispute; but no translation hath better described them than our English. For thecel, which we translate blue, and Abarbinel will have it to be a sea-green, is certainly a sky-colour. So Maimonides expresses it, the colour of 5 And rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins, and shittim wood,
6 Oil for the light, spices for anointing oil, and for sweet incense, the firmanent: and Kimchi calls it ultramarine. This hath been demonstrated by Braunius, who shows how it was dyed (lib. i. de Vest. Saccr. Hebr. cap. 13).

Argaman, also, he hath demonstrated (cap. 14), signifies purple, as we translate it. For both Josephus and Philo say so; and he brings many proofs that they say true. And there being several sorts of purple, he shows this had in it the brightest and most floral red, to which he attributes the name of 'argaman,' which also then demonstrates. See also Bochartus, concerning these two words thecele and argaman, in his Hierozoic. (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 10, 11).

Tholau-shanii we also rightly translate scarlet, as the same Braunius shows (cap. 15, of the forenamed book). And very probably makes the word scarlet signify only this part of scarlet, and sheep was vile in comparison with this, which was precious in the eastern countries; where excellent cloth was made of it, not inferior to silk in softness and brightness; as the same Braunius observes (lib. i. de Vestitu Sacr. Hebr. cap. 9).

Ver. 5. Rams' skins dyed red.] Or, red rams' skins; for, as there were in the eastern countries, which were naturally of that colour.

Badgers' skins.] The Hebrew word theeasin, which we translate badgers (following those who think thacese to be the same with the Latin word taurus), the ancient interpreters take for a colour. And Bochartus hath at large endeavoured to prove that it signifies a kind of violet or purple colour. So that God commands them to take red rams' skins (see Hierozoic. par. li. lib. iii. cap. 30).

Shittim wood.] Kimchi saith this was the best kind of cedar; but Aben Ezra takes it for the wood of a tree which grew in the wilderness, not far from Mount Sinai, in that place where the Israelites sometimes encamped (Numb. xxv. 1), called Shittim from this wood; and for the wood of Jerusalem, and from the place where it grew. And thus St. Jerome seems to have understood it. For he saith upon Joel iii. that they were great trees, which were not to be found in the Roman countries, or in cultivated places; but in the desert of Arabia only: out of which very broad boards might be cut, exceeding strong; and of incredible smoothness and beauty. And upon Isa. xl. he calls it lignum imputabilis, "an incorruptible wood"

7 Onyx stones, and stones to be set in the ephod, and in the breastplate.
8 And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them.

(as the LXX. also here translate it, §ερανας), very smooth, excelling all wood in firmness and brightness, &c. (see Menochius, lib. v. de Repub. Hebr. cap. 2).

Ver. 6. Oil for the light.] For that lamp that was to burn continually in the sanctuary.

Sparitae] See xxx. 23, &c. and ver. 34, 35, &c.

Ver. 7. Onyx-stones.] Or sardonyx (see Gen. ii. 12).

Stones to be set in the ephod, and in the breastplate.] There were two onyx-stones to be set in the ephod (xxviii. 9, 10, &c.), and the other stones (whose names are there mentioned, ver. 17, 18, &c.) were to be set in the breast-plate.

These five verses contain all the materials which were to be used about the sanctuary, and the garments of the priests who were to attend there. The only question is, How they got such things in the wilderness! Some think they brought them out of Egypt, as it is evident they did gold, silver, and jewels. And Abarbanel thinks they also trafficked with the neighbouring people while they remained here in the wilderness. As the Shechinah, or spicier, and shittim-wood, &c., which is probable enough, every thing being to be had for money, of which they brought good store from Egypt.

Ver. 8. Let them make me a sanctuary.] Now follow directions for the making a house for God, and every thing belonging to it. For so this place is sometimes called, God's house, or habitation, because there, as Abarbanel observes, the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, had its residence. And it is called a sanctuary, or holy place, because no un circumcised or unclean person might enter into it. For under the name of sanctuary is comprehended, as the Jews rightly understand it, all the courts belonging to it, as well as the very house itself; with all the utensils, or sacred vessels, which are afterward prescribed for the service of it.

That I may dwell among them.] God resolving to manifest himself, as, in a peculiar manner, constantly present among them, was pleased to order a tent or tabernacle to be built for him; wherein, while they sojourned in tents in the wilderness, he dwelt among them in a visible manner, by the Shechinah, or habitation of the Divinity, which was fixed here; and was a special type of God's future dwelling in human nature. In short, this sanctuary was his palace, saith Moses Nachmanides, wherein he dwelt as his king. And accordingly, Schem Tob, upon Maimonides's More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40, pertinently observes, that God ordered all manner of things belonging to a palace to be his palace; particularly, ministers that constantly attend on him; a table with daily provision; all manner of utensils, such as pots, spoons, forks, &c.; a closet proper to himself alone; that the most vulgar understanding might conceive his king, the Lord of Hosts, continually resided there. And, indeed, the Hebrew word mikdash, which we render sanctuary, sometimes signifies a palace (Exek. xxviii. 18), and so Kimchi interprets it upon Isa. viii. 14.

Among them.] In the Hebrew, in the midst of them. For, when it was erected, was placed in the midst of their camps (Numb. ii. 17). Which was the reason that all unclean persons were to be removed out of their camp, lest God, who dwelt in it, should be offended by the pollution (Numb. v. 3).

And this is the reason why God is said to walk among

Ver. 1.—11
9 According to all that I shew thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it. 10 ¶ And they shall make an ark of shittim wood: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof.

11 And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, within and without shalt thou overlay it, and shalt make upon it a crown of gold round about.

Numb. ix. 11, and “the ark of the covenant of the Lord” (Numb. x. 33).

Of shittim wood.] See ver. 5.

Two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, &c.] In this shape, and in these dimensions, it was set before the Most High, with the other parts of his temple. The ark was made exactly of such an oblong square (as we speak) as is here described, in its length, breadth, and height. There are great disputes among the Jews about a cubit, which is commonly thought to be half a yard of our measure, that is, eighteen inches. But one that hath taken a great deal of pains to examine such things (Dr. Cumberland, now bishop of Peterborough), he says, that as he hath found the most reason to believe the Scripture Measures, given strong reasons to incline us to think that the Egyptian and the Jewish cubit was about twenty-one inches. And if they had not been so, the table (which is described ver. 23) would have been inconvenient, being but three-quarters of a yard high, i.e. twenty-seven inches (according to the common notion of a cubit), which is too low for a table. Whereas, according to his account, it was about thirty-two inches, which is a very convenient height, for a table [see ch. ii.]

Ver. 11. Overlay it with pure gold.] Not merely gild it, but lay it over with thin plates of gold; for if they had been thick, it would, as Abarbinel notes, have been too heavy to be carried, as it was now sometimes plated with iron in some parts of them. [Within and without] So that nothing but gold could be seen, whether it were shut or open.

Make upon it a crown of gold.] A border or list of gold went round at the top of it; which was called a crown, because it compassed every part of it: but was of another figure, not round, but square, as the ark was. It therefore was a very great ornament for the better settling the propitiatory upon the ark, that it might not slip off, but be kept up firmly by this border going round about the top of the ark. And it might the better be called a crown, because it was of some height, for the surer supporting of the propitiatory.

It may not be improper here to observe, that, as the ancient crowns were only a plain circle of gold, or other thing, so they were set upon the heads of none but their gods, as Pliny tells us (lib. xvi. cap. 4), who says there, that Bacchus was the first that put a crown upon his head, which was made of ivory. Certain it is, that God requires those things which were peculiarly ordered to represent his service to be made with the utmost of their excellency: which were four only: this crown upon the ark, and that upon the golden table (ver. 24 of this chapter), and upon the altar of incense (xxx. 3) and on the head of the high-priest (xxix. 6).

Ver. 12. Cast four rings of gold for it.] Which were of massy gold, we must suppose, because the ark was carried by staves put into these rings. Put them in the four corners.] The Hebrew word pameath comes from pamon, which never signifies a corner in the Holy Scripture; but always a foot, or basis, or step, as Aben Ezra notes. Which hath made some think the ark had feet to stand upon (such round knobs as now our chests and boxes many times have), though the Scripture doth not mention them. But we are not to make conjectures out of our own heads;
CHAPTER XXV.

13 And thou shalt make staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold.

14 And thou shalt put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, that the ark may be borne with them.

15 The staves shall be in the rings of the ark: they shall not be taken from it.

16 And thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee.

17 And thou shalt make a mercy seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof.

18 And thou shalt make two cherubims of nothing in this matter. And shall only further observe, that this direction, for putting the testimony (or tables of stone) into the ark, is given before any order is taken for making a covering to it, which follows after. And therefore he was to put in the law before the cover was set on. For though (ver. 21) this he mentioned again, and put after the cover is named, yet the meaning is, that he should set on the cover, having put in the law. And it is repeated, that he should be very careful of this, because the cherubims were to protect and defend it.

Ver. 17. Make a mercy seat] The Hebrew word capporte, not from copar, to cover, but from ciper, to espicate, and render propitious. And so, indeed, the apostle calls it διακρίσις, "the propitiatory," because God here showed himself to be propitious, and appeased by the blood of the sacrifices, which was sprinkled before this place. But the reason of this translation may be, because when sins are pardoned in Scripture to be covered. The LXX. put both these together in their translation, which is διακρίσις πέραν.

Of pure gold.] Not of wood crusted over with gold, but all (as Abarbanel speaks) of solid gold; because it was the cover of the ark, in which were the tables of the covenant written with God's finger, than which nothing was more precious. "Two cubits and a half shall be the length"

Which was the length of the ark (ver. 10), as the breadth was a cubit and a half, both of that and this: which shows this was the cover of the ark, being most exactly adapted to it.

Ver. 18. Make two cherubims of gold.] We read of cherubims in the beginning of the world; and have good reason to believe thereby is meant angels (as Gen. iii. 24). But in what shape they appeared we are not told; nor is there the least signification of it here in this place, but what we can gather from ver. 20: so that I can only say this, they were of such a shape as the angelical ministers appeared in, which attended upon the Divine Majesty in the mount; or rather, such as God showed Moses a pattern of, whereby to represent these heavenly ministers. For both the ark and all belonging to it were made according to the model God gave him; not from any Egyptian pattern, as some imagine. Bochart seems to me to speak judiciously, when he saith there were not figures of angels, but rather emblems, whereby the angelical nature was in some sort expressed (Hierozol. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 20). And were therefore ordered to be made, as Maimonides conjectures, that the Jews might be confirmed in the belief of the existence of angels, which is the second article of their faith, next to the belief of God. And he commanded two to be made; because, if there had been but one, it might have led them into a dangerous error, that this was the figure of God, whereby they might have been inwhich some have carried so far as to fancy there were wheels in these feet, for the ark to run upon, which made it God's chariot, wherein he rode. But whoever heard of a chariot carried on men's shoulders! Therefore Nachmanides more reasonably conceives, that the phrase of the bearers of the ark, but not in the higher (as R. Solomon would have them), but in the lower, and therefore said here to be in the feet. For the Scripture calling the top of every thing the head of it: the bottom is commonly there called the feet: and so the ark (by placing the rings and staves in the bottom) was carried on high upon the priests' shoulders, representing God, who is highly exalted.

Two rings shall be in the one side of it, and two rings in the other. That is, in the length of it (as Josephus expressly testifies) and not in the breadth.

Ver. 13. Make staves of shittim wood.] Of such a length that the ark might be at a decent distance from those that carried it.

Overlay them with gold.] With plates of gold, as the ark itself was (ver. 11).

Ver. 14. Put the staves into the rings.] The Hebrews say these staves were ten cubits long.

That the ark may be borne with them.] Upon the shoulders of the Levites, particularly the sons of Korah (see Num. iv. 4—6, &c., vili. 9). For it was a crime to carry it any other way, either in their hands, or drawn in a cart (compare 1 Chron. xiii. 7; with xv. 15).

Ver. 15. The staves shall be in the rings.] Continue and remain in the rings, when they were once put therein.

They shall not be taken from it.] When they set down the ark they were not to take out the staves, and put them in again when it was to be carried; but let them, as we said, continue in the rings; that there might be no danger of letting them fall (which had been a great irreverence), and because they would be best preserved, and take less harm there than anywhere else; and if they had occasion to remove the ark suddenly, all would be ready; and the Levites were hereby kept from touching the ark, or coming nearer to it than the ends of the staves.

Ver. 16. Put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee.] The two tables of stone, containing the ten commandments, which are called the testimony, and the two tables of testimony (xxxii. 18), because they testified what the will of God was, which they had consented to observe; and were therefore public, public instruments, attesting the covenant between God and them. Whence the ark which contained these is called the ark of the testimony (as I observed above, ver. 10), ver. 22, and in a great many other places in the fourteenth chapter. And in one place it is called the testimony (xxx. 36), and the ark of the covenant of the Lord (Deut. x. 8), because the ten words were the principal part of the covenant, to which they stood obliged. And perhaps the book of the covenant which Moses made with them (xxiv. 7) is comprehended under the name of the testimony. For though we read in 1 Kings viii. 9, there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone, &c., yet the apostle mentions some other things that were not in, yet by or before the ark (Heb. ix. 4). But I assert gold, of beaten work shalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy seat.

19 And make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end: even of the mercy seat shall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof.

20 And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy seat shall the faces of the cherubims be.

clinged to worship it. But there being two of them ordered, with this declaration, the Lord our God is one God, it led them into right thoughts, that God had many of these angelical ministers. Thus he: More Nevech, par. iii. cap. 45.

Of beaten work shalt thou make them.] The Hebrew word miksheh, which we translate beaten work, signifies that both of them should be made out of the same piece of gold that made the cover of the ark; so as to be one continued work with that, not separate from it. This appears to be true from the next verse. min hacceporre; "out of the mercy-seat shall ye make the cherubims," &c., or, from the mercy-seat shall they proceed, on the two ends of it.

Ver. 19. Make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end.] This looks like terminology (as is said) and is expressed in the foregoing words, in the two ends of the mercy-seat; but it is far from it; being a declaration (as he takes it) that the cherubims should not be placed both on one side of the ark; nor so as not to be opposite one to the other: but one on one side, and the other on the other side.

Even of the mercy seat shall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof: which were properly two, out of the mercy-seat, and afterwards joined to it, but to be made out of it, so as to be one piece with it (as was said, ver. 18), which in the execution of this command appears very plainly (xxxvii. 8).

Ver. 20. The cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high.] This shows they were made like flying creatures; but had not the resemblance of any fowl; that is, they were not made of fowl, &c. but like bring their wings,

Ver. 21 And thou shalt put the mercy seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee.

22 And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel.

23 ¶ Thou shalt also make a table of shittim wood: two cubits shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof.

24 And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, and make thereto a crown of gold round about.

25 And thou shalt make unto it a border of an hand breadth round about, and thou shalt make a golden crown to the border thereof round about.

26 And thou shalt make for it four rings of gold, and put the rings in the four corners that are on the four feet thereof.

27 Over against the border shall the rings be for places of the staves to bear the table.

28 And thou shalt make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold, that the table may be borne with them.

29 And thou shalt make the dishes thereof, and spoons thereof, and covers thereof, and bowls

Ver. 29. Make the dishes thereof.] It is not easy to give an account either of the form or of the use of these keharoth, which we translate dishes, i.e. patins, whereon to put the bread, which were twelve loaves (Lev. xxiv. 6), and the frankincense which was to be set upon each row of loaves (ver. 7). This is a plain sense, if the loaves stood upon dishes, and not immediately upon the table, as Fortunatus Scaccæus thinks they did: and therefore imagines they were full of fine flour, of which the bread was made; or with oil which was to be mingled and used in their sacrifices. But this is more unlikely than the other, the flour not being kept here in the holy place, but in the outward court; and being made for it in this place.

Make thereto a crown of gold See ver. 10, where the same is directed for the ark: and this had the same use, to keep what was set upon the table from sliding off and falling to the ground.

Ver. 25. Make for it four rings of gold.] That is to the crown of gold, as Fortunatus Scaccæus understands it, though others refer it to the table.

A border of an hand breadth,] Which came down below the crown or cornice, as they now speak. Though some think this border was towards the bottom, to join the feet more firmly together. Make a golden crown to the border] Wheresoever this border was (which I suppose was plated with gold), like the table, it had a crown, or a cornice, as an ornament to it. For this crown was different from that mentioned in the foregoing verse; and was under the border (as the other crown was above it), as Fortunatus Scaccæus apprehends it (Myrothec. ii. cap. 38). Make for it four rings of gold.] As there were for the ark (ver. 12), only they were to be cast, these to be made: but how we are not told.

Put the rings in the four corners The Hebrew word here for corners always hath that signification; being quite different from that word which is used ver. 12, when he speaks of the ark: which may well incline us to Josephus's opinion, that these rings were not needed there, for the table being carried on the shoulders of the priests.

Ver. 27. Over against the border, &c.] Just below the border and the cornice before mentioned (ver. 25), were these rings to be placed; as the border and its cornice were placed below the upper crown (or cornice) which compassed the top of the table (ver. 24).

For places of the staves to bear the table.] This expresses the use of the rings.

Ver. 28. Make the staves of shittim wood.] Such as were made for the carriage of the ark (ver. 13). That a table may be borne with them.] By the priests upon their shoulders. For the tabernacle being a movable house, there were frequent occasions, as they journeyed from one place to another, to carry this table along with them, as they did all other things belonging to the house of God.

It is not ordered that the staves should remain in the rings, as they did in those belonging to the ark (ver. 15), because they might have been a hindrance to the priests in their ministration at this table every day. Therefore it is likely they were laid up in some place near it, and put in when they travelled, as they were ordered to be (Numb. iv. 6).

CHAPTER XXV.

and gold, and put the rings in the four corners that are on the four feet thereof.

27 Over against the border shall the rings be for places of the staves to bear the table.

28 And thou shalt make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold, that the table may be borne with them.

29 And thou shalt make the dishes thereof, and spoons thereof, and covers thereof, and bowls thereof, to cover withal: of pure gold shalt thou make them.

30 And thou shalt set upon the table shewbread before me alway.

beginning of these directions God had declared he would have a house built that he might dwell among them (ver. 8), which dwelling among them was admirably represented, by its having in all things belonging to a dwelling-house, particularly a table and bread (signifying all provision), whereby they were made to understand that God, as was said before, kept house among them. Which nobody hath explained so well as an incomparable writer of our own, Dr. Cadworth, in a discourse put out long ago, concerning the Right Notion of the Lord's Supper, vii. where he observes, out of Nachman, that there was a table and candlestick ordered for this house, because they were the ordinary furniture of a room. For which reason the table had its dishes, spoons, bowls, and covers (though they were never used), and was always furnished with bread upon it; as the candlestick also had lamps continually burning. From hence it was, likewise, that there was a continual fire in this dwelling of God upon his altar. And, to carry on the notion thoroughly, constant meat and provision brought to it by the sacrifices there offered. Which were partly consumed by fire upon God's own altar; and partly eaten by the priests, who were God's domestic servants, and therefore to be maintained by him. For this reason it was, that besides the flesh of the beast offered up in sacrifice, there was a mincha or meat-offering, made of flour and oil; together with a drink-offering which were ever joined with the daily burnt-sacrifice, being the bread and the drink which were to go along with God's meat. So the sacrifices are called in the first of Malachi. It was also strictly commanded, as we read in Lev. 24.1, that salt should make up in the furniture of all, to preserve the whole from dampness; because it was not fit, as the same Nachman observes, that God's meat should be unsavoury. And all these were to be consumed on the altar only, by the holy fire which came down from heaven, because they were God's portion, and therefore to be consumed by himself in an extraordinary manner.

There are also several places in the Jewish law, which describe this bread set on God's table as an acknowledgment that they received their food from God. And we may add, that this bread, being made of the same corn which they ate of themselves, still farther represented to them, that they were God's comites: who continually entertained them with that provision which was made for him.

Ver. 31. Make a candlestick of pure gold. Another necessary piece of furniture for a house; especially when there were no windows in it.

Of beaten work. Not hollow, but of solid gold.

His shaft. The main body or trunk of it.

Branches. Which shot as it were out of the trunk.

Bowls. Or cups, for so the word gebeha is translated, Gen. xiv. 1, 5, and they were in the fashion of an almond, as it is ordered (ver. 33).

Knops. Round like an apple or pomegranate; as the word cophetha烤 signs.

Flowers. The Vulgar translates it lilias, but the word properly signifies the blossoms of any tree, or any thing having in it flowers. Shall be of the same. All of gold, though not all of one piece: for, as Fort. Scacchus not unreasonably conjectures, these several parts of the candlestick were separable one from another, when there was occasion to remove it from one place to another (see his Myrothec. Sacr. Eiceochrasym. cap. 46).
32 And six branches shall come out of the sides of it; three branches of the candlestick out of the one side, and three branches of the candlestick out of the other side:
33 Three bowls made like unto almonds, with a knop and a flower in one branch; and three bowls made like almonds in the other branch, with a knop and a flower: so in the six branches that come out of the candlestick.
34 And in the candlestick shall be four bowls made like unto almonds, with their knops and their flowers.
35 And there shall be a knop under two branches of the same, and a knop under two branches of the same, and a knop under two branches of the same, according to the six branches that proceed out of the candlestick.
36 Their knops and their branches shall be of the same: all of it shall be one beaten work of pure gold.
37 And thou shalt make the seven lamps thereof: and they shall light the lamps thereof, that they may give light over against it.
38 And the tongs thereof, and the snuff-dishes thereof, shall be of pure gold.
39 Of a talent of pure gold shall he make it, with all these vessels.
40 And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was shewed thee in the mount.

Ver. 32.] In this and the following verses he describes how all the above-named parts should be disposed so as to make the candlestick appear glorious. And first he here directs that three branches so well come out of each side of the main trunk or shaft.
Ver. 33.] Next he orders that every branch of the six should have three bowls (or cups, as I said before), into which, perhaps, the snuff was to fall: and between every one of them a knop and a flower. And the cups were to be of the figure of an almond.

So in the six branches] Which were to be all alike. That came out of the candlestick.] i. e. Out of the trunk: which is here and in the next verse called the candlestick: because it was the main part of it, which supported all the branches.
Ver. 34. In the candlestick] i. e. In the main trunk or shaft, out of which the branches proceeded. Shall be four bowls] The branches were to have but three bowls and as many knops and flowers; but the shaft or trunk was to have four of each: it being longer than the branches that came out of it.
Ver. 35. There shall be a knop, &c.] This being repeated twice, signifies that the knops should be so contrived, that out of three of them should arise two branches, one on the one side, and one on the other. So that out of the fourth knop, which I suppose was the lowermost, there was no branch at all; but that, with the cup and flower, were the ornament of that part of the shaft which was under the branches.

That proceed out of the candlestick.] i. e. Out of the shaft or main trunk (ver. 34).
Ver. 36. Their knops and their branches shall be of the same, &c.] No difference between them; but all solid, not hollow work, of pure gold.

Here is nothing said of the foot of it; which was, no question, proportionable to the rest. Nor doth he mention the length of the start or trunk: but Fortunatus Scaccus adventures to guess that it was near double the height of the table, and of the altar of incense, which made it look majestically; and yet did not raise it so much as to dammitify the root of the tabernacle (Myrothec. ii. cap. 45, p. 439).

Ver. 37. Make the seven lamps thereof:] i. e. Cause them to be made. But of what metal it is not said; most likely of gold, as well as the tongs, and the other things mentioned, ver. 38. The form is not here prescribed, which the forenamed Scaccus (Myrothec. i. cap. 7) thinks was like an almond.

They shall light the lamps] They whose work it is, viz., the priests (xxx. 7, 8; Lev. xxiv. 3, 4), That they may give light over against it.] That is, over against the candlestick (as some will have it), the six branches all inclining to the trunk in the middle. But here he speaks of the seven lamps, not of six only, which gave light over against some other thing, which I take to be the table. For it is plain, by xxvi. 35, and xl. 34, that the candlestick was placed over against the table, being on the south side of the house, as the table was on the north (see Numb. viii. 2).

Ver. 38. And the tongs] Or snuffers, belonging to it: which Scaccus (both in his first and second Myrothecium) probably proves were not of such a form as are now in use; but were only little tongs or scissors, whereby the lamps were elipted to make them shine more brightly (Myrothec. i. cap. 10, and ii. cap. 46, p. 455).
Snuff-dishes] In which the snuffers and the sniffings of the lamps were put; and for the latter use he thinks they had water in them.

Shall be of pure gold.] It was most for the magnificence of this house, and becoming the Divine Majesty who dwelt there, that the meanest thing therein should be made of pure gold.

Ver. 39. Talent] A talent was three thousand shekels, as will appear afterwards; but how much it makes of our money, see xxxvii. 35.
Ver. 40. Look that thou make them after their pattern.] Take care to preserve that pattern which I have already given (ver. 9), and now repeat again; that every one of these things be made according to that model which I set before thee. For God would have nothing left to the fancy of the people, whom he knew were too much inclined to the gentle superstition. And if Moses had not been determined by Divine prescription, they would have been apt in all these things to have interposed their own inventions.

Which was shewed thee in the mount.] By this it still plainly appears, that Moses saw not only the house, but all the furniture belonging to it, set up in the mount before him, just as he afterwards set it up below among the people.
CHAPTER XXVI.

1 The ten curtains of the tabernacle. 7 The eleven curtains of goats' hair. 14 The covering of ram's skins. 15 The boards of the tabernacle, with their sockets and bars. 31 The veil for the ark. 36 The hanging for the door.

1 Moreover thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubims of cunning work shalt thou make them.

2 The length of one curtain shall be eight and twenty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: and every one of the curtains shall have one measure.

3 The five curtains shall be coupled together, one to another; and other five curtains shall be coupled one to another.

4 And thou shalt make loops of blue upon the edge of the one curtain from the selvedge in the coupling; and likewise shalt thou make in the uttermost edge of another curtain, in the coupling of the second.

5 Fifty loops shalt thou make in the one curtain, and fifty loops shalt thou make in the edge of the curtain that is in the coupling of the second; that the loops may take hold one of another.

6 And thou shalt make fifty taches of gold, and couple the curtains together with the taches: and it shall be one tabernacle.

7 ¶ And thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair to be a covering upon the tabernacle: eleven curtains shalt thou make.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1.] From the furniture he proceeds to the house; and first orders him how to make the inward parts of it.

Thou shalt make the tabernacle] The Hebrew word mishkan properly signifies a place to dwell in; a habitation (according to what was said xxv. 8). For this was the place of the Shechinah (which comes from the same root with mishken), which dwelt here as in its house. But it is commonly translated a tabernacle, only with a wanting of telling it was a portable house, as Philo calls it, σπείρα ἑσθον: which might be taken down, and removed from one place to another, and set up again, without any damage to it.

With ten curtains] These were so many pieces of tapestry (as we now call them), with which this tent was hung on the sides, and covered at the top.

Of fine twined linen] Concerning fine linen, see xxv. 4, and concerning twined linen, see xxviii. 6.

Blue, and purple, and scarlet] i.e. Yarn dyed of these colours (see xxv. 4).

With cherubims] It is uncertain what figure these were of (see xxv. 18).

Of cunning work shalt thou make them] There were two sorts of work more artificial than ordinary: the one called choshesh (which is here mentioned), the other rokehem, which we translate needlework. The former was the most excellent; for it was done by weaving, and had figures on both sides: whereas that by needlework had only on one side, as Jarchi here notes. Who says there was, suppose the figure of a lion on one side, and of an eagle on the other: or rather, he should have said, the same figure appeared on both sides, as Maimonides seems to take it, in his Kele Hamminkdah, cap. 8. "Wheresoever any work is called rokehem in Scripture, it is to be understood of figures which are made only on one side of the web: but the work called choshesh had figures on both sides, before and behind" (see xxviii. 30).

Ver. 2. The length of one curtain shall be eight and twenty cubits. ¶ Every one of these curtains were fourteen yards long, and two yards broad; for a cubit was half a yard of our measure, according to common estimation. It was some inches more, as I have observed on xxv. 10. But to make the reader more easily comprehend it, I shall not exactly compare the length and breadth of these curtains, but follow the vulgar opinion. And with these, it will appear afterward, both the roof of the tabernacle was covered, and the sides of it likewise, almost down to the ground, that is, within a cubit of it, as Josephus saith, and as may be made out from the text; the tabernacle (according to the common notion of a cubit) being fifteen yards long, five yards broad, and as many yards high.

One measure] Be exactly of the same length and breadth.

Ver. 3. The five curtains shall be coupled together, one to another; and other five curtains—one to another] Being thus woven together, of ten curtains (each of which, as was said before, was fourteen yards long, and two yards broad) was made two large pieces of tapestry: each of them fourteen yards long, and ten yards broad. With one of these pieces of tapestry the holy place was covered, it being just so many yards broad as that place was long; so that it did not come down before at the east end, which was the entrance of the sanctuary. The other piece of tapestry covered the holy of holies: which being but five yards long, one-half of this piece hung down behind it at the west end and touched the silver bases.

Ver. 4. Make loops of blue upon the edge of the one curtain, &c.] These two great curtains being made by sewing five lesser together, the loops were not woven with the curtains, but tacked to the selvage of the outermost of them; and were made of blue tape.

In the coupling] In that part of the great curtains where they were to be coupled together.

Ver. 5. Fifty loops, &c.] Each of those great pieces of tapestry had fifty loops, answering one to another so exactly, that they might take hold one of another.

Ver. 6. Make fifty taches of gold.] By these golden clasps the loops were so linked together, that the two great pieces of tapestry made but one covering. Which is the meaning of the following words.

It shall be one tabernacle.] By this union the covering of the tabernacle shall be as if it were one entire piece.

Ver. 7.] Now he gives directions about the outward part of the house.

Curtains of goats' hair] Though a soft kind of cloth was made of goats' hair, yet, in comparison with the other, it was a coarser sort of covering, to be laid over the finer before mentioned, for their preservation and shelter from the weather. The old Arabians, called Solinus, made their tents of goats' hair: for Solinus calls them Clilcina, which he interprets ca-
8. The length of one curtain shall be thirty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: and the eleven curtains shall be all of one measure.

9. And thou shalt couple five curtains by themselves, and six curtains by themselves, and shalt double the sixth curtain in the forefront of the tabernacle.

10. And thou shalt make fifty loops on the edge of the one curtain that is outmost in the coupling, and fifty loops in the edge of the curtain which coupleth the second.

11. And thou shalt make fifty taches of brass, and put the taches into the loops, and couple the tent together, that it may be one.

12. And the remnant that remaineth of the cur-praram pilis texta. Concerning the word we translate goats’ hair, see xxv. 4.

To be a covering upon the tabernacle. By tabernacle in the foregoing words (ver. 6), seems to be meant the covering of the tabernacle, which was of one entire piece. And so it is to be understood here, where a second covering is ordered to be thrown over the first.

Eleven curtains. There was one more of these canopy curtains (as I may call them) than of the tapestry, which were but ten.

Ver. 8. The length of one curtain shall be thirty cubits.

As there was one curtain more of these, so they were one yard longer than the former.

The breadth of one curtain of four cubits. This was the breadth of the former, ver. 2 (where see what a cubit was), but there being one curtain more of these than of the other, they were two yards broader than them when they were all joined together. Insomuch, that they both came down lower than the other, on either side, half a yard; and also hung down a yard before the entrance of the tabernacle, which the former did not cover at all.

Ver. 9. They were to be coupled together after the same manner as the former, that they might make two large pieces: but there being eleven curtains in all, there were but five in one piece and six in the other.

Double the sixth curtain. The meaning seems to be, that he should turn up that part of the curtain which hung down at the bottom of the tabernacle.

Ver. 10. Make fifty loops. This may be sufficiently understood by what was said concerning the loops of the other covering, ver. 4, 5.

Ver. 11. Make fifty taches of brass. The two great pieces of the inner hangings, being the richer, were coupled together with clasps of gold (ver. 6), but these, being coarser, only with clasps of brass. Which did not lie directly over the golden, but, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, were three-quarters of a yard more westward; these two large pieces not being of an equal bigness.

Couple the tent together. I. e. These outward hangings or coverings (as we translate the word oheil, ver. 7), of the tent.

First, it may be one. That the two pieces may be knit together, by the loops and clasps, into one. See ver. 6, where this place is there called mishkan (dwelling), which is here called oheil; to show more clearly what kind of dwelling it was; an ambulatory house, such as shepherds have, which they remove from place to place (Gen. iv. 20).

Ver. 12. These outward curtains being four cubits, that is, two yards and more broader than the inward, they hung down above a yard lower than the other on tains of the tent, the half curtain that remaineth, shall hang over the backside of the tabernacle.

13. And a cubit on the one side, and a cubit on the other side of that which remaineth in the length of the curtains of the tent, it shall hang over the sides of the tabernacle on this side and on that side, to cover it.

14. And thou shalt make a covering for the tent of rams’ skins dyed red, and a covering above of badgers’ skins.

15. ¶ And thou shalt make boards for the tabernacle of shittim wood standing up.

16. Ten cubits shall be the length of a board, and a cubit and a half shall be the breadth of one board.

17. Two tenons shall there be in one board, the back-side (or west part) of the tabernacle, as they did on the front or entrance (I observed before, ver. 8), which was on the east.

Ver. 13.] These outward curtains being a yard (as two cubits are commonly esteemed) longer than the inward, as appears from ver. 8, they hung down therefore, on either side a cubit, that is, half a yard lower than the inward did. And yet they did not come quite to the ground, but the foundation of the tabernacle, which was of silver, might be seen round about, save only at the west end.

Ver. 14. Make a covering for the tent of rams’ skins dyed red. This was a third covering to be laid over the other two, to keep them from wet. It is not said of what dimensions it was, which hath made some fancy it covered only the roof. But it is far more reasonable to think that it was as large as the foregoing covering of goats’ hair; which might have been spoiled by rain and dust, if the sides had not been defended as well as the roof. Concerning these rams’ skins, see xxv. 5.

A covering above. That is, a fourth covering above that of rams’ skins, for the greater security of the two immost hangings; which had need of all this defence, especially on the roof; because it was flat, and consequently the rain was more likely to soak into it.

Badgers’ skins. I observed on xxv. 5, that all the ancient interpreters take thachas for a colour, and not for a badger, or any other animal. For which there is this consideration, that Bochartus I think did not there mention; that when God sets forth his extraordinary kindness to Israel, as his beloved spouse, and shows in many magnificent expressions how richly he adorned her, he saith, among other things, that he shod her with thachas, which we translate badgers’ skins: of which the meanest people never made any use for shoes: and therefore Bochartus rightly concludes it signifies something of greater value, viz., rams skins dyed of a kind of purple colour.

Ver. 15. Make boards. Or planks, which were the walls of the house.

Of shittim wood. See xxv. 5.

Standing up. Erect upon one end, and not lying sideways.

Ver. 16. Ten cubits. By this it appears the house (according the vulgar opinion of a cubit) was but five yards in height (see ver. 18).

A cubit and a half shall be the breadth of one board. Three-quarters broad; by which (compared with ver. 18), it will appear how long the house was.

Ver. 17. Two tenons shall there be in one board, &c. The Hebrews call them hands; because they were so made as to take fast hold of the sockets mentioned, ver. 19.
set in order one against another: thus shalt thou make for all the boards of the tabernacle.
18 And thou shalt make the boards for the tabernacle, twenty boards on the south side southward.
19 And thou shalt make forty sockets of silver under the twenty boards; two sockets under one board for his two tenons, and two sockets under another board for his two tenons.
20 And for the second side of the tabernacle on the north side there shall be twenty boards:
21 And their sockets of silver; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board.
22 And for the sides of the tabernacle westward thou shalt make six boards.
23 And two boards shalt thou make for the corners of the tabernacle in the two sides.

24 And they shall be coupled together beneath, and they shall be coupled together above the head of it unto one ring: thus shalt it be for them both; they shall be for the two corners.
25 And they shall be eight boards, and their sockets of silver, sixteen sockets; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board.
26 ¶ And thou shalt make bars of shittim wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle, 27 And five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the side of the tabernacle, for the two sides westward.
28 And the middle bar in the midst of the boards shall reach from end to end.
29 And thou shalt overlay the boards with gold, and make their rings of gold for places for the bars: and thou shalt overlay the bars with gold.

30 And thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was shewed thee in the mount.

31 ¶ And thou shalt make a vail of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen of cunning work: with cherubims shall it be made:

32 And thou shalt hang it upon four pillars of shittim wood overlaid with gold: their hooks shall be of gold, upon the four sockets of silver.

33 ¶ And thou shalt hang up the vail under went; which were also either overlaid with plates of gold, or gilded.

Ver. 30.] When all these materials were prepared, then he is here commanded to set it up, according to the model which was shown him now in the mount (see xxv. 40).]

Ver. 31. Concerning these colours, see xxx. 5, and of fine linen, xxv. 4, of twined linen, xxviii. 6.

Cunning work.] R. Solomon here repeats what he said before on ver. 1, that the work called choshēh was so artificial, that it had not only figures on both sides, but those different one from the other: for example, on one side a lion, on the other an eagle. Josephus saith, all sorts of flowers, and other ornaments, were wrought in this veil, except only the figures of animals.

With cherubims shall it be made.] See xxv. 18. This veil seems to have been of the same work with the rest of the inward hangings of the tabernacle, mentioned ver. 1, unless we suppose that in them the cherubims only were of cunning work. But I take the whole work of this veil to have been of that sort; the cherubims being in the midst of all sorts of flowers and other pictures.

The Hebrew word paroketh, which we translate veil, coming from perek, which signifies hardness and rigour (Exod. 1. 13, 14), it hath made some conclude, that this veil was of a great thickness (the Hebrews say four fingers), which makes it the more wonderful that it was torn in sunder at our Saviour’s passion. Certain it is, that it was so thick that none could look through it into the holy of holies.

Ver. 32. Hang it upon four pillars of shittim wood overlaid with gold.] This is a sign that it was thick and heavy, there being four pillars to support it, which stood at an equal distance one from another. Of shittim-wood, see xxx. 5. It is uncertain whether the pillars were plated over with gold, or only gilt. Their hooks shall be of gold.] Some will have the word wārēkhem to signify the heads of the pillars; for so the LXX. call them χωρίοις. But it literally signifies hooks (as we translate it), in the form of the letter san, which were on the top of the pillars, upon which the veil was hung; as appears from the next verse.

Upon—sockets of silver.] As the tops of the pillars were of gold, so they stood upon pedestals of silver.

Ver. 33. Hang up the veil under the taches.] The golden clasps that knit together the two great pieces of hangings (ver. 0), were just between the holy and the most holy place, so that the veil, which separated these two, hung exactly under these clasps.

Bring in thither within the veil the ark of the testimony.] A separate place being made by this veil, the ark was to be brought into it (see xxv. 16—22), and set at the west end of it.

The vail shall divide unto you between the holy place and the most holy.] It made a partition of the tabernacle into two parts; one of which was the holy place, into which none but the priests might enter; and the other the most holy, into which none but the high-priest might enter, and that but once in the year. The most holy place was but a third part of the tabernacle: being a perfect square, five yards high, and as many long and broad; according to the common opinion concerning a cubit.

Ver. 34. Put the mercy seat.] See xxv. 17. Upon the ark of the testimony in the most holy place.] This being the most precious testimonial of God’s presence with them, was put in the holy secret place of God’s house. Just as the palladium, or whatsoever other sacred thing it was of which the Vestal virgins were the conservators (for Diodorus Siculus saith he could not certainly tell, nor did he think it became a religious man to inquire into that which was intended to be a secret) was kept in the inmost part of the temple of Vesta, which was called Penus, as we are told by Festus; who saith, "Penus vocabatur, locus ultimus in ade Vesta, tegetibus, septus, &c." Into this place none but the Vestal virgins and the Pontifex Maximus might go; as Lipsius observes in his Synopsis de Vesta et Vestalibus, cap. 4.

Ver. 35.] This verse only directs how the table and the candlestick (which were ordered to be made, xxv. 23, 31) should be set in the holy place, without the veil; one of them on the south side, and the other on the north side over against it. But whether in the middle of the holy place, or more towards the upper end, is not said.

Ver. 36.] Now directions are given about the entrance of the tabernacle; before which he orders a curtain to be hung. Which may be called the first veil, with respect to that before mentioned (ver. 31) which the apostle calls the second (Heb. ix. 3).

Of blue, and purple.] Concerning these colours, see xxv. 5, and concerning fine twined linen, xxviii. 6.

Wrought with needlework.] This was not such envious work as that which we translate cunning work (ver. 31), which was in the other veil, before the most holy place (see xxxviii. 39).

Besides this, Josephus saith there was another veil of linen to defend it from the injury of the weather; which was wont to be drawn aside upon festivals, that the people might see the beauty of this first veil. And indeed it is very probable, that some curtain or other was, in bad weather, at least, hung before it to secure it; as the covering of skins was over the hangings of the tabernacle.

Ver. 37. Make for the hanging five pillars.] These pillars seem to have been disposed in this manner: two of them were placed at each corner, which, if they took up a cubit, then the other three being placed at 37 And thou shalt make for the hanging five pillars of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold, and their hooks shall be of gold: and thou shalt cast five sockets of brass for them.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 And thou shalt make an altar of shittim wood, five cubits long, and five cubits broad; the altar shall be foursquare: and the height thereof shall be three cubits.

Ver. 1. Make an altar.] Of burnt-offering, as it is explained xxviii. 1. And the Hebrew word mezbeach, properly signifies that upon which sacrifices were slain and offered.

Of shittim wood.] What sort of wood this was, see xxv. 5.

Five cubits long, and five cubits broad.] It was two yards and a half square (according to the common notion of a cubit) at the top and bottom of it.

The height thereof shall be three cubits.] Being a yard and a half in height from the ground, the priest (as Fortunatus Sceachus observes) who ministered at it was half a yard above it; the common stature of a man being four cubits, i.e. two yards (Myroth. Sacer. Elavo. ii. cap. 65). It is not so said thick the wood was of which this frame (as I may call it) was made; but it is certain that it was hollow within, that the grate mentioned ver. 4 might hang in the midst of it.

Ver. 2. Make the horns of it upon the four corners] The Hebrew word kerem, which properly signifies a horn, signifies also an eminent or high place; as in Isa. vi. 1, God saith he hath planted a vineyard in a fruitful hill; where the words in the Hebrew are, in a horn of the son of oil. From whence it signifies a pinnacle, or spire rising up from any building, as these horns did from the altar, for the ornament of it. Some will have it that they were useful also to tie the sacrifices to it (which they gathered from Psalm cxvii. 27), and that they were of the fashion of oxen or rams' horns. Fortunatus Sceachus contends earnestly for this, in his Myrothec. ii. Sacer. Elaeochrysm. cap. 65, such horns being much in use in the ancient religion, as appears (he observes) from the altars of the gentiles. And yet he confesses in the sixty-ninth chapter of the same book, that such kind of straight pinnacles as I mentioned before, after the manner of obelisks (as his words are), were more convenient for the putting of the blood of the sacrifices round about them, as is required, Lev. xvi. 18.

His horns shall be of the same.] These spires seem to have been wrought out of the same piece of wood with the corners of the altar.

Ovverlay it with brass.] Some think it was overlaid with brass, not only without, but within: but that the fire which burnt in the grate might not take hold of the wood. To prevent which, others fancied it was lined with

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 The altar of burnt offering, with the vessels thereof, and pillars. 18 The measure of the court. 20 The oil for the lamp.

1 And thou shalt make an altar of shittim wood, five cubits long, and five cubits broad; the altar shall be foursquare: and the height thereof shall be three cubits.

9 The court of the tabernacle enclosed with hangings and pillars. 13 The court of the tabernacle, five hundred cubits long, and five hundred cubits broad, and three hundred cubits high, with a wall of one hundred cubits thick; the door thereof on the north, in the principium, the altar of burnt offering, and the court before the sanctuary, and by the altar of burnt offering, the pillars, and in the court of the tabernacle.

Ver. 1. Make an altar.] Of burnt-offering, as it is explained xxviii. 1. And the Hebrew word mezbeach, properly signifies that upon which sacrifices were slain and offered.

Ver. 3. Make his pana.] The Hebrew word saroth signifies pots as well as pans; but here is rightly translated shovels, by which, being made of brass, the ashes under the altar were scraped together on a heap, and then thrown into the pans.

His basons.] The principal use of these vessels was to receive the blood of the sacrifices, which was to be sprinkled as the law directed: for the Hebrew word mezbalath carries this signification in it. Besides which, Fort. Sceachus thinks they served for the mixture of the oil with fine flour and frankincense, which were to be burnt on the altar. For when any man offered a meat-offering, the priest was to take a handful of the flour and oil, with all the frankincense, as God's part, to be consumed on the altar; and therefore we must suppose some vessel wherein these were brought to the priest, as the law requires (Lev. ii. 1, 2).

His fleshhooks.] Or forks, as the word mezegaloth may be translated; which Fort. Sceachus thinks were in the form of a trident. With which they stirred up the fire: and also ordered the pieces of the sacrifice, if any chanced to lie out of it, and put them into it, that every bit might be surely consumed.

His firepans.] These are commonly taken for dishes or censers, in which the priest carried burning coals from the altar into the sanctuary, to offer incense upon the golden altar. But the abovesaid Fort. Sceachus thinks they did not minister in the holy place with brazen censers; and therefore takes these firepans for a larger sort of vessel, wherein the sacred fire which came down from heaven was kept burning, whilst they cleansed the altar and the grate from the coals and ashes, and when this altar was to be carried from one place to another, as it was often in the ashes, and his shovels, and his basons, and his fleshhooks, and his firepans: all the vessels thereof thou shalt make of brass.

4 And thou shalt make for it a grate of network of brass; and upon the net shalt thou make four brazen rings in the four corners thereof.
5 And thou shalt put it under the compass of the altar beneath, that the net may be even to the midst of the altar.
6 And thou shalt make staves for the altar, staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with brass.
7 And the staves shall be put into the rings, and the staves shall be upon the two sides of the altar, to bear it.
8 Hollow with boards shalt thou make it: as it was shewed thee in the mount, so shall they make it.
9 ¶ And thou shalt make the court of the tabernacle: for on the south side southward there

The staves shall be upon the two sides of the altar, to bear it.] It is plain by this, that the staves were not put into the sides of the grate (which was within the hollow part of the altar), unless we imagine, as Dr. Lightfoot doth, that the rings of the grate came through the frame of the altar, and hung out on the sides of it; so that the frame and the grate were carried together. But, besides other objections against this, from the different form of the grate and the altar, it may be doubted whether they were carried together, and not separate one from another; especially if we conceive the grate to have been carried with the fire still burning on it; which would have immediately consumed the purple cloth, where-with the altar was to be covered, when they removed it (Numb. iv. 13). But the firepans before mentioned (ver. 3), it is probable, as I noted there, were covered the fore part of the grate, and then, it being cleansed from the ashes, was carried together with the altar, to which it was fastened with its rings; a purple cloth being spread over both.

Ver. 8. Hollow with boards shalt thou make it.] Otherwise the grate could not have been in the midst of it, as is before ordered (ver. 5).
It was shewed thee in the mount.] Of this also he had a model set before him, as he had of other things (see xxv. 9, 10).
So shall they make it.] By that pattern he was to direct the workmen to make it.

Ver. 9. Make the court of the tabernacle.] The Hebrew word chatzart properly signifies a green field or chase. Such was this place, uncovered in the open air, but enclosed with pillars and hangings; which made it such a place as we call a court in a house.
In this court stood the tabernacle, or dwelling-house of God: not just in the midst of it, but towards the upper end. And here the altar of burnt-offering stood, between the tabernacle and the lower end of the court: and the laver, wherein they washed, stood on the side of the altar. David speaks of more courts than one (Ps. lxv. 5, lxxxiv. 3), but Moses made only one, into which the priests came to offer sacrifice. Whether the people were admitted into it is not certain: if they were, it could contain no great number; and they stood at a great distance from the priests, in the lower part of the court; and were separated by some bounds or other, as they were in aftertimes when they came into Canaan. Where being settled, and the tabernacle fixed in Shiloh, the Hebrews say it was enclosed with a wall, as well as with hangings; and then, it is likely, a distinct court was made for the people; at least it was so in David's time, as the places above mentioned prove. And in the temple of Solomon we read plainly of more courts than one (1 Kings vi. 36, vii. 121; 2 Chron. iv. 9, xxxiii. 5), viz. the court of the priests, and the court of the people. Into which, in the temple of Herod, after the captivity, was added a third, the court of the women.

For the south side southward.] It was to have two large sides, as the tabernacle had; whose south side wilderness (Myrothae. ii. Sacr. Eleochrysm. cap. 73.)

Ver. 4. Make for it a grate.] This was the principal part of the altar; the wood being laid here, and the sacrifices burnt in it. Whence the Greeks call it ἄλωος; which was the name the heathen gave to the fireplace upon their altars, as we learn from Jul. Pollux. The figure of it was round (as Fort. Sanchuzi gathes from the very name in Hebrew; for mitchkor signifies a sieve), but grew less and less, till at the latter end of it (or in the eighteenth part), as he describes it in the forenamed book (cap. 71).
Of network] It was made full of holes, like a sieve or net (and thence called simply the net, in the latter end of this verse, and in the next); that the ashes might fall through them to the bottom of the altar; where there was a door, on the east side, to open and take them out.
Of brass.] The metal of which all the forenamed things were made, and the altar itself was overlaid.

And upon the net] i.e. The grate full of holes, as was said before.

Make four brazen rings] The use of which was double; first, that by them it might be hung upon the altar; and then, when it was to be cleansed, or removed in their travels, it might by them be taken off.
In the four corners] This seems to overthrow what I now said of its circular figure; but it is to be observed, that Moses did not use the same word here, which he doth when he speaks of the four corners of the altar, which he calls pinoth (ver. 2), but calls these only kezoth, which may be better translated the extremeties of the altar, viz. the head, or corners of it, in point of art.

Ver. 5. Put it under the compass of the altar beneath,] Some have fancied that this grate was placed only at the top of the altar: but that doth not agree with these directions, which only place it beneath, in the hollow part of the altar (called in the Hebrew carrub, which signifies, as R. Solomon saith, any thing that is round, and is by us translated the compass), but so much lower than the top of the altar, that it was even to the midst of it, as it here follows.
That the net may be even to the midst of the altar.] This shows the depth of the grate to have been a cubit and a half: for the altar being three cubits high (ver. 1), and the bottom of this being even to the middle of the altar, it must hang down half-way to the ground, and consequently one cubit and a half from the top of it to the bottom. So that this grate seems to have been made like to a furnace, full of holes round about, as well as below; and perhaps was hung by chains, in the rings before mentioned, to the horns of the altar.

Ver. 6. Make staves for the altar.] Of such a length that they might be laid upon the shoulders of the priests; and the altar, when they carried it, hang between them.

Ver. 7. The staves shall be put into the rings.] Besides the rings for the grate, there were others (it appears by this) in the altar itself, into which the staves were to be put when it was to be removed.
shall be hangings for the court of fine twined linen of an hundred cubits long for one side:

10 And the twenty pillars thereof and their twenty sockets shall be of brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets shall be of silver.

11 And likewise for the north side in length there shall be hangings of an hundred cubits long, and his twenty pillars and their twenty sockets of brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver.

12 ¶ And for the breadth of the court on the west side shall be hangings of fifty cubits: their pillars ten, and their sockets ten.

13 And the breadth of the court on the east side eastward shall be fifty cubits.

14 The hangings of one side of the gate shall be fifteen cubits: their pillars three, and their sockets three.

15 And on the other side shall be hangings being first ordered to be made (xxvi. 18), so is the same side of the court.

Hangings for the court of fine twined linen.] What fine linen and twined were, see xxv. 5, xxviii. 6. These hangings were not curiously embroidered with flowers, as those of the tabernacle were (xxvi. 1), but were made of simple fine six-threaded linen.

Of this hundred cubits long for one side] By this it appears that the length of the court was a hundred cubits, or fifty yards, though of yards longer than ours, as I have said before, xxv. 10 (see ver. 18).

Ver. 10. The twenty pillars thereof] These are thought by most to be made of shittim wood.

Twenty sockets shall be of brass.] The pillars were placed five cubits distant from each other, upon bases of brass, which were more firm and lasting than wood.

Hooks of the pillars] These were, like our tenters, to hang the curtains of the court upon, see xxvii. 32, concerning the word rae.

Fillets shall be of silver.] The Hebrew word chusok properly signifies a circle; but whether these were thin bands of silver, or only fillets (as we translate it), or silver twist, is uncertain. Yet it seems to be plain from the thirty-eighth chapter, that the heads of the pillars, into which the hooks were fastened, were silvered over.

Ver. 11.] Here are the very same directions given for the hangings, pillars, bases, &c. of this side of the court, which are nothing different from the former. Ver. 13.] By this it appears that the court was as long again as it was wide, there being hangings but of half the length for the west end, and only half so many pillars and sockets.

Ver. 12.] This end was of the same dimensions with the west end.

Ver. 14.] The hangings of this end of the court were divided, because there was to be a gate; the entrance into the court being at the east end. Each side of the gate consisted of fifteen cubits; and accordingly the hangings were of that length, upon three pillars on each side, as this verse and the next direct.

Ver. 16. The gate of the court shall be an hanging of twenty cubits.] The entrance being twenty cubits wide, if we add to them the fifteen cubits which were on each side of the entrance, they make in all fifty cubits; which was the breadth of the east end of the court, as well as of the west (ver. 12, 13).

Of blue, and purple, and scarlet, &c.] Concerning all this, see xxv. 5. And here only observe, that the hangings of the gate were far richer than of the rest of the court: which were merely of fine twined linen (ver. 9), but these of several other beautiful colours, and adorned with that work they called rohem, which we translate needlework. What that was, see xxxviii. 39.

Their pillars shall be four, and their sockets four.] Proportionable to those on each side of the gate; which were here for base, as we see (ver. 14, 15), as these were four for hangings of twenty.

Ver. 17. The pillars—shall be filleted with silver.] Those at the east and west ends, as well as those on the south and north sides.

Their hooks shall be of silver, and their sockets of brass.] As was before directed (ver. 10, 11).

Ver. 18. Here all the dimensions of the court are put together: the length and breadth of which might be inferred from the hangings (ver. 9, 12, &c.), but here are expressly determined; together with the height, which was not at all intimated before; and now appointed to be five cubits, i. e. two yards and a half, of larger measure than ours. So that the tabernacle might be plainly seen by the people; for it was as high as the walls of the court, and as high as the walls (if I may so call them) that encompassed it.

Of fine twined linen.] This seems to be a brief repetition of what was said before concerning the hangings, and the pillars which stood on bases of brass.

Ver. 19.] This is also a repetition in general of what was said before, particularly ver. 2, for all the vessels belonging to the tabernacle itself were of gold, as we read in the twenty-fifth chapter.

All the pins thereof.] The tabernacle had nothing of brass in the fabric of it, but the bases of the pillars at the entrance (xxvi. 37) and therefore these pins, I suppose, belong to them, whereby the pillars were fastened in their sockets.

The pillars of the court, shall be of brass.] These brass pins were struck into the ground (as Dr. Lightfoot understands it), that the hangings, which were tied to them by cords, might be kept from flying up at the bottom.

Ver. 20. Bring thee pure oil olive beaten.] Not squeezed out by a press, or by a mill (for such was full of sediment and dregs), but which ran freely from the olives, being bruised with a pestle.

For the burnt.] In the golden candlestick (xxvi. 37), To cause the lamp to burn always.] Sufficient to keep the lamp always burning. Some imagine that it did not burn day and night, but, being lighted every evening, went out in the morning. And there are some places which seem to favour this opinion, particularly beaten for the light, to cause the lamp to burn always.

21 In the tabernacle of the congregation without the vail, which is before the testimony,

1 Sam. iii. 3, where mention is made of the lamp going out, viz. in the morning. See also 2 Chron. xiii. 11, where we read of setting the lamps to burn every evening; which seems to signify that they did not burn in the day. But Josephus, who was a priest and could not but know, and had no reason to tell a lie, saith they burned day and night. And indeed it was but necessary; for otherwise the priest must have ministered in the dark, at the altar of incense, before the Divine Majesty, who kept a table in the sanctuary which required light; for nobody feasts in darkness. And therefore R. Levi, of Barcelona (Preecept. xviii.), saith, God commanded a lamp should always burn in the sanctuary, for the honour and majesty of it; there being no light conveyed to it otherwise. But it is highly probable, there were not so many of the lamps burning in the day as in the night; when all the seven lamps were lighted; some of which were put out in the morning, and lighted again in the evening. So Josephus saith expressly (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 9), “Three burnt all day before the Lord, and the rest were lighted in the evening.”

Ver. 21. Without the vail. That is, the second veil, which was before the most holy place.

Before the testimony. That is, the ark of the testimony (see xxxv. 21, 22).

Aaron and his sons shall order it. As direction is more fully given, xxx. 7, 8. It shall be a statute for ever.] See xxxviii. 43.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 Aaron and his sons are set apart for the priest’s office. 2 Holy garments are appointed. 6 The ephod. 15 The breastplate with twelve precious stones. 30 The Urim and Thummim. 31 The robe of the ephod, with pomegranates and bells. 36 The plate of the mitre. 39 The embroidered coat. 40 The garments for Aaron’s sons.

And take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest’s office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron’s sons.

And thou shalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother for glory and for beauty.

And thou shalt speak unto all that are wise hearted, whom I have filled with the spirit of wisdom, that they may make Aaron’s garments

Ver. 2. Make holy garments for Aaron. If very good authors did not affirm it, we should scarce think it credible, that the priests among some of the ancient heathens offered sacrifices to their gods naked. Particularly the old Arabsians, as Hottinger observes in his Histor. Orientalis, lib. i. cap. 7. But such filthiness was abhorred by most people, whose priests were not only clothed, but performed their service at the altar in a peculiar habit. So that there is scarce any author who treats of the sacrifices and the priests of the heathen, that doth not speak of their garments also. As Moses here in the first institution of the priesthood among the Jews, to offer peculiar sacrifices at God’s house, takes a special care, by the Divine direction, about their vestments. Which the Hebrew doctors think so inseparable from the priesthood, that they fancy Adam, Abel, and Cain, did not sacrifice without them (see Gen. iii. 22).

They are called holy, because they might be worn by none but them, and by them only when they ministered unto God.

For Aaron. The high-priest had some garments peculiar to himself, which none of the other priests might wear. They were four; the breast-plate, the robe, the ephod, and the plate of gold. There were four more he also wore, but they were common to him with the other priests, viz. the coat, the drawers, the girdle, and the bonnet. Their bonnets, indeed, and his mitre, were of a different form; yet they are not considered by the Jews as distinct vestments, being both coverings of the head. And they make account the high-priest never wore at any one time above eight sorts of garments; nor the lower above four. This is the universal sense of the Hebrew writers; and I cannot give any account why Grotius mentions only seven garments of the high-priest (reckoning the golden plate for one), which he will have to answer unto the seven lamps in the candlestick. For it is evident by this very chapter he wore eight, viz. the ephod, (ver. 3), the breastplate (ver. 15), the robe (ver. 31), the plate of gold (ver. 36), the embrodered coat, the girdle, and the mitre (ver. 39), which are all ordered for Aaron the high-priest; and afterward (ver. 42, 43), breeches are ordered for him as well as his sons, which make up the number of eight.

For glory and for beauty.] To make their office more respected, and strike men with an awful sense of the Divine Majesty, whose ministers they saw appear in such grandeur. For this and the foregoing precepts (as Maimonides observes) were given to render the sanctuary of God more august and magnificent; for which end he has filled it with the spirit of those who ministered there; and not only separated them from other men, but ordered them to be clothed in beautiful and precious garments, that they might appear there like men of honour (More Nevoh. lib. iii. cap. 45), unto which R. Levi of Barcelona well adds (Precept. exiic.) that by these glorious garments the priests were put in mind of their dignity, and admonished to perform their service, and be in a spirit of great- ness of Him unto whom they were consecrated. It may be fit for me also to add, that there being two sorts of garments which the high-priest wore (those they called white, and those they called golden), both of them were very rich, and made him look glorious ly; whether the materials, or the colours, or the art with which they were made and regarded; as will appear in the particular account which is given of them in this chapter (see ver. 40).

Ver. 3. Speak unto all that are wise hearted.] So the Hebrews call those who had extraordinary skill in any art; according to the ancient opinion, which made the heart the seat of the mind.

When I have filled them with the spirit of wisdom:] Endued with singular skill. For the word ruach, in Scripture, signifies a gift of God; whereby they who had it performed what they undertook excellently. And mechanical arts are called wisdom, as well as higher sciences; so St. Paul calls himself a wise master builder. Which was the ancient language of the world before the time of Pythagoras, as Cuperus (in his Apotheosis Homeri, p. 110), out of Georgius Dionysius's preface to Aristotle's Logic, and out of Nichomachus Gerasinus, whose words are very remarkable: "When all before Pythagoras were called by the common name of ζωομενοι, even builders of houses, and curriers of leather, and pilots, and αστροφις δ τησυριων ου και δημοσιας ελεημονιας, and, in general, they were skillful in any art or public work," that philosopher denied this name to them. Notwithstanding which, some authors, in aftertimes, still observed the ancient use; insomuch that Αλεξιον calls fishermen, who understood their art well, ωομενοι τω αλειφε (lib. 1. de Animal. cap. 2), and Lucius calls Perillus ωομοι χαλκατις, "a wise brazier," and Aristotle himself observes that Phidias was called ωομοι σωφος, "a wise stone-cutter" (lib. v. Morsl. ad Eudemum). Nor were the Latins strangers to this language (as Cuperus shows in the same place), which is here used by Moses: whose entire sense in these words is this: that the men here spoken of, "being very skillful of themselves in their several arts, their skill was so increased by God's special gift, that they became marvellous artists."
5 And they shall take gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen.

6 And they shall make the ephod of gold, of blue, and of purple, of scarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work.

7 And it shall have the two shoulderpieces thereof joined at the two edges thereof; and so it shall be joined together.

but were then habited like other men; as Mr. Selden proves (lib. ii. de Succession, cap. 7), and at large confirms (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11, n. 3, &c.).

Ver. 5. And they] i.e. The skilful workmen before mentioned.

are gold, &c.] This verse directs to the materials of which the priests' garments were to be made. For though these five words denote so many colours; yet the first word and the last (viz. gold and fine linen) show the matter also is included; from which colour cannot be separated. And as for the matter of their garments, they were made either of woolen or linen; nothing of hair or silk being used in their contexture: for gold (ver. 22, 30) is expressly chosen for ornament, than for the making the substance of the garments. So all the Hebrew doctors, whose maxim is this, the priests are not clothed in their ministry at the temple, but in woollen and linen. The matter of them, indeed, is not here expressed in this chapter, save only of their breeches, which are ordered to be made of linen (ver. 42). But in xxix. 27, &c., all the garments are expressly said to be made of fine linen; except the girdle, which was partly of linen, partly of woollen. The garments of the high-priest, which the Jews called white garments, were certainly made of linen; and his girdle also was of the same, without any mixture of woollen, when he wore those garments on the great day of expiation, as Braunius shows (lib. i. de Vestiti Sac. Hebr. cap. 7).

Gold,] The Hebrews say there were seven sorts of gold, which was diversified either by its colour, or the place from which it came, or its goodness. But that which was used about these garments, they conclude was the gold they called labor, which we translate pure gold (ver. 29, 30), which was the flesh and of the brightest colour; between a yellow and red.

Blue, and purple, &c.] Of these colours, see xxv. 4.

Fine linen.] The Hebrew word shesh signifies a pure kind of fine linen, not silk) as some have imagined; for there was no such thing known in Moses' days. It was of a shining white colour; and therefore all the inferior priests were clothed in white, their garments being made of this. And such were all the garments whereof with the high-priest entered into the most holy place, on the great day of expiation. And wheresover the Scripture speaks of fine linen, and mentions no colour, we are to understand white.

Ver. 6. They shall make the ephod] We retain the Hebrew word, which doth not express the form of this garment; but the next verse teaches us something of it; that it was a short garment, which hung behind upon the shoulders down to the buttocks, and came down before upon the breast and the belly. It consisted of three parts: that which covered the breast and the back (which the Hebrews take to be properly called the ephod), then the two shoulder-pieces, which came up from the arm-holes to the shoulders (mentioned in the next verse); and then the girdle belonging to it (ver. 8).

Of gold, of blue,] See the foregoing verse.

Fine twined linen.] Here is another word added to shesh (or fine linen), which is mashker. Which is never joined with any thing but shesh in all the Scrip.
other six names of the rest on the other stone, according to their birth.

11 With the work of an engraver in stone, like the engravings of a signet, shalt thou engrave the two stones with the names of the children of Israel: thou shalt make them to be set inouches of gold.

12 And thou shalt put the two stones upon the shoulders of the ephod, for stones of memorial unto the children of Israel: and Aaron shall bear their names before the Lornd upon his two shoulders for a memorial.

Ver. 10.] The six eldest on that stone which was upon the right shoulder: and the six younger on the other upon the left: as several of the Hebrer doctors expound it: particularly Jarchi, with whom Josephus agrees (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 8). The Talmudists, indeed, dispose them otherwise: but this is most suitable to the word toledoth, according to their generations, or their birth, as we render the latter end of the verse.

Ver. 11. With the work of an engraver in stone.] Do not with such art as such workmen use. Like the engravings of a signet.] The same words are used again (ver. 36), where he speaks of the engravings upon the plate of gold. On which Abgarineth saith the letters were protuberant, as they are upon coins, or upon wax impressed with a seal: but here on the ephod and the breastplate, he thinks the names were cut deep in the stones, as letters are in a seal. For the same reason, the words being the very same; and therefore, if the letters were protuberant in the one, they were so in the other.

Make them to be set inouches of gold.] The Hebrew word mishbetoth, which we translateouches, signifies as much as the Latin word funda; the socket, as I may say, wherein the stones were set. Both which made a button, and not a fixed figure, but something like a lozenge, or, as Maimonides expresses it, like the figure of those holes that are in the stomach of such animals as chew the cud, called reticulum (see Jo. Brannius de Vest. Sacr. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 17, n. 8). By these buttons the hinder part of the ephod was fastened to the fore-part upon the shoulders; and the breastplate also hung upon them by golden chains.

Ver. 12. Plates of the ephod.] This is explained in the following words, that "Aaron might bear their names before the Lord upon his shoulders for a memorial." That is, might remember to recommend the twelve tribes of Israel unto God, when he offered incense, and made his prayers before him. Or, for a token, that he appeared before God in the name of the whole people of Israel.

Others will have this memorial refer to God, before whom he presented himself, that he might be gracious unto his people, when the high-priest came thus attired, according to his own order, to pray for them; with assurance that he would be mindful of them all. And to this the twenty-ninth verse seems to incline; where the same is said to be the intention of engraving their names upon the twelve stones on the breastplate (see xxxix. 7).

Ver. 13. Makeouches of gold.] See ver. 11, where the word mishbetoth is explained.

Ver. 14. And two chains of pure gold at the ends.] These chains did not consist of many little rings, but of many threads or wires of gold twisted together like a rope. For which reason Moses adds, ofwreathens work shalt thou make them. This Bartenora takes to be the meaning of the word mishbathoth (which we translate at the ends), which he expounds cords or cables. They were not, saith he, like to those iron chains wherewith prisoners are bound, consisting of several joints; but twisted of golden threads, till they were as thick as cords. Others think mishbathoth signifies equal; because they were of an equal thickness, or of an equal length. But our translation also may be defended; for the ends of them were annexed to the rings of the breastplate (ver. 21). But as these chains were annexed at one end to the rings of the breastplate, so at the other end they were annexed to the golden buttons upon the shoulders; so that the breastplate hung upon the golden buttons by the chains.

Fasten thewreathens chains to theouches.] Moses only briefly mentions the two chains in this place, to signify that theouches in the ephod served for the support of the breastplate, by these two chains; which properly belonged to that, and not to the ephod, as Jarchi observes. And therefore, after directions for the breastplate (which here follow), they are again spoken of in their proper place (ver. 22). As ver. 27 there are two golden rings spoken of, which belong to the ephod; but not mentioned till then, because by these rings the breastplate and ephod were knit together.

Ver. 15. Make the breastplate.] Next, after the ephod, directions are given for the choshen, which we translate breastplate; taking it, I suppose, to come from the Hebrew word chazeh, which signifies the breast. For by the change of a letter (which is not unusual) choshen may well be thought to come from thence, because it lay upon the breast and covered it.

Of judgment.] For the priest wore it, when he went to consult the most solemn and the greatest concerns of their religion or government; and received such answers, as directed them what to determine in dubious cases, either in war or peace (see ver. 29).

With cunning work.] See ver. 6.

After the work of the ephod thou shalt make it, &c.] It was to be made of the same materials with the ephod; and with the same artifice, as it here follows.

Ver. 16. Foursquare it shall be being doubled.] The words are in the Hebrew, four-square shall it be doubled. Which are to be thus understood, that the whole piece was not square till it was doubled. So Maimonides. It was a cubit long (i. e. two spans), and its breadth a span, but being doubled it was a square of a span, both in length and in breadth. From whence it follows, that it was hollow; so that it might be compared to one of our purses: only it doth not appear whether it were sewed together at the sides, or on one side, or open on both sides; though it is commonly said so to be. But it is possible that it was doubled, merely that it might be stronger to bear the weight of so many precious stones, and of the rings and chains; not that it might have any thing put between it.
A span shall be the length thereof, &c.] This is just the measure of a man’s breast.

Ver. 17. Set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row.

A span shall be the length thereof, &c.] This is just the measure of a man’s breast.

17 And thou shalt set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row.

A span shall be the length thereof, &c.] This is just the measure of a man’s breast.

Ver. 18. The second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and an amethyst.

17 And thou shalt set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row.

A span shall be the length thereof, &c.] This is just the measure of a man’s breast.

A span shall be the length thereof, &c.] This is just the measure of a man’s breast.

Ver. 17. Set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row.

Ver. 18. The second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and an amethyst.

17 And thou shalt set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row.
And thou shalt make the breastplate chains at the ends of the breastplate, which are on the ends of the breastplate.

And the other two ends of the two wrenthen chains thou shalt fasten in the twoouches, and put them on the shoulderpieces of the ephod before it.

And thou shalt make two rings of gold, and thou shalt put them upon the two ends of the breastplate in the border thereof, which is in the side of the ephod inward.

And two other rings of gold thou shalt make, and shalt put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the forepart thereof.

Amethyst.] The Hebrew word achlam is no more to be found in Scripture elsewhere, than the two former. But the best and most ancient authors take it as we do, for that stone which other writers call an amethyst; which is of a bright violet colour, or like red wine, from whence it has its name in the Greek.

Of ereathed work.] So many wires of gold were wreathed together, as to make a chain of some thickness, like a cord. So Bartenora interprets it. Abnerbinel saith they were weaved; but he must mean such a weaving as we make with our fingers, when we twist several threads together, which the LXX. call γαβληθ, or twisted work.

Put them upon the two ends of the breastplate.] This is to be understood of the lower corners of the breastplate, as ver. 23, of the higher.

And thou shalt put the two wrenthen chains of gold in the two rings which are on the ends of the breastplate.

And thou shalt make two rings of gold, and thou shalt put them upon the two ends of the breastplate in the border thereof, which is in the side of the ephod inward.

And two other rings of gold thou shalt make, and shalt put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the forepart thereof.

The breastplate had four rings in all; one at each corner of the square. And here he gives direction for the making those two, which were at the two upper corners of it: the other two are ordered, ver. 26.

This verse and the next show how these chains were to be disposed, and for what end they served. Below they were fastened to the two rings, in the upper part of the breastplate, as is here directed: and above they were fastened to the two buttons, upon the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, as is directed in the next verse. So the breastplate was supported by these two chains, which hung upon the buttons, as the breastplate did upon them.

Make two rings of gold.] That is, two other besides those mentioned, ver. 23.
over against the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod.

28 And they shall bind the breastplate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breastplate be not loosed from the ephod.

(2) And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment

Toward the forepart thereof.] Or, in its forepart.
Over against the --coupling.] Opposite to the rings of the breastplate; being to be coupled to it by these rings.
Above the curious girdle.] All this is said only to mark out the place exactly, where these two rings were to be fastened to the ephod; that the breastplate might be inseparable from it.
Ver. 28.] A blue lace, or ribbon, being put through the two lower rings of the breastplate; and then through the rings of the ephod: by which they were tied together, a little above the girdle of the ephod.

That the breastplate be not loosed from the ephod.] And thus being joined, they were not to be separated one from another; nor out of the time of ministration: but always continued so fast together, that they were without the breastplate, of which the учение, theGemara(cap.7, of Joma), If any one remove the breastplate from the ephod, or the slaves from the ark, he shall receive forty stripes.

Ver. 29. Aaron shall bear the names] Appear in the name of the whole people of Israel, to beg direction for them in all difficult cases.
When he goeth in unto the holy place,] Where with his face towards the ark (where the Divine glory sat) he prayed to God for them.
For a memorial before the Lord.] That God might remember them, when he remembered him daily of the promises made to them, and to their forefathers.
Which, in Scripture phrase, denotes God's gracious hearing his prayers, when he addressed himself unto him, in the manner he required. For then he is said to remember his people, when he granted their desires: and they remembered him, when they did as he bade them.

Ver. 30. Breastplate of judgment.] It is called both here and in the foregoing verse the breastplate of judgment: only for these last cases.

Urim and the Thummim.] There is not the least indication anywhere what these were, nor any direction given for their use: but what we have is, there is for the rest of the priestly attire. Which may incline one to conclude one of these two things: either that they were things delivered to Moses by God himself, as the two tables of stone were; or that they are not things different from the precious stones before mentioned. But if the former of these were true, I should think, it would have been more plainly mentioned that God delivered these unknown things to him, as that he did the two tables of stone. The other hath something in the Scripture to counterbalance it. For in the thirty-nine chapter of this book, where Moses sets down the making of all these things which are here ordered, he mentions only the four rows of stones, in the same manner as he doth here; but saith not a word of putting the urim and thummim in the breastplate: though he speak particularly of other things, even of the rings, and the chains, and the lace, whereby it was tied to the ephod. And, on the other side, when he speaks of habiting Aaron with all these vestments, in order to his consecration, he only saith (Lev. viii.), that he put the breastplate upon him, also he put in the breastplate the urim and the thummim; but saith not a word of the four rows of stones. For which it is hard to give a reason; unless it be, because the urim and the thummim were one and the same thing with the twelve precious stones: so that it was indifferent whether the said urim and thummim were put into the breastplate, or the twelve precious stones; which are the only things in all this description of the holy vestments that can be thought to be urim and thummim. And, indeed, the being being given for a direction for every thing else, and also a description of their form and fashion (as, that the chains should be of wrought work), one cannot but think there would have been something said of these, if they had been distinct from what was mentioned before. Mr. Mede, indeed, thinks that nothing is said concerning them, because they were well known to the patriarchs. But this is well confuted lately by another great man, Dr. Pocock, in his late learned commentary upon the prophet Hosea (p. 119), unto which I refer the reader, because I have other things to note, and would not willingly enlarge too much on this subject.

As for that which some have said concerning two little images, or representations of angels, which were put in the hollow of the breastplate, I see no foundation for such a conceit. One may better say, that these two words urim and thummim were written or wrought on the breastplate; signifying that from hence they should receive the clearest and most perfect resolution of all their doubts. And of this opinion was R. Assurb in the Mishna, cap. 46.

But if we take the former to be the true answer, that he only repeats what he said before (as he doth what he had said of the rings belonging to the breastplate, ver. 11, 22), then the meaning is, that the twelve stones should be the most sparkling, and most perfect in their kind, that could be got (for urim, all acknowledge, signifies faces, or illuminations; and thummim, the greatest perfection), and that all belonging to the breastplate (the square stuff, the stones engraved, the rings, the chains and lace) should be prepared and made ready before they were set in the breastplate.

And of this opinion (that the precious stones were the urim and the thummim) were Josephus and the Talmudic doctors: whereas the Talmud doth declare the urim, I take it, were in the right; though they do not give a likely account how the mind of God was declared by them.

They shall be upon Aaron's heart.] So it is said concerning the names of the children of Israel (ver. 29), which were engraved on the twelve stones; and seems to confirm the foregoing interpretation.

When he goeth in before the Lord.] To minister unto the Divine Majesty, and to inquire of him;
And thou shalt make the robe of the ephod all of blue.

which he did in the holy place, standing with his face towards the ark in the holy of holies. Into which he went only once a year, upon a particular business, to expiate the sins of the people; and had not on these glorious robes here mentioned; but was only clad in fine linen, as we read, Lev. xxvi. And therefore it is strange that Buxtorf says he went into the Sanctum Sanctorum, with the urim and thummim, to inquire of God. See his history of them, cap. i. (where he alleges this verse for it) and cap. iii.

Aaron shall bear the judgment.] By judgment is here meant the breastplate of judgment, as it is called, when he begins to speak of it (ver. 15), and in the foregoing verse; just as the ark of the testimony is sometimes called the testimony. Or else the meaning is, that he should carry the great concerns of the children of Israel (their weighty causes and doubts) before God; and desire this direction for the king, for the great council, and for the people in all difficult matters, both in war and in peace, whether belonging to religion or to civil affairs.

Upon his heart before the Lord.] He was never to appear in the holy place without this breastplate, with the names of all the children of Israel upon it. Many learned men have taken notice of that passage in Allian (lib. xiv. Var. Hist. cap. 34), where he relates how the Egyptian priests had an image made of sapphire, and no other stone, of their own, and called it Αργυρία, i.e. a truth), when they sat in judgment. And Diodorus Siculus saith (lib. i. cap. 75), that it consisted of more precious stones than one; from whence some have imagined that Moses took his pattern of this breastplate. But as they did not wear this badge of authority, when they ministered about sacred things, it is very likely, they had them only to sit as judges; so there is no reason to think this ornament of theirs was so old as the time of Moses (there being no mention of it in Herodotus), but was rather a later invention, unto which other countries were not strangers.

For the vestal virgins among the Romans, at least she that was called Maxima, wore an ornament upon her breast made of precious stones, as a statute dignity; and in the beginning of the last century, seems to represent it (see Lipsius, cap. ult. de Vesta et Vestaill). And Guthner hath proved that these vestal virgins sat in judgment, and tried causes, as the Pontifex Maximus did; and then, it is likely, and not at other times, wore this antependitor. There is more ground also to say, that the Egyptians took their pattern from the Jews, than that these took it from the Egyptians; there being in the time of Solomon a great correspondence between them, by his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter.

Continually.] Whenever he appeared before the Lord to inquire of him. The greatest difficulty is, how the Lord answered by urin and thummim? Which the Jews generally think was by the shining of the robe, or of the letters of the letters written on them, as made the answer. If they had left out the latter part of this resolution (about the prominence of the letters) what they say would have been more likely: especially since Josephus only mentions their extraordinary splendour; telling us, for instance, that when the high-priest inquired, whether they should go to war or not? If God approved of it, there was such a resplendent brightness in the stones, ως τοις διαφορα των υπαρχων ενυστω, το παρευρετο τω Θεω εις ειπανωςια, "that made all the people know God would be present for their help and succour." And when God did not approve of their undertaking, he saith there was a cloudiness upon the stones, as there had been for two hundred years (he confesses) before he wrote his history, τοι θεου διαφωματος επί τη παρακελοις τω νους, "God being angry with them, for the transgression of his laws" (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 9). But this alone could not resolve such questions as that wherever he called and gave the answer. (for urin and thummim, to the Canaanites I' to which the Lord answered (ver. 2), "Judah shall go up." For if this answer was given in this way now mentioned, that stone alone, which had the name of Judah engraved on it, must have had a splendour in it above all the rest. Which if we should suppose, yet an answer could not have been given to all their questions, merely by the refusal of all, or of any one stone; as if they asked, Which way they should go against an enemy? therefore it is more likely, that there was a voice which spake to the high-priest, from the Divine Glory on the mercy-seat; as we read there was to Moses, when he went into the most holy place to speak with God (Numb. vii. 59). Against which I do not see what can be objected; but seems far more probable, that with the opinion, who think God inspired the high-priest at that time, when he consulted him, as he did the prophets. For this makes no difference between inquiring by urin and thummim, and by the prophets, but only this; that God (they say) constantly answered when the high-priest consulted him, which might be the very reason he would not grant the request of the Canaanites, but let them be any true also in what the Jews say concerning the bath col under the second temple, it seems to me to tell us, that God then directed them, without the urin and thummim, in the same way as he had formerly done with it. Certain it is, that such a voice often spake to our Saviour, in the audience of his apostles, out of the high and holy place of his own, to show that he was the prophet like unto Moses, whom he promised to raise up unto them (Deut. xviii. 15). There are those who have adventured to affirm, that others besides the high-priest might wear the urin and thummim, to consult the Divine Majesty, particularly their kings. But how weak the grounds are where this assumption is made. If this were true, it would be a great mistake of the places which they allege to justify it. I shall conclude what I have to note about this matter, with one observation more; that this is one of the principal reasons, why the government of this people before they had kings was (as Josephus calls it) theocracy, that is, the empire of God, because he, by this oracle of urin and thummim, prescribed how they should proceed in all their public affairs of great moment. And another reason was, because he stirred up judges when he thought it necessary; who, being of his immediate appointment, are so far acknowledged by him, that when they were weary of Samuel's government (who was a judge) and desired a king, God declared it was not Samuel whom they rejected, but himself.

[Ver. 31.] Make the robe.] The Hebrew word mehol, which we translate robe, is by the Latins called pel- tum, and by the LXX. ἐνόθιαν, a garment coming down to the ankles. The form of it is intimed in the next verse; and the matter of it is here ordered to be all of blue, i.e. of blue cloth. Some, indeed, say of silk; but it is certain thiscloth signifies wool dyed of a sky-colour (see Bruninus, lib. i. de Vest. Sacr. Hebr. cap. 9, n. 1).<ref>Robe of the ephod.] So called because the ephod was put upon it.</ref><ref>Ver. 32. There shall be an hole in the top of it, in the midst thereof: it shall have a binding of</ref> woven work round about the hole of it, as it were the hole of an habergeon, that it be not rent. 33 ¶ And beneath upon the hem of it thou shalt make pomegranates of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, round about the hem thereof; and bells of gold between them round about:

34 A golden bell and a pomegranate, a golden hence the form of it may be gathered, that it was like one of our surplices, or shirts without sleeves: but with two holes on the sides to let their hands through. And it was put on over their heads, it appears by this hole at the top; and so covered their whole body.

In the midst thereof] Not cross-wise, from shoulder to shoulder; but long-wise, from the back to the middle of the breast, as Abarbinel expounds it. Wherein it differed from a surplice, and from the tunic, or coat; the hole of which at the top was round; whereas this was oblong, as they speak.

It shall have a binding] This was both for handsomeness, and for strength, that it might not be further slit. Josephus mentions the former as a reason for this binding or border, that there might appear no διασπείρα (as his word is), "no deformity about the priest:" and the text itself in the end of the verse mentions the latter, that it be not rent. This binding, Abarbinel thinks, on the former account, was on the inside, for deccuram's sake, that nothing might be seen but the robe.

Of woven work] It was not to be sewn to it, but woven with it of one entire piece; which could not be done without a great deal of art. So Abarbinel; the opening or hole was not to be cut with scissors, and then sewed with a needle; but it was woven with the very garment. As it were the hole of an habergeon.] The ancient habergeons or corselets being made of leather and linen, needed a limbus about the neck to keep the part firm and tight. But whether the binding had hooks and eyes (as we call them) like those which are in corselets, to fasten the parts together, is uncertain. Abarbinel affirms it, but without any authority.

That] It be not rent in putting it on; or by the ephod and breastplate that were upon it; for that had rendered it contemptible; a rent among us (saith R. Levi Barzelonita) being dishonourable (Precept, cii.).

Ver. 33. Beneath upon the hem of it] Or, upon its skirts. Karα νικάσα, saith Josephus, "towards the bottom," where it reached the feet.

Pomegranates] So the Hebrew word rimonimus undoubtedly signifies, as Maimonides and other learned Jews affirm. Jarchi saith they were to be of the bigness of a hen's egg.

Of blue, &c., round about the hem thereof;] Though the robe itself was of one simple colour, yet the skirts of it were very much adorned by a variety of colours in the pomegranates; which were made of vandyed blue, purple, and scarlet (of these see xxxv. 4), and the LXX. add, of fine linen. For so we read they were made, xxxix. 21.

Bells of gold between them round about.] The Tar- gum upon Esth. vi. 10, makes the kings of Persia to have worn such kind of garments. For he represents Ahaseurus as saying to Haman, "Go to my wardrobe, and take one of my best purple cloaks, and of the best silk vests, with gems at the four corners of it, and golden bells and pomegranates hanging round about;" And no doubt they were intended partly as an ornament to the high-priest, their matter being of gold; but what their form was we are not told. There were round bells in use amongst them, like those bell and a pomegranate, upon the hem of the robe round about.

35 And it shall be upon Aaron to minister: and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not.

36 ¶ And thou shalt make a plate of pure which we commonly see upon the collars of our horses' necks: but Maimonides saith, these were of a pyramidal figure, open at the bottom, with clappers in them, like our little hand-bells.

Ver. 34.] So there was a bell (as the Jews explain it) between every two pomegranates; and a pomegranate between every two bells. But how many of each there were is uncertain; though the Jews commonly say there were seventy-two. Which if it was true, and the pomegranates were of such a bigness as was said before, this robe would have been so wide at the bottom, as to have been cumbersome, especially with so many pomegranates and bells hanging upon it.

Ver. 35.] He was never to appear before God without this garment; nor to wear it but when he ministered. The same is said of all the priestly garments, both of his and of his sons' (ver. 3, 4).

His sound shall be heard when he goeth in] That the people, upon this notice, might fall to their prayers, while he was offering incense; which represented their going up to heaven.

And when he cometh out,] That they might then dispose themselves to be dismissed with his blessing.

That he die not.] For neglecting to appear before God, in this solemn manner, as he required. For it is the common maxim among the Jews, that when the priest went into the Holy of Holies, and was set there in the holy place, his conscience could not bear the burden of guilt, and that he were held to be priests: when they were not so clothed, they were not priests. That is, if they presumed to minister without this attire, it was an illegal act, and unacceptable to God (see ver. ult.).

Ver. 36. Make a plate of pure gold.] The Hebrew word zitz is translated πέταλον by the LXX., which signifies a leaf expanded. And such was this plate or ornament we tend to think, a thin plate of gold, two fingers broad (as Jarchi tells us), and so long as to reach from one ear to the other; being bound to the forehead with a string, which was tied behind the head; and thence is called a crown (xxiii. 30), as all things which are compass the forehead. And crowns being anciently made of flowers or leaves, which we call garlands, Josephus saith this crown was adorned with the figures of that flower which the Greeks call ανθοῦ, of which there were three rows (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 8). And indeed the Hebrew word zitz signifies a flower; which hath made some think this plate had its name from the flowers which were wrought in it, to make it more beautiful (see xxi. 6).

Girdle upon it, like the engraving of a signet.| Not by cutting the letters deep in the plate, but by making them protrubant, like those which are made by a seal upon wax (see ver. 22).

Holiness to the Lord.] The ancient crowns perhaps had some image or other in them (for in later times Domitian had a golden crown with the effigies of Jupiter and Minerva, as Suetonius tells us), instead of which, God, we are told, had his own great name to be engraven on Aaron's crown in these words, which signify, that he was separated to the service of the Most High. It is but a frivolous question which the Jews make, whether these words were engraven in one line, or in two, one above another! for there is no reason to make us think they were not in one line as they are here written.
gold, and grave upon it, like the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD.

37 And thou shalt put it on a blue lace, that it may be upon the mitre; upon the forehead of the mitre it shall be.

38 And it shall be upon Aaron's forehead, that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts; and it shall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the Lord.

39 ¶ And thou shalt embroider the coat of the

Ver. 37. Put it on a blue lace.] It hung on a ribbon of blue, by which it was fastened upon the mitre, as it follows in the next words. The Talmudists fancy there were three ribbons, one at each ear, and one in the middle, which is this here mentioned. But this one was sufficient for the purpose, as will appear when the next words are rightly understood. They also say that the mitre was made of fine linen, and that it was fixed between two pieces of plate, one behind the other, and that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things; which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts; and it shall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the Lord.

Ver. 38. It shall be upon Aaron's forehead.] The mitre, as I said before, did not come down low (as the Talmudists pretend), but was fastened upon the crown and the upper part of the head, the whole forehead being left bare, that there might be space enough for this plate of gold to lie upon it, and for his phylacteries, as the Jews will have it, which were next to the mitre, and then the crown a little above the eyes. But some of them think the high-priest wore no phylacteries, having no need of them, which was not aptly expressed by Prudentius in his Apotheosis Homeri, p. 138. The ancient Greeks call it iara, and didaros, and sometimes dia dene, which was commonly made of byssus, or fine linen, as appears even from the story of Alexander the Great, who (as Justin tells us) took his diadem from his horse, and put it on his head. Thus Homer, (lib. xv.) which shows that it was made of fine linen, which was proper for that purpose.

They were of divers colours, but commonly white: and such were the diadems of kings, which Ammi-

Anus callebs fasciolam candidam, regis majestatis insignis (lib. xii.). Such was the mitre of the high-priest (ver. 33). And it was decked over by bonnets (lib. x. 37), because it was made sometimes of three or four ribbons or laces wrought together (vid. Cuperus in his Apotheosis Homeri, p. 138). The ancient Greeks call it iara, and didaros, and sometimes dia dene, which was commonly made ofbyssus, or fine linen, as appears even from the story of Alexander the Great, who (as Justin tells us) took his diadem from his horse, and put it on his head. Thus Homer, (lib. xv.) which shows that it was made of fine linen, which was proper for that purpose.

Now some understand these words, that it may be upon the mitre, as if the golden plate was bound upon the mitre, which is contrary to what follows (ver. 38), it shall be upon Aaron's forehead. This therefore must be understood of the face or ribbon, which was to come down over the mitre, to fasten the golden plate which depended upon it. For being put through a little hole in the middle of the plate, it went over the mitre; and each end of the plate of the hole of the mitre at each ear, it was brought up again and tied over the mitre. Thus we must inter-

Ver. 39. Embroider the coat of fine linen.] This coat is one of the garments ordered to be made, ver. 4, in Hebrew called ketonah: from whence both the Greek word χιτών, and the Latin tunica, seem to be derived. The matter of it was fine linen, and therefore it was white. The form of it was not much unlike one of our shirts, with sleeves coming down to the wrists; but made pretty close to the body; and no longer than to reach down to the knees. It was the most inward of all the priestly garments, being next to their body. And though it be not mentioned in the description of it, there is no doubt that it had a slit in the neck of it, by which it was put over their head, and then tied to the neck with strings.

Embroider.] The Hebrew word tashbets all agree signifies a work with certain figures woven in it, fine linen, and thou shalt make the mitre of fine linen, and thou shalt make the girdle of needlework.

40 ¶ And for Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats, and thou shalt make for them girdles, either of gold or other materials. But what sort of figures were not certain. The famous Solimanis thinks they were round, like to the moons. Others take them to have been square or cubical. R. Sol. Jarchi saith in general, that it was a work like the onces (as we translate mizhebocath), in which the precious stones were set. But none, I think, hath made such likely guesses at the figure of them as Jo. Braunius, who takes them to have been nothing else, but lacuns fossulas, or divers ells, not piation), if ends, garments, saith (as I. de Vestinu Sacred. Hebræorum, cap. 17).

Make the mitre of fine linen.] See ver. 37, where the mitre is mentioned. Make the girdle of needlework.] It is mentioned before (ver. 4), under the name of anbet, or abet, which word no doubt signifies a girdle or belt, yet not like our common girdles, but like that which we call a sash, being made of twined linen and worsted of divers colours, as we find xxxiv. 29, where blue, and purple, and scarlet, signifies wool, or worsted yarn of these colours. Such were the girdles of all the priests, which they wore all the year, the high-priest as well as the rest, except upon one day (that of expiation), when he had on a girdle of fine linen only, not mixed with woollen. These girdles were of such a length, that they might go round the body more than once, as Josephus tells us, lib. iii. cap. 8. For, if we may believe him, they were two-and-thirty ells long, and four fingers broad, being hollow within. Wherefore it is not in the little deep holes, as ends of them hung down to their very feet, ὕποκυνδρια, &c. (as the same Josephus speaks) "for comeliness sake," that they might appear more goodsly to the beholders: which agrees to what Moses saith in the next verse, that they (as all the priestly garments, ver. 3), were made for glory and beauty. But when they went about any holy work belonging to the sanctuary, they left them over, in order, that they might not be a hinderance to them. The use of this girdle was to gird their coat close to them, which they tucked up also in the girdle (when they went about their ministry) to the middle of their legs, that it might not encumber them in their services.

Needlework.] This was a different sort of word from ἄναβεθ (which we translate broderied, ver. 4), and from ἀναβεθ (which we translate cunning, ver. 6, 15), and is here called ῥοκεν; which signifies the same with ἀναβεθ as to the variety of colours and figures in the work: but ῥοκεθ, as the Hebrew doctors tell us, was done by weaving, and ῥοκεν with a needle, as we rightly take it. Of the two, ῥοκεθ was the most artificial, as the word seems to intimate; being wrought on both sides with the same figures, whereas ῥοκεν was only on one side. This they gather from xxxi. 31, where the veil is ordered to be made of the work called ῥοκεθ, which it is probable was glorious on both sides, both within and without the most holy place. Josephus saith, this girdle was wrought with flowers of the several colours mentioned xxxiv. 29.

Ver. 40. For Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats. The coats of all the priests, as well as of the high-priest, were embroidered, as Maimonides expressly affirms. And it seems to be the sense of ver. 4, where he is commanded to make garments not only for Aaron, but for his sons (i.e. all the rest of the priests), among which the broderied coat may well be thought to belong to them (see xxxiv. 27).

Make for them girdles.] The girdles of the inferior priests were the same very with that of the high-priest (as well as their tunics or coats), being to bind their coats to their body.

Bonnets.] How these differed from the mitre of the high-priest, in their form, not in their matter, see ver. 37.

For glory and for beauty.] The garments of all the priests were contrived to make them appear in a splendid and comely manner, when they ministered to the glorious majesty of God, being of fine linen, which was worn by the greatest persons, made with the greatest art, especially them coats and girdles, which were finely adorned (as I have shown in the verses foregoing) with elegant figures and rich colours: for blue, or sky-colour, purple and scarlet, belonged to kings and persons of honour. But the garments of the high-priest were above all the rest most glorious, and designed so to be (ver. 2). For besides these, there were the high-priest and the high-priest's garments, which were very costly, he had others far more precious; particularly the ephod and its girdle, the breastplate set with stones of great value, the robe, and the crown of gold. The two stones also on the shoulders of the ephod, were not only precious in their kind, but for their bigness; being so large, that twelve names were engraven in them, containing six-and-thirty letters, which, as considered, Philo had reason to say (L. de Sacerd. Hon.) it is manifest the law dressed up their priest. βασιλεύς αὐτὸν καὶ τιμίως, "to the venerableness and honour of a king." For the priesthood in old time was so honourable, that kings themselves discharged it; which is the reason that in Scripture princes and priests have the same name of κοσμεῖν. To all which, it may add, that they took such care all their garments should be for glory and beauty, that when they were foul, they did not wash them, nor repair them when they had any breach in them; but new ones were bought, and the old employed about the lamps in the feast of tabernacles (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11, p. 1129).

Ver. 41. Put on your Aaron.] As we read he did, Lev. viii. 6, 7, &c. 13; and this was part of Aaron's consecration, ver. 3 of this chapter.

Anoint them.] He anointed Aaron by pouring the holy oil upon his head (Lev. viii. 13); but he anointed his sons only by sprinkling some of it upon their garments (as he did upon his own) with the blood of the sacrifice (xxix. 21). Lev. viii. 33, 34.

Consecute them.] By the sacrifice of a ram, called the ram of consecration, the blood of which he put upon the tip of their right ear, &c. (xxix. 20) Lev. viii. 22, 23, &c.) and by the wave-offering which he put into their hands, that they might wave them before the Lord, xxix. 21; Lev. viii. 27, from whence the phrase for consecrate here in this place is in Hebrew fill their hand.

Sanctify them.] By the foregoing ceremonies. For they were set apart to the Divine service, by putting on their garments, anointing them, and offering the sacrifice of consecration, and by washing them with water, as appears from Lev. viii. 6, 7, 12, where it is said, he anointed Aaron to sanctify him; and ver. 30, that they may minister unto me in the priest's office.

42 And thou shalt make them linen breeches to cover their nakedness; from the loins even unto the thighs they shall reach:

43 And they shall be upon Aaron, and upon his sons, when they come into the tabernacle of the congregation, or when they come near unto the altar to minister in the holy place; that they bear not iniquity, and die: it shall be a statute for ever unto him and his seed after him.

Ezek. xlii. 14, xliv. 17—19, an express precept for putting off the priests' garments, and laying them up in the chambers appointed for that purpose, when they went out of the court where they ministered. The high-priest, as Maimonides informs us, had a chamber, or vestry, peculiar to himself, where his garments were laid up, when he put them off, as the robes of kings are in their wardrobe. Of this one cannot reasonably doubt, that they, being not only precious, but sacred things, were kept safe in the temple, which was a holy place. And so were the garments of the inferior priests, as we may learn from Ezra and Nehemiah: who, among other things put into the treasury, mention a certain number of priests' garments (Ezra ii. 69; Nehem. vii. 70). In their vestries also there were peculiar chests, where every sort of vestment was kept by itself. All the breeches, for instance, which had this inscription, Mikhwe, i.e. breeches. In like manner, all the costs and the bonnets had two distinct chests, with this inscription, Kolomith and Mignoth: and so had the rest, as we are told in the Misra Tamid, cap. 5.

But while they were in the temple, they might keep on their holy garments (only not sleep in them there) even at these hours when they did not minister. Which this text seems to suppose, when it saith, they shall be upon them, when they come into the tabernacle, as well as when they come near unto the altar in their minister. Thus the Talmudists: in the temple they might keep on their garments, whether in the time of their ministration, or out of it. But this they understand only of their breeches, their coat, and bonnet: for their girdle they were bound to lay aside as soon as they had done ministering.

That God do not punish them with death, for being so profane as to appear before him without their holy garments, which he appointed to preserve his service from contempt.

It shall be a statute for ever unto him and his seed after him.] That is, as long as there shall be any priest of the name of Aaron, the blood of Christ which God has appointed to them in these garments. But that priesthood being abolished by the true eternal priesthood of Christ, there is no longer any use of them; no more than of the sacrifices those priests offered, which are completed in the sacrifice of Christ. As for the Jewish sense of these words, it is manifest that it hath been long confuted; there having been no priesthood, nor holy garments, nor sacrifices, no, nor temple among them, for above sixteen hundred years. Nay, before the coming of our Saviour, some of the priestly ornaments, and those the chief of all, were gone, viz. the urim and thummim in the breastplate; which they generally confessed were not in the second temple: and it may be a question, whether they continued to the end of the first. But the truth is, there was the breastplate and the ephod, and consequently the urim and thummim, as to its matter and form (though it had lost its use, there being no answers from God given by it), and accordingly all the rest of the priestly garments remained as long as there was any priesthood; which is the full sense of these words, a statute for ever to him, and his seed after him.
CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1.] Having ordered Aaron and his sons to be set apart to attend upon him in his house as his ministers; he now directs how they should be hallowed (or made holy) — that is, separated to his service in the priest’s office.

To minister unto me in the priest’s office: This was the separation of their separation from other men, as was often said before (xxvii. 1, 3, 4, 41, 43).

Take one young bullock, and two rams without blemish. There were several things to be done before this, though this was the chief. For they were to be washed, and robed with their priestly garments, and anointed; and then they were completed by peculiar sacrifices, which are directed and described, ver. 10, 11, &c., and put in execution, Lev. viii. 1, 2, &c.

Unleavened bread, &c.] Together with the foregoing sacrifices (which it will appear hereafter were of several sorts), there was a mineko to be offered, bread being necessary at a table together with flesh. And this consisted of three parts; unleavened bread, unleavened cakes tempered with oil, and unleavened wafers (or thin cakes, like to our pancakes) anointed with oil, before they were put into the pan to befried. All these were to be made of wheaten flour: and the two last were accounted a delicious food among the Greeks, as Athenæus tells us, lib. iii. Deipnosophi.

Ver. 3. Put them into one basket, &c.] All these, making but one meat-offering, were to be put into one basket, and so brought to the door of the tabernacle, to be presented there to God, together with the bullock and rams (ver. 23).

Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle. To be presented unto God, together with their sacrifice. Wash them with water. This was the first thing that was done for the hallowing them (ver. 1); as we read Lev. viii. 6, and was performed, some think, at the laver, which is directed to be made in the next chapter (xxx. 18, 19), where they were to repeat this washing every time they went in to minister to God. But now, I take it to be more likely, at their first consecration, water was brought from thence to wash them at the door of the tabernacle, before they were permitted to enter into it. Whether their whole bodies were now washed, is not said; but we may probably gather that they were; for they were now looked on as wholly unclean (being unhallowed), and therefore were to be washed all over; though, being once cleansed, they needed not do more, when they went to minister, but only wash their hands and their feet; which agrees with our Saviour’s words, John iv. 6 And Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shalt wash them with water.

5 And thou shalt take the garments, and put upon Aaron the coat, and the robe of the ephod, and the ephod, and the breastplate, and gird him with the curious girdle of the ephod:

6 And thou shalt put the mitre upon his head, and put the holy crown upon the mitre.

7 Then shalt thou take the anointing oil, and pour it upon his head, and anoint him.

Ver. 5. Take the garments.] Their bodies being washed, they were, next of all, robed with these garments prescribed in the foregoing chapter. The order wherein these garments were put on, according to the Talmudists, was this: first the breeches were put on by the priest himself, and that privately; which is the reason, perhaps, they are not here mentioned. They being tied about his loins, Moses put upon him the close coat, which came down to his ankles. Then this being bound to him by the girdle (which went round several times about him under the arm-holes), he put upon him his bonnet. This was the manner of habiting an ordinary priest. But when the high-priest was consecrated, after the girdle, before named, was put on the robe, with the ephod and breastplate, and then his mitre; to which was added the golden plate, tied with a blue ribbon upon his forehead (see Selden de Succession, ad Gloss. lib. ii. cap. 8).

Ver. 6. Put the holy crown upon the mitre.] By this crown is meant nothing else but the golden plate, on which was written holiness to the Lord (xxviii. 30): which is expressly called by the name of a crown, xxxix. 30; Lev. vii. 9, being bound upon the forehead with a blue ribbon like a diadem. Josephus seems to mean by the mitre the crown (lib. vi. Halos. cap. 15), but then he immediately adds, πέτερα της ἱπποστοίχιος κατασκευασμένος, &c., “about which there was another golden crown, having holy letters written in it;” &c. (vide Selden, lib. ii. de Succession. cap. 7).

Ver. 7. Take the anointing oil.] The next thing that was done for the consecration of Aaron, was anointing him with that oil which God ordered to be made, xxx. 31, 32, &c.

Pour it upon his head, and anoint him.] The Jews seem to think these two distinct things, pouring oil on his head, and then anointing him. The manner of which they say was thus: the oil being poured upon his head, which ran down to his face, he that anointed him drew with his finger the figure of the Greek letter chi (or St. Andrew’s cross) upon his forehead between his eyebrows. This was done, Aben Ezra thinks, before his mitre was put upon his head. But that is contrary to the order here set down, which prescribes the putting on all his priestly garments (of which this was one) before the anointing. And he was therefore to be anointed in all his habiliments, because he was anointed to minister unto God; which he could not do without all the holy garments (xxviii. 12), particularly this, it being unlawful to appear before God with the head uncovered; as it was also among the gentiles. Other of the Jewish doctors therefore think, xiii. 10. Such washings, everybody knows, were in use among the gentiles before they offered sacrifice.
8 And thou shalt bring his sons, and put coats upon them.
9 And thou shalt gird them with girdles, Aaron and his sons, and put the bonnets on them: and the priest's office shall be their's for a perpetual statute: and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons.
10 And thou shalt cause a bullock to be brought before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the bullock.

that when his head was wrapped about with the mitre, a place was left bare upon his crown for the pouring the oil upon it. Certain it is, that it was so poured on his head, as to run down upon his beard (Ps. xxxiii. 9). And the Jews say, the form of the letter chi was drawn upon his forehead to distinguish his anointing from that of their kings; who were anointed in the form of a circle, or crown (see Selden de Succession, lib. ii. cap. 9). Where he observes also, that there being no holy oil all the time of the second temple after the captivity, they made high-priests only by putting on their holy garments. Which that they might have complete, they made an imitation of urim and thummim (though they had not the oracle itself), that none of those eight garments might be wanting. So Maimonides.

The only remaining difficulty is, whether all Aaron's sons were anointed as well as himself. And Mr. Selden, in the place before named, thinks they were at the first, but not in future times: though all Aaron's successors in the high-priesthood were consecrated by anointing, as long as the holy oil lasted: that is, to the captivity of Babylon, or, as some say, fifty years before, when it was hid, and no more found. And there is a place in the next chapter which seems to favour this opinion (xxx. 30). But as we read of no command for their anointing, as there is here for Aaron's: so, when this command came to be executed, it is said expressly, that Moses poured oil on Aaron's head; but that upon his sons he only put the holy garments (Lev. viii. 12, 13). And therefore he is peculiarly called, "the high-priest from among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured" (Lev. xxi. 10). The anointing therefore of his sons (xxx. 30), is only meant of that unction which was made by pouring, in a sort, where a mixture is ordered to be made of the blood of the sacrifice and of their anointing oil, which was ordered to be sprinkled both upon Aaron and his sons, and upon their garments, and was a part of their consecration. For it was done accordingly at that time, as we read Lev. viii. 30. So that Aaron himself had a double unction; one proper to him alone, as high-priest upon whom the holy oil was poured; another common to him with his sons, as he was a priest, whose garments were sprinkled with the oil and blood mingled together.

Ver. 8. Bring his sons, and put coats upon them.] The high-priest was first habited, and then his sons, in the order I have described (ver. 5).

V. 9. With girdles.] See ver. 5.

The priest's office shall be their's, &c.] That is, as long as the holy garments were upon them, the priesthood was upon them: but if they were not upon them, neither was the priesthood upon them. They are the words of Maimonides in Celi Hammidkash, cap. 10. Or the meaning may be, they shall enjoy in perpetual succession the office of priests, as their father and his successors the office of high-priests.

Consecrate Aaron and his sons.] Thus doing, they shall be completely consecrated. For in the Hebrew the phrase is, shall fill the hand of Aaron, &c., which was done after the manner prescribed, ver. 23-24, &c. Which shows that this was the principal part of their consecration: or, at least, the consummation of it. And there was, besides this, a peculiar offering, which both Aaron and his sons are commanded to offer, in the day of their anointing (Lev. vi. 20, 21).

Ver. 10. Thou shalt cause a bullock.] The young bullock he commanded him to take (ver. 1).

To be brought before the tabernacle.] In order to its being offered to God: for in this and in the following verses, the sacrifices are prescribed which were to be offered by the sons of Aaron: which were these: the first is this here mentioned, which was an offering for sin, as appears from ver. 14. For all their sins were expiated, they were not fit to offer any thing to God; much less to offer for the sins of others. The next was a holocaust; or whole burnt-offering, as a gift or present, whereby they were recommended to God. And the third was a peace-offering; on which they made a feast, and by that were initiated into God's family.

Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the bullock.] This was the form in all sacrifices, both burnt-offerings (Lev. i. 4) and peace-offerings (Lev. iii. 2, 8), by which they devoted the sacrifice to be the Lord's. But in sin-offerings, there being a solemn confession of sins made (Lev. xvi. 21), he that laid his hands on the beast, seemed thereby to have transferred the guilt from himself unto the sacrifice, desiring it might be accepted for him.

Ver. 11. Kill the bullock before the Lord.] Though Moses was never consecrated after the manner of Aaron, yet he was made a priest, for this peculiar purpose: for this is expressed in this chapter, "By the door of the tabernacle." Where the altar of burnt-offering was placed, at the erection of the tabernacle (Ex. 6, 29).

Ver. 12. Take of the blood of the bullock, and put it upon the horns of the altar.] Some have fancied that he means upon the horns of the altar of incense: because, when a priest offered a sin-offering for himself, he was so to do (Lev. iv. 27), that it is to be considered, that Aaron and his sons, for whom this sacrifice was offered, were not yet priests, but common men, who, by this sacrifice, were to be made priests: whose blood therefore was to be put upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, as is expressly required in other sin-offerings (Lev. iv. 25, 30).

Pour all the rest.] See ver. 7. All the rest of the blood.

Beside the bottom of the altar.] This shows he speaks of the altar of burnt-offerings; at the bottom of which there was a trench, into which they poured the blood of the sacrifice, as I shall show hereafter.

Ver. 13. Take all the fat that covereth the inwards.] He means that part of the beast which is called theomentum, in which all the bowels are wrapped, which in Lev. ix. 12, is simply called that which covereth. This hath a great deal of fat upon it, to keep the 14 But the flesh of the bullock, and his skin, and his dung, shalt thou burn without the camp: it is a sin offering.

15 ¶ Thou shall also take one ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram.

16 And thou shalt slay the ram, and thou shalt take his blood, and sprinkle it round about upon the altar.

17 And thou shalt cut the ram in pieces, and wash the inwards of him, and his legs, and put them unto his pieces, and unto his head.

18 And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt offering unto the Lord: it is a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

19 ¶ And thou shalt take the other ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram.

20 Then shalt thou kill the ram, and take of his blood, and put it upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron, and upon the tip of the right ear of his sons, and upon the thumb of their right hand, and upon the great toe of their right foot, and sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about.

15 Ver. 15. One of the rams mentioned above (ver. 1).

16 Ver. 16. Slay the ram. Where the bullock was killed, by the door of the tabernacle (ver. 11).

16 Ver. 17. Cut the ram in pieces. That the parts might the more easily be burnt upon the altar.

16 Ver. 18. Wash the inwards of him, &c. Upon which there was a great deal of fat; which being put upon the pieces, and the head, made them consume the sooner, by nourishing the flames. Thus Homer represents the sacrifice of the Greeks (as Bochart observes), when they offered to Jupiter; "they cut the thighs in pieces, and then covered them over with fat."

16 Ver. 19. Take the other ram. Mentioned ver. 1.

20 Ver. 20. Where the bullock was killed, which was first offered, ver. 11.

16 Ver. 19. Take the other ram. Mentioned ver. 1.

19 Ver. 19. Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram. See ver. 10. This, it will appear afterward (ver. 28, 32), was a peace-offering: upon which, being now reconciled to God and received into his favour, they feasted with him at his table.

20 Ver. 20. Where the bullock was killed, which was first offered, ver. 11.

16 Ver. 19. Take of his blood. Which was received in a basin. Put it upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron, &c. This being peculiarly called the ram of consecration, ver. 22, 31, the blood of it was not put upon the horns of the altar (as in the first sacrifice, ver. 13), nor merely sprinkled round about the altar (as in the second, ver. 16), but put upon Aaron and his sons. And first upon the tip of their ears, to signify that they should hearken to the Divine prescriptions; and then upon their thumbs and great toes (in which lie the strength of the hands and feet), to denote their ready and strenuous performance of every thing required of them. And being put upon the tip of their right ear, and the
And thou shalt take of the blood that is upon the altar, and of the anointing oil, and sprinkle it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the garments of his sons with him: and he shall be hallowed, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him.

Also thou shalt take of the ram the fat and the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and the right shoulder; for it is a ram of consecration:

thump of their right hand, and the great toe of their right foot, it may well be thought to signify the most exact and perfect obedience; the right hand being commonly the most excellent and strongest to do any execution. To this purpose Abarbinel discourses on this place, whose words are these: "All this tended to make the priest understand that he ought to apply himself diligently to the study of the law; and to employ his hands with the same diligence in his sacred ministry; and to walk in the way of God's precepts," &c. Some of the Jews consider these things so scrupulously, as to say the priests might not use their left hand in their ministry, no more than minister with unwashed hands.

Sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about. i. e. The remainder of the blood. It is no improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Scaccucus, that from hence the heathens learnt their taurobolia and cristobola; which in process of time they disguised with infernal rites and ceremonies. For a deep hole being made in the ground, the priest to be consecrated was put into it; and then planks being laid over it, with a great many holes in them, the bullock or the ram was slain over them, and their blood running down into the hole, the priest received it on his eyes, his ears, his nose, his mouth; nay, he besmeared his body with it. And whereas, it was accounted the highest consecration of a priest; the virtue of which lasted twenty years before it was renewed; and he that was thus consecrated, was had in the greatest honour and veneration. Thus filthily did the devil pervert the most simple and cleanest rites which Moses prescribed, of putting a little blood, with a fragrant oil, on the tip of one of their ears, thumbs, and toes (Myrtothee. ii. Sac. Elias.)

Ver. 21. Take of the blood that is upon the altar. Some of that which was sprinkled (as the foregoing verse directs) round about the altar. Or, perhaps, some of the blood was left in the basin upon the altar for that use.

And of the anointing oil. Which is afterward ordered to be made (xxxi. 25, &c.) By which sprinkling, both they and their garments were separated to a holy use, as it follows in the next words, "and he shall be hallowed, and his garments," &c. (see upon ver. 7.) This may be looked upon as a lively representation of our purification by the blood of Jesus Christ, and by his Holy Spirit.

Ver. 22. Also thou shalt take of the ram the fat. All the fat in general was to be the Lord's (Lev. iii. 3.)

The rump. Here he seems to reckon up the particulars. And the rump of a sheep was the principal in those eastern countries, where their tails are of a prodigious bigness, and exceeding fat, as Bochart observes, par. 1. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 45, and Job Ludolphus in his Histor. lib. i. cap. 10, n. 16, and in his Comment. in Histor. lib. i. cap. 10, n. 76.

And one loaf of bread, and the cake of oil'd bread, and one wafer out of the basket of the unleavened bread that is before the Lord. But now it was to be burnt upon the altar (ver. 25), because they were not yet priests, as the following words tell us, which give the reason why this shoulder was burnt.

For it is a ram of consecration. Whereby they were consecrated, and made priests, but not yet completed, and therefore could not eat of that shoulder.

Ver. 24. Thou shalt put oil. Both bread and cakes, and fat, and right思念 upon Aaron and in the hands of his sons. Thence this sacrifice was called mellismam, that is, filling of the hands: which we translate consecration. And their hands were thus filled, to show that Aaron and his sons did not usurp this dignity, or take it upon themselves (as we speak), but were called unto it by God, who ordered these things to be put into their hands, that they might present them to him. R. Solomon will have this ram called the ram of fillings or impieties; because by this sacrifice they were completed, and absolutely made priests; nothing remaining to be done after this.

Wave them. When such holy things were put into the hands of the officers by the priest, then the priest put his hands under theirs, and they were lifted up, and then waved without on all sides.

For a wave offering. The Hebrew word tenuphah signifies agitation, or shaking to and fro; which Abarbinel saith, was performed upward and downright, and then round about to all quarters of the world, to signify that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof; or rather, that he is the possessor of heaven and of earth. Others of them speak to the same purpose.

Before the Lord. Standing with their faces towards the sanctuary.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt receive them. After they had waved them, they delivered them into the hands of Moses; who, as the priest at this time, laid them upon the altar, and burnt them.

For a burnt offering. It is certain this was not a whole burnt-offering, but a peace-offering, as appears from ver. 28, 31, 32; yet some of it being burnt on the altar, that part is called a burnt-offering.

It is an offering made by fire. So the burnt-offerings are called, Lev. i. 9, 13, &c., but this was so only in part, as I said, not in the whole; and may be interpreted by Lev. iii. 3, where all that was to be burnt of the peace-offerings, is commanded to be burnt upon the burnt-sacrifice, and in that regard might be called a burnt-offering (see ver. 27).
offering before the Lord: and it shall be thy part.

27 And thou shalt sanctify the breast of the wave offering, and the shoulder of the heave offering, which is waved, and which is heaved up, of the ram of the consecration, even of that which is for Aaron, and of that which is for his sons:

28 And it shall be Aaron's and his sons' by a statute for ever from the children of Israel: for it is an heave offering: and it shall be an heave offering from the children of Israel of the sacrifice of their peace offerings, even their heave offering unto the Lord.

29 And the holy garments of Aaron shall be his sons after him, to be anointed therein, and to be consecrated in them.

30 And that son that is priest in his stead shall put them on seven days, when he cometh into the tabernacle of the congregation to minister in the holy place.

31 And then shall he take the ram of the consecration, and wave his flesh in the holy place.

32 And Aaron and his sons shall eat the flesh of the ram, and the bread that is in the basket, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

33 And they shall eat those things wherewith the atonement was made, to consecrate and to sanctify them: but a stranger shall not eat thereof, because they are holy.

Ver. 26. Take the breast of the ram of Aaron's consecration] Of the consecration of him and of his sons.

Wave it—before the Lord: and it shall be thy part.] Being a peace-offering, the priest who offered the sacrifice was to have his share of it; and therefore the breast is here given to Moses, after he had acknowledged it to be God's by waving it about, and that he had it only as his minister.

Upon the second occasion, he makes a general law, to be always observed hereafter: that though, in this peculiar case, the right shoulder of this sacrifice was burnt (being for Aaron's consecration) and called a burnt-offering (ver. 25), yet, in all future times, both the breast and this shoulder should belong unto the priest. Therefore the word sanctify here signifies as much as declare them sanctified, or set apart for the priest's use: as the parts were again by an express law (Lev. vii. 31—34).

Which is waved, and which is heaved up.] There is no difference, that I can find, between terumah, which we translate heave-offering, and terumah, which we translate wave-offering: but the former was only lifted up and so waved, and the other was waved all manner of ways, up and down, east, west, north, and south; to signify that He to whom it was offered was Lord of the whole world, and all that therein is.

Ver. 28. It shall be Aaron's and his sons' by a statute for ever.] So it is called Lev. vii. 31, and it is again repeated for greater confirmation, Deut. xviii. 3.

It is an heave-offering.] It is consecrated to God, to whom it belongs; and he bestows it upon his ministers.

It shall be an heave offering—if the sacrifice of their peace offerings, &c.] And it shall always in future times be presented unto God as his part of the peace-offerings: who constitutes the priests to eat it in his stead. As the former ram was a burnt-offering, so this it plain was a peace-offering: in token that now they were in a state of perfection, and consecrated with God. Which was procured by their sin-offering (ver. 11), which was offered first; whereby their present to God (ver. 15), was made acceptable, as now their persons were declared by this sacrifice of peace-offering.

Ver. 29.] Upon this occasion, also, God makes another general law, that all the successors of Aaron in the high-priestly and chief ministerial office, in such garments, and by such an anoint, and such sacrifices, as he was consecrated withal. And it appears by Numb. xx. 28, that Aaron's son was invested with the very same garments which Aaron wore: for those which peculiarly belonged to the high-priest did not decay as the tunic and breeches did, and therefore the son might wear them.

Ver. 30. And that son that is priest in his stead shall put them on seven days.] This was to be done seven days, one after another, that a Sabbath might pass over him. For no man could be a complete high priest, as the Jews imagine, till a Sabbath had gone over his head. But the principal intention of this was that he might be made a priest with great solemnity and deliberation: and put on his habit so often, that he might learn how to appear in them after a decent, or rather magnificent manner, before he undertook to minister. Yet the Jews say, that if he did offer sacrifice before the seventh day, it was not accounted unlawful; provided he had been anointed, and had put them on once. So Maimonides, who adds, that he was to put them on by day, and not by night (see Selden de Successionibus, lib. ii. cap. 8). Where he shows (cap. 9), this is to be understood of his anointing also, which was to be by day, and not by night; and not repeated seven times. And by the same reason, the sacrifices were also to be repeated: though if he ministered before they were offered, the doctors held it not to be illegitimate; as he shows in the end of that chapter.

When he cometh into the tabernacle] At his entrance into the tabernacle he was to put them on for seven days together, before he could go to minister in the sanctuary.

Ver. 31. Take the ram of the consecration.] That is, all the rest of the flesh which was not burnt on the altar nor given to Moses. Who having had their share (ver. 22, 26), the remainder, as the manner was in peace-offerings, belonged to those that brought the sacrifice.

Wave his flesh in the holy place.] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as we read expressly, Lev. viii. 31, and as it is explained in the next verse, that there they should eat it. Fire was taken from the altar to boil it.

Ver. 32. Aaron and his sons shall eat the flesh of the ram.] That is, feast with God in his own house, as persons now completely qualified to minister unto his priesthood with him.

Bread that is in the basket.] All the remaining bread and cakes, which were presented unto God, after that which was burnt upon the altar, as his part (ver. 23, 24, &c.).

By the door of the tabernacle] Hence it appears, that this sacrifice had something in it peculiar from other peace-offerings; which might be carried home and eaten there, after God and the priests had had their parts. But this was to be eaten in God's own house, where they were ministers, as a thing more holy: and therefore Aaron and his sons and daughters could not eat of it, as all the family did of other sacrifices of this kind.

Ver. 33. They shall eat those things] Aaron and his sons alone were to eat them; and nobody else with them.
31 And if ought of the flesh of the consecrations, or of the bread, remain unto the morning, then thou shalt burn the remainder with fire: it shall not be eaten, because it is holy.

32 And thus shalt thou do unto Aaron, and to his sons, according to all things which I have commanded thee: seven days shalt thou consecrate them.

33 And thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin offering for atonement: and thou shalt cleanse the altar, when thou hast made an atonement for it, and thou shalt anoint it, to sanctify it.

37 Seven days thou shalt make an atonement for the altar, and sanctify it; and it shall be an altar most holy: whatsoever toucheth the altar shall be holy.

38 ¶ Now this is that which thou shalt offer upon the altar; two lambs of the first year day by day continually.

[Wherewith the atonement was made.] The atonement was not made by these things, but by the bullock, which was offered in the first place; which made them fit to have their hands filled with these things (as the Hebrew phrase is for consecrating, ver. 23, 24) to complete their sanctification. And therefore the words should be thus translated, they sanctified those things for whom the atonement (or expiation) was made.

To consecrate and to sanctify them.] Their consecration and sanctification began by the sacrifice for sin; and was completed by this now mentioned.

But a stranger shall not eat thereof.] None that are not of the family of Aaron, to whom alone this holy food belonged. Nor were all the priests allowed to eat of it, though they might eat of other peace-offerings; but only Aaron and his sons: who being consecrated persons, were to eat these things, which had a special holiness in them, being part of the sacrifice of consecration; and therefore appointed only to such persons as had been consecrated.

Because they are holy.] Had a special holiness, as it is said in them; which made it fit only for such persons to eat them.

Ver. 31. If ought of the flesh—remain.] He and his sons being not able to eat it all.

Then thou shalt burn the remainder.] This is a further argument, that there was a peculiar holiness in this sacrifice, of which only Aaron and his sons might eat; for if this had been like to the flesh of other peace-offerings, it might, according to the following law, have been kept two days before it was eaten (Lev. vii. 15, 16, &c.).

It shall not be eaten.] Upon the second day.

Because it is holy.] Is of more than ordinary sanctity; being offered to make men holy to God: and therefore the power of the sacrifice should not be in danger to be in the least corrupted.

Ver. 35.] This is the sum of what I have to command thee, concerning the consecration of Aaron, and of his sons.

Seven days shall thou consecrate them.] They shall not be made complete priests, in less time than I have appointed. Which no doubt was to make them sensible of the weight of their office.

Ver. 36. Offer every day a bullock for a sin offering for atonement.] Lest he should think that only the raim of consecration should be offered seven days together, he here expressly directs the bullock for a sin-offering should be so often repeated. The reason of it, follows; because it was for atonement.

Which appears by the next verse: for although it was not the office of the priest, but of the altar itself, which was, by this sacrifice, made fit for God’s service. And that is the reason, perhaps, why he saith, in the plural number, it was for atonements. So the Hebrew text.

Cleanse the altar, when thou hast made an atonement for it.] The altar was not so guilty of sin as to need an atonement; therefore this word atonement is here used improperly, to signify that, by these repeated sacrifices, it was set apart to be a place where expiation should be made. Or simply, this expiation of the altar was no more, but, of a common, making it a sacred place: or, as Fortunatus Saceanus understands it, it was purified by these rites from that defilement it must be supposed to have contracted, by the hands of the workmen that made it: for all vessels, in the sense of the law, were looked upon as made unclean, by the touch of any unclean person. And therefore perhaps the altar was also washed with water, as the priests were; which is here called its cleansing.

Atonit it, to sanctify it.] To perfect its sanctification or separation from common use, it was anointed with the holy oil (mentioned in the next chapter), as Aaron and his sons were; and thus, by the blood of the bullock it was expiated, so by this anointing it was consecrated; which is meant by sanctifying it.

Ver. 37. Seven days thou shalt make an atonement for the altar.] Many think that these were not distinct seven days from those in which the priests were expiated and consecrated; as the bullock for the cleansing of the altar, was not a distinct bullock from that for the priests: but the same sacrifice served for both. This opinion I shall consider in the conclusion of this book (xl. 17, 18), and now only observe, that thus not only the priests among the heathen, but their altars also, were dedicated, by their taurobolium and eribolium (which I mentioned ver. 20), for we find an ancient inscription wherein the one is said to have set up taurobolintum, an altar consecrated, by besmearing it with the blood of those sacrifices, as Fortunatus Saceanus interprets it (Ib. cap. 69).

Make an atonement.] By the blood of the bullock.

Sanctifit it.] By anointing it with the holy oil. It shall be an altar most holy.] The reason why it is so called, is mentioned in the following words; because it was not only thus separated to a holy use, but made those things to be holy which were offered upon it. Which they could not be till it was thus expiated and sanctified. Therefore Fort. Saceanus expounds these words [an altar most holy] it shall be fully and completely consecrated, by observing all the rules which are here prescribed, for seven days together. Till the end of which no sacrifice whatsoever was offered on this altar (because it was not cleansing and sanctified to make them holy and acceptable), but on the eighth day, when all was performed that was required on the preceding seven days, fire came down from heaven, and consummated the burnt-offering (Lev. viii. 1, 2).

When thou touchest the altar shall be holy.] Nothing was acceptable unto God, unless it was offered upon this altar; which sanctified every thing that was laid upon it, according to God’s direction. Thus our Saviour seems to explain these words (Matt. xxviii. 19). The altar sanctifieth the gift. That was the name for all things presented unto God, which were called korbon; being destined to be offered at his altar.

Ver. 38. Now this is that which thou shalt offer upon
CHAPTER XXIX.

39 The one lamb thou shalt offer in the morning; and the other lamb thou shalt offer at even:

40 And with the one lamb a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil; and the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering.

41 And the other lamb thou shalt offer at even, and shalt do thereto according to the meat offering of the morning, and according to the drink offering thereof, for a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

42 This shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord: where I will meet you, to speak there unto thee.

43 And there I will meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory.

44 And I will sanctify the tabernacle of the

An offering made by fire i. c. A burnt-offering, as the next verse explains it.

Ver. 43. At the door of the tabernacle.] For there the altar of burnt-offerings stood, as we read, xl. 6, 29; Lev. xvii. 6, &c.

Before the Lord.] Who dwelt in the most holy place, in the upper end of the tabernacle.

Where I will meet you.] Their coming to worship in that place, is called drawing nigh to God: accordingly he promises to vouchsafe his gracious presence to them (see xxv. 23).

To speak there unto thee.] More especially, he promises to meet Moses there upon occasion; and to declare his mind and will to him, in such cases wherein he should consult him.

Ver. 43. And there I will meet with the children of Israel.] That they might not think his meeting with them (before mentioned) was only by revealing his mind to Moses, and so to them (as the last words of the foregoing verse might seem to intimate), he explains his meaning to be, that there he would grant tokens of his special love and favour to them all, when they approached unto him.

And the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory.] The glorious presence of God, which filled this house (xl. 35), was that which sanctified it, or made it a holy place. But some refer this not to the tabernacle, but to Israel (which is just before mentioned, and the word tabernacle not in the text), and the truth is, they were made a holy people also, by this glorious presence of God among them, in the tabernacle.

Ver. 44. I will sanctify, &c.] That is, manifest them to be sanctified; or still more completely sanctify them, by the appearance of the Divine Glory in the tabernacle (Lev. ix. 24).

The tabernacle of the congregation.] In the Hebrew, the name is odel arud, which signifies exactly the tabernacle of meeting: so called, not from the people's meeting there (as we seem to take it when we translate it, tabernacle of the congregation), but from God's meeting there with them, which is mentioned just before; and in the next chapter (xxx. 36), is expressly called the tabernacle of meeting (as I think it should be translated), where I will meet with thee. Which shows that this was the reason of its name (see also Numb. xvii. 4, and Mr. Mede, book ii. p. 436).

Now all the people could not come to attend upon the daily sacrifice, which was offered for them, and so to meet with God here; and yet it was a maxim among them, that “no man's sacrifice was accepted, unless he came at it with him.” Consequently, certain select persons chosen to wait upon God, in the name of all the rest (and there were twenty-four classes of them, as of the priests in David's time), called by the Jews stationary men; who never missed, when their course came, to attend on the Divine Majesty at the tabernacle, as the representatives of all their brethren, in pointing out which see Pet. Cumarus, lib. ii. de Repub. Jud. cap. 10, and our learned Dr. Lightfoot, in his Temple Service, cap. 7, sect. 3. congregation, and the altar: I will sanctify also both Aaron and his sons, to minister to me in the priest's office.

45 ¶ And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God.

46 And they shall know that I am the Lord their God, that brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, that I may dwell among them: I am the Lord their God.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 The altar of incense. 11 The ransom of souls. 17 The brazen laver. 22 The holy anointing oil. 34 The composition of the perfume.

1 And thou shalt make an altar to burn incense upon: of shittim wood shalt thou make it.

2 A cubit shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof; foursquare shall it be: and two cubits shall be the height thereof: the horns thereof shall be of the same.

3 And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, the top thereof, and the sides thereof round about, and the horns thereof; and thou shalt make unto it a crown of gold round about.

4 And two golden rings shalt thou make to it under the crown of it, by the two corners thereof, upon the two sides of it shalt thou make it; and they shall be for places for the staves to bear it withal.

5 And thou shalt make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold.

6 And thou shalt put it before the vail that is by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy seat that is over the testimony, where I will meet with thee.

burnt; and taken away with the coals, when that was done.

Make unto it a crown of gold round about. A border of gold which went about the brim or edge of it (see there, xxv. 24). This seems to have been made of massy gold, not of shittim wood, overlaid with gold.

Ver. 4. Two golden rings—under the crown of it. The golden crown arrose upward above the table, and these rings were fixed below it.

By the two corners thereof, upon the two sides. On each side of the altar, near the corners of it, were these golden rings annexed; at each of the four corners, one.

For places for the staves to bear it withal. This shows the use of the rings.

Ver. 5. Make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold. Just like the staves for the carriage of the ark and the table (xxv. 13, 28).

Ver. 6. Put it before the vail. In the midst of the house, between the candlestick and the table; though not just between, but something higher, towards the veil; where it was placed directly before the most holy place.

By the ark of the testimony. See xxv. 22.

Before the mercy seat. Towards which the priest looked when he offered incense; recommending to God the people and their prayers, which they were making without, while he burnt incense within.

There is no ground to think that this altar stood in the most holy place, as St. Austin and some others have conceived; for those words are a plain demonstration to the contrary (see Cunæus, lib. ii. de Repub Jud. cap. 5).
7 And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning: when he dresseth the lamps, he shall burn incense upon it.

8 And when Aaron lighteth the lamps at even, he shall burn incense upon it, a perpetual incense before the Lord throughout your generations.

9 Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon, nor burnt sacrifice, nor meat offering; neither shall ye pour drink offering thereon.

10 And Aaron shall make an atonement upon

Over the testimony:] That is, the ark; which is here simply called the testimony, as it is ver. 36, because it was the principal thing in the ark, xl. 20 (see xxxv. 32).

Where I will meet with thee.] Though Aaron and his sons might go no further than the holy place (except only once a year, when Aaron alone went into the most holy) to offer incense, before the mercy-seat; yet Moses had the privilege to consult the Divine Majesty, in the most holy place, where the Divine glory shined, as these words, and xxv. 22, ult. seem to intimate. For since he was admitted into the mount (as P. Cunaeus argues, in the place before mentioned) to speak with God face to face, for many days together; it is not unreasonable to think that he was admitted to speak with him, upon occasion, in the most holy place in the tabernacle.

Ver. 7. Aaron shall burn thereon] He did it at first; but afterwards his sons in their courses performed this service; as appears from Luke i. 8, 9, where Zacharias, who was not high-priest, offered the incense when it was to burn, "according to the custom of the priest's office."

Sweet incense.] For it was a compound of several spices, which were very fragrant, as appears by the latter end of this chapter.

Every morning: when he dresseth the lamps.] At the rising of the sun, the priests went in to look after the lamps which they had lighted in the evening before. The dressing of them, as the Hebrews describe it, consisted in cleansing the snuff-dishes, and snuffing those lamps they found burning, and supplying them with new oil; and in putting new cotton (as we now speak) and oil into those that were gone out, and lighting them at some of the lamps which still continued burning.

He shall burn incense upon it.] The manner of it is described by Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 9, sect. 5.

Ver. 8. When Aaron lighteth the lamps at even.] See concerning this xxvii. 29.

He shall burn incense.] As he did in the morning.

Perpetual incense.] In the same sense that the morning and evening sacrifice is called the perpetual burnt-offering (xxix. 38, 49), this is called perpetual incense, because it was never intermitted twice a day. And one reason why it was thus continually burnt, was, because of the vast number of beasts that were slain, and cut to pieces, and washed and burnt every day at the sanctuary; which would have made it smell like a shamble (as Maimonides speaks); if this swarming and evening sacrifice is called the perpetual burnt-offering, the morning sacrifice would have been contemptible, if there had been an ill smell constantly in it, as he truly observes (More Neviim, par. iii. 8, 14, and the garments of the priests who there ministered. Whence, saith he, that speech of our rabbins, "this sweet odour might be smelt as far as Jericho." Whereby the reverence due to God's house was preserved; which would have been contemptible, if there had been an ill smell constantly in it, as he truly observes (More Neviim, par. iii. 8, 14). The horns of it once in a year, for the sin offering of atonements: once in the year shall he make atonement upon it throughout your generations: it is most holy unto the Lord.

12 When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them.

Throughout your generations.] In all future ages.

Ver. 9. Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon.] None but that, which by God's own order is directed to be made, in the latter end of this chapter.

Nor burnt sacrifice, nor meat offerings, &c.] There was another altar appointed, without the holy place, for all these: which as they might not be offered anywhere else, so this altar was appropriated for an offering more grateful than all their burnt sacrifices, or meat and drink-offerings. So Porphyry seems to have learnt from this place (for he was acquainted with these books): "It is most fit to worship the god with incense, both because it is more grateful, and also more than expensive for blood offerings at all delight the gods." Accordingly we find in Numb. xvi. 46, 47, that the wrath of God was appeased, when it broke out in a plague upon the people, merely by offering incense, whereby he is said to make an atonement for them.

Ver. 10. Make an atonement upon the horns of it once in a year.] Only once a year, the blood of that great sin-offering, which was made for the general atonement of the people, was to be put upon the horns of this altar; though no sacrifice might be burnt upon it.

Once in a year.] Upon the great day of expiation, which was the tenth day of the seventh month: when the high-priest was first to go with the blood of the sin-offering into the most holy place, and sprinkle it before the mercy-seat, and then come out into the sanctuary, and there put the blood upon the horns of this altar, and sprinkle it upon it also with his finger seven times, as we read Lev. xvi. 18, 19.

Shall he make atonement upon it?] The atonement mentioned so often in this verse, seems to relate to the altar itself (as it is explained Lev. xvi. 18), which was hereby cleansed from the impurities, which it was supposed to be contaminated by the sins of those who constantly officiated there.

It is most holy unto the Lord.] This may be meant of that solemn expiation upon the day of atonement: which was the most holy rite in all their religion: for that sacrifice is called by the peculiar name of the sin-offering of atonement, or expiation (Numb. xxix. 11). Or, it may be explained of this altar itself; which by the words was to be separated to be sacred in the most holy service, in which none should presume to officiate, but they who were thereunto consecrated. Which was the reason of the heavy punishment upon king Uzziah, for attempting that which belonged to the priests only, as we read 2 Chron. xxvi. 18—20.

Ver. 11. The Lord spake unto Moses, saying:] This is often repeated in this chapter (ver. 17, 22, 25), and the next; to show that God did not deliver all his precepts to Moses in the mount without intermission; but gave him some time to rest, and then spake to him again.

Ver. 12. When thou tabest the sum of the children of Israel after their number:] This was done twice by God's own order (Numb. i. and xxvi.). From whence it doth not follow that it could not be done lawfully, without a special command; for there might be reasonable causes, why the rulers of the people might 13 This they shall give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary: (a shekel is twenty gerahs;) an half shekel shall be the offering of the Lord.

14 Every one that passeth among them that are numbered, from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the Lord.

15 The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel, when they give an offering unto the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls.

16 And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls.

17 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

18 Thou shalt also make a laver of brass, and

Ver. 15. The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less] They were all equally concerned in this tax, being for the support of the daily, weekly, monthly, and annual sacrifices; and for the providing salt, and wood, and the show-bread, &c.; whereby all Israel came to have an interest in whatsoever was done at the house of God all the year long. The priestly garments also were provided out of this money, and other things belonging to the Divine service, and to the reappointments of the house of God. See Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 10, n. 2, 3, 4, where he shows, that if any thing remained in the end of the year, after all these charges were defrayed, it was spent in the extraordinary burnt-offerings; which were called the second sacrifices of the alms.

When they give an offering unto the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls.] Whence this money is called in the next verse, keesep hakippurim, "the money of expiations." Which made every man, though never so poor, endeavour to raise it, though he sold his clothes to get it; and he that failed to pay this tribute, was separated from the congregation, and not excepted in the expiation (as in the Levii of Barcelona speaks, Precept, ev.); that is, was not partaker of the benefit of the expiatory sacrifices.

Ver. 16.] See the verse foregoing, and Neh. x. 32, 33, where we read of ordinances made, to charge themselves with the third part of a shekel, for the fore-mentioned uses; because the expenses were then so great, that half a shekel was not sufficient to maintain them.

That it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the Lord.] A testimony of their gratitude to God; who graciously accepted this acknowledgment of him, and spared their lives, which by their sins they had forfeited: this being a propitiation for them, because it procured propitiatory sacrifices to be offered on their behalf.

Ver. 17.] See ver. 11.

Ver. 18. Make a laver of brass.] There is nothing said, either here or xxxiii. 8, concerning the form or bigness of it. But we may probably think, that Solomon made a sea of brass, much bigger than this vessel (which was to be carried about with them in their travels in the wilderness), yet he made it of the same form; and that was circular, as we read, 2 Chron. iv. 2, 3, &c. And after their return from the captivity of Babylon, the laver was restored (as L'Empereur observes out of Maimonides, in his Annotations on Codex Middoth, cap. 3, sect. 6); but there is nothing to be found in the Talmudists concerning its dimensions.

Ver. 14.] Every man was bound to offer, whether priest or Levite, Israelite or stranger; except women, servants, and such as were under age. Yet, if any one of these did make a voluntary offering, it was accepted: only from a Gentle, who was an idolater, they would not accept it, as Maimonides tells us (see Selden, lib. iii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 4, p. 291).
his foot also of brass, to wash

\[\text{withal; and thou shalt put it between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, and thou shalt put water therein.}

19 For Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet thereat: 20 When they go into the tabernacle of the congregation, they shall wash with water, that they die not: and when they come near to the altar to minister, to burn offering made by fire unto the Lord:

\[\text{Put water therein.} \]

The heathens were so superstitious, as to think there was a greater virtue in some waters than in others for their lustration: particularly the Greeks (as Fort. Sencehous observes) would admit of no other water, in some of their greatest solemnities, but that from the springs Calvus. But the Divine institution was more simple, requiring merely spring water for all manner of purifications: only this water here mentioned was put into a vessel sanctified by a solemn unction (Ex. 11).

Ver. 19. For Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet thereat.] Which, that it might be done more conveniently, the Talmudists tell us there were twelve spouts or eocks, in the form of a woman's breast (whence they call them pops or dugs), to let the water out of the laver: so that the twelve priests, who attended upon the daily sacrifice, might wash there altogether. See L'Empereur, in the place above named, where he treats at large of this, and of the conveyance of water into the laver: which in the tabernacle (at least while they were in the wilderness) was brought thither every day in other vessels, and put into it, according to the direction in the conclusion of the foregoing verse.

Every one knows that the gentiles took great care of washing their hands before they sacrificed, as appears by many places in Homer (to name no other authors), who, in the first book of his Iliad, speaking of the great sacrifice that was preparing to be offered for the appeasing of Apollo, saith,

\[\text{Χρυσόκρους ἐπιμέλης, καὶ οἰλοκροντος ἄθλοσ.}

Upon which words Eustathius observes it as the ancient custom, before they sacrificed to wash their hands, дιὰ γὰρ καθαροῦ τῶν ἦλθαν γενέσθαι, “for none but those who were clean and pure might meddle with sacred things.” And again, in the third book,

\[\text{Αἴγυπτεσσας ἅλωσεν ἐπὶ χείλος ἔχον.}

“They poured water upon the hands of the kings:” οὐκ ἐπικαθώσασθαι ἔσθη, saith Eustathius, “as being about to sacrifice.” But I do not find in any author, that they were ever employed for any other than washing their hands (from whence came the proverb of doing things illitus manibus, see Erasmus in his Adages), being no mention of washing their feet: which was an extraordinary degree of purity, which God required in his priests, who ministered in his house barefoot: and so they did among the gentiles also, as appears by that saying of Pythagoras, mentioned by Jamblichus, χαράκτος εἶναι καὶ προσευχῆναι, “sacrifices and worship without shoes;” which St. Ambrose thinks was borrowed from Moses, lib. i. Epist. 6 (see Cuperus in his Apotheosis Homer., p. 185).

Ver. 20. When they go into the tabernacle—they shall wash with water.] This washing was not to be repeated before every act of their ministration; but it sufficed for all the service of that day, if they washed once before entering into the altar; and, after the great day of expiation, before five of the various duties then to be performed, the washing was to be renewed.

That they die not.] By the hand of Heaven, as the Jews speak; that is, of God, who punished such profanation, as ministering to him in their uncleanness, with death. And therefore also it is, that when a priest, in his person, was all without effect, whether he were the high-priest, or a common one, as R. Levi, of Barcetona, saith (Praecept. evi.). Or when they come near to the altar to minister.] Whether they were to go in to minister at the altar of incense in the tabernacle, (of which he speaks in the first words of this verse), or to offer sacrifices at the mirror altar, (of which he speaks in the verse before, they were to wash before they entered upon their service.

Ver. 21. So they shall wash their hands and their feet, that they die not.] There was no need of doing more, being washed once all over before they were consecrated (xxxix. 4), but their hands and feet were to be washed, upon pain of death, every day before they ministered.

It shall be a statute for ever to them.] As long as the tabernacle or temple stood.

Ver. 22. Take thou also unto thee principal spices.] So we rightly translate the Hebrew word рахим, which literally signifies heads: but thence, the chief of any kind of thing: the head being the principal or chief member of the body.

\[\text{And for the word becamin, which we translate spices, it seems to be a general name for all the following species, which are comprehended under it (see ver. 34).}

O of pure myrrh.] The Hebrew word וָרָצֶר, according to Maimonides, signifies musk; and David Kimchi commends their exhibition, who take it for a kind of frankincense: but the general opinion of the Hebrews, as well as of all other writers, is, that it signifies myrrh, which seems to be derived from the ancient word וָרָצֶר. And that being the best which flows from the shrub of itself, Moses is required to make use of such myrrh. For the word deror (which we translate pure or not adulterated) properly signifies freely flowing or dropping myrrh: which was far better than that which came out from the tree by incision. The fragrancy of this is taken notice of by a great number of authors; who also mention it as having a principal part in the composition of the most costly ointments, as Fort. Sencebous observes (lib. i. Myroth. Saer. Elseochyrm. cap. 51, 52, and lib. ii. cap. 8).

Fifty shekels.] That is, in weight; which 21 And of cassia five hundred shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, and of oil olive an hin:
25 And thou shalt make it an oil of holy ointment, an ointment compound after the art of the apothecary: it shall be an holy anointing oil.
26 And thou shalt anoint the tabernacle of the congregation therewith, and the ark of the testimony, was two hundred and fifty ounces; a shekel being as much as half an ounce of our weight.

Of sweet cinnamon half so much. There were two sorts of cinnamon; one that doth not smell very much; another which was very aromatic, and rarely to be found (Galen saith, in his time) but in the closet of kings. And therefore God commands Moses here to take not mere cinnamon, but with the addition of bsenem, which signifies sweet-scented. Salmusius in his Plin. Exercit. treats of both these spices.

Of sweet calamus two hundred and fifty shekels. This spice hath also the same addition of bsenem to it, because there was a calamus that was not sweet-scented; and that which was there held very precious, being not of the growth of Judea, but coming from distant places. So we read (Jer. vi. 20) of "sweet cane from a far country:" and Isaiah intimates (xxiii. 23, that it was a foreign commodity of great value; and Salmusius is positive, that there was no aromatic calamus grown out of India (Plin. Exercit. p. 1052). But Bochartus very well observes that there was no traffic, in all likelihood, in India in the days of Moses: and therefore they had it then from Arabia: where Dionysius Periegetes, together with frankincense and myrrh, mentions (in one and the same verse) θύμος κάλαμος, "sweet-smelling calamus." (see Hierozoic. vi. 26.)

Ver. 21. Of cinnamon five hundred shekels. There is no mention of this spice (which the Hebrews call kishlath) but here and in Ezek. xxvii. 19, where it is joined with calamus and reckoned among the precious things which were brought to the marts of Tyre. Therefore, it doth not signify that cinnamon is which is now used among purging medicines, but another mentioned by Pliny, together with calamus (lib. xiii. cap. 19). There being one sort of it called texcinamonum, because it was equal to cinnamon in virtue and in value (see Salmusius in his Plinianae Exercit. in Solin. p. 1302). But this sort of cassia differing but little from cinnamon, Fort. Seaccus thinks, for that very reason, we are here to understand by kishlath that aromatic plant which the ancients call costus; the best of which was brought out of Arabia, and was of a white colour, as he proves out of Aviceenna, Dioscorides, and Pliny. And it appears by Propertius it was used by the ancients, to be burnt on their altars, as well as frankincense:

'Costum molle date, et blandi nihil thoros honoris.' (Myrothec. Elaeochrys. par. ii. cap. 11, 12).

Shelol of the sanctuary. See ver. 13.

Of oil olive. Which was clear and free from all dregs (see xxix. 40).

An hin. I observed there that it contained a wine-gallon and two pints, and something more.

Ver. 25. And thou shalt make it. From hence, and from these words (ver. 23), "take thou unto thee sweet spices," &c., the Hebrew doctors conclude, that Moses made this holy oil with his own hands. Of which there is no certainty; much less that none ever adventured to make it after him: nay, it is evident that Bezaleel made it as well as all other things before mentioned (xxvii. 29).

27 And the table and all his vessels, and the candlestick and his vessels, and the altar of incense, 28 And the altar of burnt offering with all his vessels, and the laver and his foot.
29 And thou shalt sanctify them, that they may be most holy: whatsoever toucheth them shall be holy.
30 And thou shalt anoint Aaron and his sons,

An oil of holy ointment. To anoint with it all the things mentioned in the next verse; whereby they were sanctified (that is, set apart) for the service of God. It was not thick, like those compositions which we now call contumets, but thin as oil is; being nothing but oil, with an infusion of these strong spices, which made it have a comfortable scent. For it is observed by Dioscorides, that oil was very proper, εἰς τὴν τῶν μύρων κατασκευήν, "for the preparation of ointments:" odours being better preserved in oil than in any other liquor, as Pliny observes (lib. xiii. cap. 20). And this oil, no doubt, was the purest they could get (such as they brought for the light of the tabernacle, xxvii. 20) which would best imbibe the tincture.

After the art of the apothecary. Or ointment-maker; of whose art Theophrastus and Dioscorides give an account. But the manner of making this ointment, as Maimonides describes it, was thus: the spices were beaten severally (he should have excepted the myrrh, which was liquid), and then they were mixed together, and macerated in pure water, till all the virtue of them was extracted. Which being done, the hin of oil was poured upon them, and all was boiled upon the fire till the water was evaporated, and the oil alone remained (see Gull, Schiekkard in his Monephat Hamdeek, cap. i., p. 2, as oil is; being nothing but oil, with an infusion of these strong spices, which made it have a comfortable scent. For it is observed by Dioscorides, that oil was very proper, εἰς τὴν τῶν μύρων κατασκευήν, "for the preparation of ointments:" odours being better preserved in oil than in any other liquor, as Pliny observes (lib. xiii. cap. 20). And this oil, no doubt, was the purest they could get (such as they brought for the light of the tabernacle, xxvii. 20) which would best imbibe the tincture.

It shall be an holy anointing oil. Wherewith none were to be anointed but sacred persons and things.

Ver. 26. Anoint the tabernacle of the congregation therewith, &c. This and the following verses show the use of the holy oil; which was to consecrate or set apart every thing hereafter mentioned, to the service of God, whereby the sanctuary of God's house (as the Jews speak) was set forth: for anointing belonging only to kings and princes, this ceremony begat in people's minds a greater fear and reverence towards God himself, as Maimonides's words are (More Nevoh. par. iii. cap. 45).

Ver. 27. Here being such a particular mention of every thing that was in the sanctuary, he only here, when it was erected (xl. 9)., "Thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein," &c.

Ver. 28. In this verse he mentions all that was without the sanctuary, in the court of the Lord's house; of the mention whereof he also gives a particular charge (xl. 10, 11). And accordingly when he gives an account of the consecration of God's house (as the Jews speak) he also tells us how he executed these commands of anointing the tabernacle, and all that was in it; but more especially this altar, which he sprinkled seven times with the holy oil (Lev. viii. 10, 11). See there.

Ver. 29. Sanctify them. Separate all the forenamed things from common uses, to the service of God alone, by anointing them with this holy oil.

That they may be most holy. They were made hereby most holy, because, as it here follows, they made other things to be holy.

Whatever toucheth them shall be holy. As the gift was made holy by the altar, upon which it was laid (see xxix. 37).
and consecrate them, that they may minister unto me in the priest's office.

31 And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, This shall be an holy anointing oil unto me throughout your generations.

32 Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured, neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it: it is holy, and it shall be holy unto you.

33 Whosoever compoundeth any like it, or whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, shall even be cut off from his people.

34 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and

Ver. 33. Whosoever compoundeth any like it, &c.] That is, if any man broke either of the foregoing prohibitions, by making the like composition, or putting any of this upon one who was not a priest, he was liable to be cut off from Israel. What that is, see Gen. xvii. 14. The reason of these prohibitions is manifest, as Maimonides excellently discourses (More Nevechim. par. iii. cap. 15), which was, that this sweet odour being smelt nowhere else, men might be more in love with it in the sanctuary: and that none, by being anointed with the like, might fancy themselves better than others, from whence great dissensions and mischief might have arisen. The same may be said concerning the perfume (ver. 37, 38).

Kings, indeed, are said to have been anointed with this very oil; at least Solomon was (1 Kings i. 39, though we may doubt of David, who, though anointed king of Judah, 2 Sam. ii. 4), which was, I suppose, by special direction of the prophets; that the people might look upon them as sacred persons, and special ministers of God, for their good. The Jews also will have it, that he whom they call the anointed of war, that is, say the Jews, the priest mentioned, Deut. xx. 2, but I should rather think, the general who commanded their forces, in any sudden danger, was anointed also with this oil, that he might be inspired with courage, when he fought as a sacred person. So that they interpret the first words of the foregoing verse [upon man's flesh shall it not be poured] in this sense; "None shall be anointed with it but the high-priest, the anointed of war, and the kings of the house of David." For the kings of Israel were not anointed with it, but with simple balsam, as they also tell us.

Ver. 31. Take unto thee sweet spices.] There are the same words here in the Hebrew, that we had before (ver. 23), save only that there he saith, Take to thee rosamim (with the addition of rash, principal, or common), to translate sweet spices. How these two differ, interpreters of all sorts extremely vary; but they both seem to be general words, which contain the following species under them; and samim to signify spices of less value than be'arnim. The latter of which denote such spices as were either liquid or most proper to mix with oil, or other liquid things, to give them a fragrance, as Fort. Scarcehus thinks, who hath discussed these two words with great diligence, in his Elceochrysis. Myroth. par. ii. cap. 7.

Staete.] The Hebrew word signifies something that drops; which some have taken for b'hanam; but the LXX. translate it as we do; and Salmassius hath shown that it is the liquid part of myrth (not which flows of itself) which is put out by art (see Plin. Exercit. p. 629). The same Fort. Scarcehus, cap. 8, observes, out of Dioscorides, who calls it προσθάνον ομφαρίς το λεμάριον, &c., "the most unctuous part of fresh myrth, pressed out with a little water" (cap. 74). This was used in the perfumes which the heathen burnt upon the altars, as appears by that of Eupriides in Troad. where he mentions, Συγκρούμενοι σεσασμένοι τούς αἴσθησις.

Onycha.] The Hebrew word seekeheth is translated galbanum; these sweet spices with pure frankincense: of each shall there be a like weight: 35 And thou shalt make it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy: 36 And thou shalt beat some of it very small, and put of it before the testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I

by Jonathan ceaseth, which the famous Bochartus proves by many arguments to be ladanum, which was one of the principal aromatics among the Arabians. The stream of interpreters indeed carry it for onycho, but are not agreed what that is; for some take it for the hoof of a claw of an animal (as Maimonides), others (as Jarchi) for the root of a plant, which is smooth and transparent as the nail of a man’s hand, which the Greeks call onyx; but there are others, and more numerous, who take it for the shell of a fish, in the fens of India, that are full of spikenard, upon which this fish feeding, it makes the very shell odoriferous (see Hierozoie, par. ii. lib. v. cap. ult.). He observes also, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 1, that there was such a shellfish in the waters which was transparent, which takes it, in which it is called galbanum boni odoris. For that translation joins the next word (which we translate sweet spices) unto galbanum: as if he had said, aromatic galbanum.

With pure frankincense.] It was gathered twice in the year; in the spring and in the autumn; and Pliny tells us, that gathered in the autumn was the purest and whitest; with which the other (that was reddish) was not to be compared (lib. xii. cap. 14). Every one knows that this was very much used by the gentiles upon their altars.

Of each shall there be a like weight:] This is the common interpretation of the Hebrew words; and I will not trouble the reader with any other. But we have a very good reason why both weights were this way: for I see no authority for what the Hebrew doctors say, that there were seventy pounds of each of the four species. And they add (which makes all they say of this matter questionable), that there were also several pounds of cinnamon, and cassia, and crocus: in short, of thirteen several spices, which Josephus (lib. vi. Haloseos, cap. 6) affirms were in this composition. Of which Moses, they say, made in the whole three hundred and sixty-eight pounds; that is, one pound for every day in the year, and three for the day of expiation. And, accordingly, R. Levi Barzelonita saith, the priests made every year as much as would suffice for every day of it; and that the ordinary priests might make it as well as the high-priest (Parecept.

Ver. 35. Make it a perfume.] Some think the last words of the foregoing verse signify, that each sort of spice was to be pounded, one by one: and then they are all ordered here to be put together.

A confection after the art of the apothecary.] Made with great care, and according to this Divine prescription. Thus Plutarch, speaking of the aromatic Myrrah among the Egyptians, which was burnt morning and evening on their altars, saith it was not put together, ὅπως ἐκχω, “on any fashion,” or “as it happened;” ἀλα γράφης ἐγώ τούς πρυγοῖς, &c., will meet with thee: it shall be unto you most holy. 37 And as for the perfume which thou shalt make, ye shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof: it shall be unto thee holy for the Lord. 38 Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from his people.

“But the sacred books were read to those who compounded it,” when it was mixed (lib. de Isid. et Osiride).

Tempered together.] Both the Chaldee and the LXX. render this mingled; just as salt is with any thing upon which it is sprinkled.

Purce] Without any other mixture.

Holy.] To be used only in the Divine service. For this was one of the most ancient ways of worshipping God; the word θυσία, i.e. “sacrifice” (as Porphyry saith, lib. ii.) being derived ἀπὸ συμάξεως: the first men making a fume, by burning parts of trees, and shrubs, and seeds, and fruits. And the sweeter their scent was, the more grateful they fancied the fume was to God, as our Lord thought at first they contented themselves with simple herbs, and plants, and Moses here prescribes only some few spices fetched from foreign countries, yet, in aftertimes, they increased them to a greater number: for that aromatic mixture I mentioned before among the Egyptians, called Keip, was a composition of sixteen things, which Plutarch rooks up in the famed book. And Sophocles for his tragedians (in his Traged. ver. 637) calling for θυσίας πάχως, “fumes of all sorts of seed,” to be offered to Apollo, that she might be delivered from her terrors.

Ver. 36. Best of some of it very small,] Reduce it to powder.

Put of it before the testimony.] Burn it upon the altar of incense, which was placed before the ark, as we read ver. 6. This seems to be the meaning; and not that he should put it in a dish upon the table, ready to be burned; for the table did not stand before the ark of the testimony.

Where I will meet with thee.] See xxix. 42. It shall be unto you most holy.] Employed only in the worship of God, before the mention of priests.

Ver. 37. As for the perfume which thou shalt make, &c.] Or rather, And the perfume which thou shalt make, you shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof. For any private use; which is importuned in these words, to yourselves.

It shall be unto thee holy for the Lord.] Entirely separated to the Divine worship; and therefore not to be touched by any but the priests, and that when they ministered in the sanctuary, before the mercy-seat.

Ver. 38. Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto.] For his own pleasure (see ver. 32). R. Levi of Barcelona hath well explained this: no man was to make this composition with the same spices, and the same weight, and with an intention to burn it. So interpreters of those words to small thereto; that he might make a perfume with it by burning it (Parecept, cxli.). Yet if any man (as Maimonides observes) did smell this perfume, but did not make it, he was not guilty of being cut off.

Shall even be cut off from his people.] See ver. 33. Their opinion is not improvable, who think by this is meant not only the exclusion of the transgresser, but of his whole race; none of which should remain to keep up his name in Israel. By which severe threatening, the people were deterred from profaning these holy things.
CHAPTER XXXI.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 See, I have called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah:
3 And I have filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship.

4 To devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass,
5 And in cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship.
6 And I, behold, I have given with him Ahoiab, the son of Abisamach, of the tribe of Dan:

With an excellent spirit; or with Divine inspiration. Which was but necessary; because the Hebrews being long kept in slavery under the Egyptians, cannot be supposed to have been bred up to the learning of those ingenious arts mentioned in the next verses. For they were acquainted only with the making of bricks, during that heavy servitude; and therefore God instructed several men, particularly Bezaleel, in those arts which they had no master to teach them, and with their natural genius, though never so great, could not attain, especially on a sudden, without inspiration.

In wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge.

Here wisdom, understanding, and knowledge, do not signify, as they do in other places, particularly in the Proverbs, and in Isaiah xi. 2 (where the Messiah is said to be "filled with the spirit of wisdom and understanding, and the spirit of knowledge"), but skill in the arts of engraving, and setting jewels, and working, and needle-work. In how wisdom differs from understanding and from knowledge, is not much material: they may be many words used only to express their skill in all sorts of arts, that might make them accomplished workmen, as it follows in the latter end of the verse, to work in all manner of workmanship. They that would see how the Hebrews distinguished those, may look into Paulus Farginus verses on the place, or Buxtorf's Historia Arce, cap. 2, n. 3.

Ver. 4. To devise cunning works. There are two things required in an excellent artist; good invention and ability to do what he hath contrived. The first of these seem to be intended in this verse; and the other in the next; together with a dexterity to teach other artificers who were to be employed under Bezalel and Ahoiab.

Ver. 5. In cutting of stones. There were no stones employed about the tabernacle; and therefore this must be meant of cutting and setting the precious stones mentioned eh. xxvii. and in graving on them what God commanded, ver. 11, 21.

In carving of timber. We do not read in the foregoing chapters of any carved work about the tabernacle; and therefore this word may better be rendered (as it is in the beginning of the verse) cutting, rather than carving timber. For it signifies, in general, doing all the work of carpenters and joiners.

To work in all manner of workmanship. That was necessary for the making of every thing God had commanded.

Ver. 6. Behold, I have given with him] Lest Moses should think one principal contriver and director not to be sufficient, God joins another with him.

Ahoiab.—of the tribe of Dan. It is observed by R. Bechai, that God chose one out of the lowest tribe (for so they accounted that of Dan), as well as one out of the chief, which was Judah; that Bezalel, saith he, might not be lifted up with vain conceit; for great and small are equal before God. And he truly ob and in the hearts of all that are wise hearted I have put wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded thee;

7 The tabernacle of the congregation, and the ark of the testimony, and the mercy seat that is thereupon, and all the furniture of the tabernacle,

8 And the table and his furniture, and the pure candlestick with all his furniture, and the altar of incense,

9 And the altar of burnt offering with all his furniture, and the laver and his foot,

10 And the cloths of service, and the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments of his sons, to minister in the priest's office, serves, that one of the same tribe, of Dan, by the mother's side, was the most skilful person that could be found, for the building of the temple by Solomon, (2 Chron. ii. 14).

In the hearts of all that are wise hearted I have put wisdom.] That is, God endued the minds of all ingenious persons among them with an extraordinary skill; which they never learnt, either by their own study or any master, but had it by an inspiration from above. There were several, no doubt, who had a natural genius to such arts as were necessary in this work; but they could not by their own industry, have attained such skill as God bestowed on them; at least not so soon, as to go immediately about the building of the tabernacle, and all things belonging to it.

That they may make all that I have commanded thee.] Not to illustrate on Egyptian contrivances, as some have fancied (for which no such great skill, one would think, was necessary), but to make all exactly according to the model which Moses had seen in the mount, and he described to them; which could not have been done without God's extraordinary assistance.

Ver. 7.] These things are here mentioned, according to the order of nature; which is first to build a house, and then to provide its furniture. And it is observable, that there was but one house, or tabernacle, one ark, and one altar, either for sacrifice or incense, to preserve in their minds the belief of the unity of God; contrary to the gentiles, who had their temples and altars everywhere, and each family its domestic gods, and particular superstitions.

Ver. 8.] It is hard to tell why this is particularly called pure, unless it be because it was entirely of pure gold (xxv. 31), which the table and altar of incense were not; for they were only overlaid with pure gold, (xxv. 24, xxx. 3). Some have thought that it is called pure, because no blood was ever sprinkled upon it, as there was on the altar of incense; but this is not a good reason, for we do not find there was any sprinkling on the table.

Ver. 9. Alter of burnt offering.] Concerning this and the laver he had received orders, xxvii. 1, xxx. 17.

Ver. 10. Cloths of service.] Wherewith the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the golden altar were covered (Num. iv. 6, 7, 9, 11, &c.), when the camp moved.

Golden garments.] Which are ordered ch. xxviii.

11 And the anointing oil, and sweet incense for the holy place: according to all that I have commanded thee they shall do.

12 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

13 Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you.

11 Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people.
15 Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death.

16 Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant.

His days, if the judges, for want of witnesses, could not punish him. So Eliah ben Mosch (one of those whom the Jews call excellently op-timate to this, and all the rest of the punishments threatened to the violation of this precept, which Mr. Selden hath given us out of a MS. lib. i. de Syn-driis, cap. 6. The sense is this, in short: he that violates a negative precept, as they call it, either doth it secretly, which is most frequent, or openly, which happens seldom, unless a man be one of those that foolishly write the sabbath. Now him, who secretely broke the Sabbath, the Scripture threatens with cutting off, viz. by the hand of God, according to what is written here in this place. In like manner, inconstant and unlawful conjunctions are threatened (Lev. xviii. 29), because they were wont to be committed secretly. But if any man did any work openly, on the Sabbath, saith he, as the apostle: Now him, who secretely broke the Sabbath, the Scripture threatens with cutting off; viz. by the hand of God, according to what is said, Num.

xv. 35. Though if he did it out of mistake, either secretly or openly, he was only to bring a sacrifice for his error; and if he offended against any of the decrees of the wise men about the Sabbath, he was to be beaten. Or if there was no court of judgment in the place (as now, in their present condition), then all such transgressors were led to God to punish them, of whatsoever sort they were.

Ver. 15. The seventh is the sabbath of rest.] So it is called also, xxxv. 2, and Lev. xlii. 3. And so the Sabbath wherein the land rested, is likewise called,

Lev. xxv. 4. But the Hebrew words shabbath shabbathon (Sabbath of rest) properly signify "So prosceth with Sabbath", i.e. we, the apostle. Now him, who secretely broke the Sabbath; on which a rest was to be most punctually observed from all manner of work, which the Jews, as De Dieu notes, call the weighty Sabbath; as if other days of rest were but light in comparison with this. According to that saying of R. Josee, "great is circumcision, because the weighty Sabbath gives place to it," that is, when they have transgressed, although the rest on this Sabbath be so very great.

Shall surely be put to death. As an idolator, who did not acknowledge the Creator of the world. See before, ver. 14.

Ver. 16.] The most literal interpretation of this verse seems to me to be that of Lud. de Dieu, "the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath by making the Sabbath a perpetual covenant throughout their generations." That is, by never suffering it to be interrupted, they made it a perpetual covenant between God and them throughout all ages.

Ver. 17. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever: in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed.

And he gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communiting with him upon Mount Sinai, two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God.

On the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed.] Delighted in the contemplation of all his works, which were good (Gen. i. 31). The same Maimonides observes, that the word jinaphahath (which we translate was refreshed) comes from nepheshh, which, among other things, signifies the intention of the mind and the will; and therefore the sense of this phrase is, "all the will of God was perfected and brought to a conclusion: his whole good pleasure was absolutely finished on the seventh day" (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 67).

Ver. 18. He gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communing with him.] When he dismissed him, having said all that is before related during his forty days' stay with him in the mount, he delivered unto him two tables of testimony, to carry down with him to the people.

[Two tables of testimony.] Wherein God testified to them his will and mind, in the principal things which concerned their duty (see xvi. 34).

Tables of stone.] That what was written upon them might be more durable. There is no ground to think that these tables were made of some precious stone (as the author of the book Coeli, and other Jews fancy), for the Hebrew simply signifies any sort of stone, and is wont to have some other joined to it, when precious stones are meant, as in 2 Sam. xiii. 30; 1 Kings x. 2; 2 Chron. iii. 6.

Written with the finger of God.] i. e. By God himself. Just as the heavens, saith Maimonides, are said to be "the work of his fingers" (Psalm viii. 4), which he interprets in another place (xxxi. 6). "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made." Therefore "written by the finger of God," is as much, saith he, as "by the word," that is, the will and good pleasure of God (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 66). In short, this phrase signifies, that God employed neither Moses, nor any other instrument, in this writing, but it was done by his own powerful hand. For all the things that we do, being wrought by our hands and our fingers, these words are used to express God's power (see xxxiii. 16).

This was a thing so notorious in ancient times, and so much believed by those who were not Jews, that many other nations pretended to like the Divine writings, that they might gain the greater authority to their laws. Thus the Brachmans report in their histories, that the book of their law (which they call Caster) was delivered by God to Bramvius, upon a mount in a cloud: and that God gave also another book of laws to Brumman in the first age of the world. The Persians say the same of those of Zoro-aster; and the Gede of Xamolixis. Nay, the Brach-mans have a deacaloge like this, of Moses, and accurate interpretations of it, in which they say there is this prophecy, That one day there shall be one law alone throughout the world. This evidently shows how well the world was anciently acquainted with these books of Moses's, and what a high esteem they had of them (see Huetius, lib. ii. Alnetan. Quest. cap. 13, n. 19).

CHAPTER XXXII.

1 The people, in the absence of Moses, cause Aaron to make a calf. 7 God is angered thereby. 11 At the entreaty of Moses he is appeased. 15 Moses cancell down with the tables. 19 He breaketh them. 20 He destroyeth the calf. 22 Aaron's excuse for himself. 25 Moses causeth the idolaters to be slain. 30 He prayeth for the people.

And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, Up, make us gods, which shall go before us; for as this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, Up, make us gods, which shall go before us; for as this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. When the people] Not the whole body of the congregation; but so many of them, that the rest durst not appear to oppose their desires.

Saw that Moses delayed to come down] The Jews fancy that he stayed long beyond the time that he had appointed for his return to them. But that is not likely; for he himself was not told how long God would detain him there (see xxiv. 14). The meaning therefore is, that he stayed longer than they expected; so that they did not know what to think of it. And having as yet received no directions about the service of God, for which they were called out of Egypt (vii. 16, and other places), they thought it was time to desire Aaron to set about it, in such a way as other people served their gods.

The people gathered themselves together unto Aaron.] They applied themselves to him, as being left by Moses to be the chief director and governor of affairs, together with Hur, during his absence (xxiv. 14). And according to the computation made concerning the time of his going up into the mount (see xxiv. 18), this happened upon the fifteenth of our July; which mouth the Hebrews call Tamuz.

And said unto him, Up.] One cannot think that they spake thus to him at the very first words; but other discourse passed before this; unto which Aaron, in all probability, making some difficulty to consent, and persuading them not to persist in their demand, they would not be denied any longer, but said in a seditious manner, Up, make no further delay, for we will have what we desire.

We make us gods.] Or rather, make us a god: for so Nehemiah expresses it in the singular number, ix. 18, and so Elohim is often translated, Gen. xx. 13, xxxv. 7, &c. For their meaning was, make us a sacred symbol or sign, as other nations have, that may represent God in a visible manner to us. So the Jews expound it in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 45. "They said to Aaron, the Egyptians extol their gods, they sing and chant before them; for they behold them with their eyes. Make us such gods as theirs are, that we may see them before us." And so R. Jehudah, in the book Cosri, par. i. sect. 97: "They desired a sensible object of Divine worship to be set before them; not with an intention to deny God, who brought them out of Egypt, but that something in the place of God might stand before them, when they declared his wonderful works." Such, no doubt, was their meaning; for they could not be so senseless as to imagine the true God could be made by a man; or that an image could go before them (as it here follows), which may have feet, but cannot walk, as the Psalmist speaks. And therefore Aben Ezra judiciously interprets it, "some corporeal image in which God may reside."
CHAPTER XXXII.

365 And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf: and they said, These be the gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

5 And when Aaron saw it, he built an altar situs hath taken a great deal of pains to prove, that Joseph was adored by them under the name of Apis and Serapis; and that his symbol was an ox. This he hath laboured to support by many ingenious conjectures. But it is not likely, if he were thus publicly honoured as a god, that a king should arise who knew not Joseph, i.e. had no regard to him (Exod. 1, 5), and another succeed by whom every enemy was commanded to ruin all his kindred. The worship of Serapis also was not so ancient, for Herodotus saith not a word of it, nor anybody else, till the time of Alexander the Great; and many authors say it was brought into Egypt out of Pontus by Tolomey (see Bochartus in his Hierozoic, pars. i. p. 338). And though Apis was more ancient, yet not of such antiquity as Moses, as a very learned person of our own (Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury) hath shown in his book of idolatry, chap. vi.

part 4, 5, &c. And as for Osiris, both Plutarch and Strabo say he was the same with Apis: which was not then known, as I have said, in Egypt, no more than Typhus or Typhon, whom Philo thinks to be here intended; but was certainly a later invention, and, as Bochartus hath represented Moses himself, though very much disguised.

Cuperus, indeed, hath made it probable (in his Harcortiae, p. 53, &c.) that there was a Serapis worshipped in Egypt, before that brought out of Pontus: but whether it be so or no, I do not take it to be at all material, because it is not likely that Aaron would make such a representation of the Divine veneration for the river Nile, called in Hebrew Stichor (from whence came Syris), and for the dog-star (called Syris likewise), at whose rising that river began to swell; and for the sun (which was principally meant by this name), to whom both the bull at Heliopolis, and the ox at Memphis were consecrated, as Macrobius tells us, lib. i. Saturn. cap. 21. But though this be very ingenious, yet the truth of it may be well questioned, as I shall show presently; when I have noted that this translation, fashioned it with a graving tool, is not so agreeable to what here follows, as another which the Hebrew words will as well bear.

After he had made it a molten calf: The words in the Hebrew are, and he made it, &c.; we translate them after, &c., to make this agree with what goes before, according to our translation, he fashioned it with a graving tool: which may as literally be translated, he bound them up in a bag. For we find the word jatar, which we here translate fashioned, to have the signification also of binding or tying up; and cherel in the plural number to signify a bag (2 Kings v. 32).

A golden calf, may he calls it, because it was no bigger than a calf, though the head was like an ox; and therefore, as I observed before, so called by the Psalmist. What moved Aaron to represent God in this figure, is hard to resolve. Most think he imitated the Egyptians, among whom he had long lived; which seems not to me at all likely, since he had seen the judgment that God executed against all their gods (Ex. 12). Yet so great a man as I. Gerh. Voss.
before it; and Aaron made proclamation, and said, To morrow is a feast to the Lord.

6 And they rose up early on the morrow, and prator, had horns come out of his head on a sudden, as he was going out of the city to the wars; whereupon he was told, Regem eum fore, si in urbem revertiisset; "that he should be a king, if he returned into the city." And something like it is related by Julius Capitolinus concerning Clodius Albinus, at whose birth a cow brought forth a calf with purple horns, which they looked upon as signum imperii, "a token of empire." Which made the ancient fathers, perhaps, when they spoke of this calf or ox of Aaron's, mention only its head.

For so doth Tertullian (lib. adversus Judaeos, cap. 1): "eum processisset eis bubulum caput;" and St. Cyprian, Lactantius, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, and others: not because they thought Aaron made only the head; but because this was the principal part whereby God was represented.

And they said, The people cried out aloud.

These be thy gods, O Israel; Or, as Nehemiah expresses it (ix. 18), This is thy God, &c., the image or symbol of the Divine Majesty: or, as Abulensis interprets it, "his Divine virtue resideth in this golden body." The plural number is commonly used for the singular, especially when God is spoken of, as I observed before, Gen. xx. 13, xxxv. 7; 2 Sam. vii. 23.

[Which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt?] This shows they looked upon this ox only as a representation of the Almighty Lord their God: for it being but newly made, they could not imagine they were brought by it from the Egyptian slavery, but by his power, which perhaps they fancied now resided in it.

Ver. 5. When Aaron saw it, he built an altar before it; As at the people's request he made it, so he, seeing them receive it with such applause, presently consecrated it; by building an altar, offering sacrifices, and keeping a solemn feast in its honour.

Aaron made proclamation. Caused it to be publicly proclaimed throughout the host; that every one might have notice of the solemnity.

To morrow is a feast Which was a part of worship ordained by his authority.

To the Lord. Not to this ox, but to the Creator of the world, whom they worshipped in this image. Notwithstanding which, this was no better than an idol (Acts x. 11), nor more than great inanimate stones (xx. 26, 27; xxiii. 7). Some think, indeed, that Moses being gone, and, as they imagined, either burnt up or famished, they desired this representation of God to go before them, and direct them, as a kind of teraphim; but God allowed no such visible sign to be made of his presence with them, which he knew would in a short time have their adoration.

Ver. 6. They rose up early on the morrow. The next day, which was the sixteenth of our July, they kept their festival. And to show their devotion, they began betimes in the morning, and seem not to have stayed for Aaron: but, as it follows, offered sacrifices themselves.

Offered burnt offerings; Which always preceded others. See xviii. 12, xxiv. 5, where I observed, that what was offered by being entirely consumed on the altar, being wholly God's.

Drewt sacrifice offerings. This intimates that some persons received what they brought; and perhaps they were the young men mentioned xxiv. 5, where I noted also, that of peace-offerings the people that brought them had a share, that they might feast with God; and they invited their friends likewise to feast with them. There is no mention either here, or in the other places, of sin-offerings. whereof the priests had a part, but not the people.

The people sat down to eat and to drink. Upon the sacrifices of peace-offerings; whereof the people, as I said, had their part: and by partaking of it, had fellowship with the idol, to whom they were offered, as the apostle shows (1 Cor. x. 20, 21). Thus the Egyptians kept a Πάσχανη at the feast of Apsis; in imitation rather of the Israelites, than otherwise.

It may be fit here to note, that this custom of sacrificing, and also of feasting on the sacrifice, in token of their communion with him to whom the sacrifice was offered, was so very ancient, that it is not easy to believe the observation of St. Chrysostom to be true, that God gave no commandment about sacrifices, till after this sin of worshipping the golden calf; when, seeing their proneness to offer such sacrifices, he thought fit to ordain them himself, and direct them to their right object. Much less is it true, that before this νομοσ ἐν πάσχαν ἀθανάτως, "we do not find anywhere the name of sacrifice" (as he speaks Homil. xvii., upon Acts vii. 53); for besides (as upon Exod. xv. 28) that there was no law about sacrifices, except that of the passover, till after they had committed idolatry. For, besides that, there is an order how to make an altar, on which to sacrifice their burnt-offerings (xx. 24), which supposes God's intention about them; and the building of an altar, and actual sacrifice upon it, at the command of the council between God and Israel (xxiv. 4, 5, &c. [which surely was without God's command], there is a whole chapter in this book about sacrifices at the consecration of Aaron and his sons, before this sin was committed (chap. xxix.), and particular directions given in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth verses of that chapter, about the daily burnt-offering. I omit what might be said except about the celebration of sacrifices from the beginning of the world, which it is hard to believe was without a Divine institution. St. Jerome's words therefore are also too large, who saith, in his commentaries upon Ezek. xx., that the Israelites received only the decalogue before this occasion of the calf: after which, God gave them multitudes legis ceremonias, "abundance of legal ceremonies," as he elsewhere (in his comment on xxvii. 7, 8) lastly be said in this matter is, that Moses had not yet delivered to them the commands before mentioned, which God had given him; and that they had received but a few commands about sacrifices till after this sin: when the precepts were multiplied, that they might upon all occasions offer sacrifice to God, and not to demons, as they were inclined to do. The daily burnt-offerings were appointed before (as I said) though not delivered to them; and so was the sin-offering for the consecration of Aaron and his sons, and the altar (xxix. 36, &c.). But the sin-offering for particular persons, and for the whole congregation of Israel, and the great variety of sacrifices, with the manner of them, were not yet prescribed; and perhaps were ordained upon this occasion: as they are pointed before (as I said) solely for that, there being respect in them to the great sacrifice of Christ, especially in that sacrifice upon the day of expiation. But in general, it may be reasonably thought, that if they had not been perverse, they might have been left more at liberty to do these things at pleasure, according to the law of nature; and they might perhaps have been invited to offer sacrifices everywhere, as the patriarchs did, though there is no certainty of such speculations.
And the Lord said unto Moses, Go, get thee down; for thy people, which thou hast brought out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves:

They have turned aside quickly out of the way which I commanded them; they have made them a molten calf, and have worshipped it, and have sacrificed thereunto, and said, These be thy gods, O Israel, which have brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

And the Lord said unto Moses, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiffnecked people:

Now therefore let me alone, that my wrath

Ver. 7. The Lord said unto Moses, Go, get thee down.] He had dismissed him before, having done comming with him (xxxi. 18), and now sends him away from the mount in some haste, at the end of the forty days mentioned in the twenty-fourth chap. ult.

For thy people.] These words are generally looked upon, as God's abandoning the Israelites, and disowning them to be his people. But then, they would not have been Moses' people neither, but utterly destroyed (ver. 10). Therefore the true meaning is explained by St. Stephen, who calls Moses their λατρευτής, "deliverer" (Acts vii. 35), because by his hand God redeemed them; and in that regard they became his people.

Have corrupted themselves.] He doth not mention Aaron, though he was very angry with him also (Deut. ix. 20), because the people were the beginners of the revolt, and he complied with them out of fear.

Ver. 8. They have turned aside quickly out of the way which I commanded them.] It was not much above six weeks since they heard God charge them, in a terrible manner, not to worship any image (xx. 4), and they solemnly promised to do whatsoever Moses commanded them from God (ver. 19). Immediately after which, this command is in a peculiar manner repeated (ver. 23): "Ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold." Which, with all the rest of his judgments, they covetously also to observe (xxiv. 3, 8). And therefore such a speedy revolt, from such obligations, made their crime excessively heinous.

They have made them a molten calf.] For what Aaron did was at their instigation.

And have worshipped it.] By kissing it, (saith R. Eliezer in his Pirke, cap. 45,) and bowing down to it; and then offering sacrifice to it (as it here follows) and acknowledging it to be their conductor out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 9. The Lord said unto Moses.] He added this further before he went down from the mount.

I have seen this people.] Long observed their disposition.

It is a stiffnecked people.] This character of them is repeated, xxxii. 3, 5, xxxiv. 9, being a metaphor from untamed heifers, who draw their necks and shoulders back when they are put under the yoke.

The prophet Isaiah alludes to this, when he saith of this people (xlvii. 4), "Thy neck is an iron sinew," which would not bend. And Jeremiah v. 5, where he saith, the great men "had broken the yoke and burst the bonds."

Ver. 10. Let me alone.] Do not interpose in their behalf, with thy prayers and deprecations for them.

That my wrath may wax hot against them.] That the just indignation I have conceived against them, may proceed to punish them with utter destruction.

I will make of thee a great nation.] Or, I will set thee over a great nation; make thee prince of a mightier nation than they (as the words are, Numb. xiv. 12), for so the word anash (to make) signifies, 1 Sam. xii. 6, where we translate it, anashed, Moses and Aaron. Which seems to be the meaning here, because Moses urges (ver. 13) the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as if that would not be made good if the people were all destroyed. Whereas... may wax hot against them; and that I may consume them: and I will make of thee a great nation.

11 And Moses besought the Lord his God, and said, Lorn, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power, and with a mighty hand?

12 Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people.

13 Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever.

14 And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people.

15 ¶ And Moses turned, and went down from the mount, and the two tables of the testimony were in his hand: the tables were written on both their sides, on the one side and on the other were they written.

16 And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables.

17 And when Joshua heard the noise of the people as they shouted, he said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp.

18 And he said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery; neither is it the voice of there would have been no danger of that, if God had made a great nation to spring from Moses, who was of the seed.

Ver. 11. Moses besought the Lord] The Hebrew word challah, from whence comes vocable (which we translate besought) importing something of sickness and infirmity; denotes that Moses besought the Lord with much earnestness, and great agony of mind.

His God.] He hoped he had not lost his interest in God, which the people had justly forfeited.

Why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people.] There was great reason for this high displeasure against them which God threatened, ver. 10, and Moses himself was not only angry, but his anger waxed hot (ver. 19); yet he hoped other reasons would move the Divine mercy to moderate his anger; that is, not to punish them so severely as they deserved.

Which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt.] This is one ground of hope, that God would not on a sudden destroy what he had employed so much power to preserve.

Ver. 12. Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out.] This is another reason, that the Egyptians might not be led into a vain belief, or confirmed in their infidelity.

To slay them in the mountains.] There were many mountains besides Sinai (where they now were) in that desert into which God led them: and they were the most dangerous part of it.

Turn from thy fierce wrath, &c.] Let these considerations prevail for a pardon.

Ver. 13. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel.] This is the great argument of all, the promise made to their forefathers, who were his faithful servants, and this promise confirmed by an oath (often repeated) which he hoped God would faithfully fulfil.

I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven.] Gen. xv. 5, xxii. 17. This part of the promise he had fulfilled; which made him hope he would fulfil the other part which here follows.

And all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed.] Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 15, xv. 7, xxviii. 13.

Ver. 14. The Lord repented of the evil.] He did not change his mind; for there was not a peremptory decree or definitive sentence (as they speak) pronounced against them; but only a signification of what they deserved (ver. 10), which, unless it had been for the foretold promise and Moses's intercession, he would have inflicted upon them.

Ver. 15. Moses turned.] From the presence of God, with whom he had been forty days.

Went down from the mount.] From the place where he was with God, to that where he left Joshua waiting for his return (see xxiv. 13).

The two tables of the testimony were in his hand.] Which God promised to give him, and one would think had readily prepared for him before he went up into the mount (xxxv. 12), and when he was coming down, delivered into his hands (xxx. ult.). They are called tables of testimony, because God declared and testified therein what his mind and will was, as I have often noted.

The tables were written on both their sides.] Some fancy that the writing was both on the fore-part and the back-part of them; that so the ten commandments might be read by those who stood either before or behind, when they were set up; being written (according to this conceit) twice over. But they were not made to be set up, but to be reposited in the ark; and therefore the meaning is, they were written on both the leaves (as I may call them) which were to be folded up and shut like a book, when they were laid in the ark.

On the one side and on the other were they written.] On the right hand, and on the left. How many were written on the one, and how many on the other, is variously disputed, but cannot certainly be determined.

Ver. 16.] The tables were made and planned by God himself; as well as the letters written by him (xxxi. 18), and no creature employed in either work; much less Moses, who seems to have found them ready prepared for him, when he came into the mount, as I observed before from xxiv. 12.

Ver. 17. When Joshua heard the noise of the people.] Being come to the foot of the mount, they could easily hear the noise which the people made in their festival.

He said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp.] Knowing nothing of the occasion, he took it for the noise which soldiers make (called by the Hebrews teresch, by the Greeks δοξαωμα) who make a great shout when they give the onset; and much greater when they get the victory.

Ver. 18. He said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery.] Being before instructed by God what the people were a doing (ver. 7), Moses could easily correct his mistake: assuring him, it was neither the cry of strength, nor of weakness (as the words are in the Hebrew), i.e. of conquerors, as we rightly translate it, or of those that are overcome.

But the noise of them that sing do I hear.] Out of merriment in a festival. For thus Apis was brought in solemn pomp to Memphis, the royal city; the children going before in procession, and singing a song of but which so praise Moses the bralvc what burnt eyes.

That he saw the coif; and the dancing] Which began early in the morning, and continued all day; for we may presume it was towards the evening before Moses got to the camp; having spent a considerable part of the day in beseeching God for them.

Moses' anger waxed hot.] The sight of their madness turned the compassion he had for them (ver. 11, 12, &c.) into a kind of rage.

He cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount.] He did not do it till now (though he knew their guilt, and no doubt was affected with it before he came nigh to the camp and saw the coif and dancing), because he would have the people see how he represented their wickedness, and with what indignation it filled him. And now he did it, no doubt, by the same Divine impulse, or heroic motion, which stirred him up to kill the Egyptian (see ii. 12). For he is never blamed for this; and therefore did it by a Divine incitement: to show the Israelites how unworthy they were to be espoused to God (as some pretended) by these instruments or deeds, which were most precious tokens of God's love to them. To this effect Abarbinel discourses:—

Moses did not leave the tabernacles in the mount where they were delivered to him, when he heard how the people had revolted; but brought them along with him, that he might make all Israel sensible what they had lost, by breaking them before their eyes.

He took the coif which they had made, and burnt it in the fire.] Melted it down; so that, though the matter remained (i.e. the gold), yet the form and external shape of the calf was so destroyed, that it might be said properly enough to be burnt. For the Romans (as Bochart observes) call that place where the fire is kindled the Thermo.

[Ground it to powder.] Some have pretended to the knowledge of an herb which will dissolve gold, and reduce it to ashes; but they do not say what it is, or that it was to he found in that wilderness. And if Moses had known and used this secret, what need was there of his grinding it again, after it was dissolved to ashes? It is most likely, therefore, that this was done with a file, whereby it was grated into dust as small as flour which is ground in a mill. With such dust some powdered their own hair, and the manes of their horses (as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicm, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31), which made them glitter and sparkle when the sun shone upon them.

Strawed it upon the water,] Of the brook which descended out of the mount (xvii. 6; Deut. ix. 21). By which means the calf was utterly abolished, and demonstrated (as Abarbinel notes) to have no more divinity in it than the dust or water hath.

Made the children of Israel drink of it.] He did not constrain them; but having no other water, they could not avoid, when they were thirsty, to drink with this mixture. Which Moses threw into it, not to discover who were guilty of idolatry, as the Jews fancy, who say this was like the water of jealousy (Num. xiv. 26), which made their bellies swell, or their heads, as some have since fabled, turn yellow (for it was a general apostasy, ver. 1–3); but to make them sensible how vile a thing this idol was, which was gone into their draught, and mixed with their dung and their urine. They that have a desire to see the conceits of the Jews about it, may look into Selden de Divinis, p. 16, &c.; Syravag. i. cap. 4; and J. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 1128.

Ver. 21. Moses said unto Aaron, What did this people unto thee,] It was not sufficient that the idol was destroyed, but he thought fit to call his brother to an account for his misgovernment in his absence. Who makes a very weak defence, as all commentators observe, to whom I refer the reader. And shall only note, that the best apology he could have made had been this (if it had been true), that he only represented God unto them, as he had represented himself to him and the elders of Israel, when the cherubims, in the form of oxen, made part of the train of the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty. But he says not a word of this; which I suppose, therefore, is a groundless objection.

That thou hast brought so great a sin upon them?] If they had made or built a house for Divine worship (saith Sepher Cosri, in the place above named), according to their own fancies, that they might have offered their sacrifices there, and directed their devotions thither, it would not have seemed to me so grievous a sin; for at this day we make such houses, and have a very reason for them, to promise ourselves the Divine benediction in them, &c. But to make an image was directly against the command of God; and to fancy that he would be present with that which he abhorred, very much aggravated the crime.

Ver. 22. Let not the anger of my lord wax hot;] He beseeches him in a very humble manner to hear him calmly.

Thou knowest the people.] He had been long acquainted with their rebellious and obstinate humour, which made them fall a murmuring as soon as ever they were delivered from Pharaoh at the Red Sea (xv. 21, xvi. 2, &c.).

That they are set on mischief.] The words in the Hebrew, honu hu, are more emphatical, they are in wickedness, or in idolatry; like that expression in St.
which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

24 And I said unto them, Whosoever hath any gold, let them break it off. So they gave it me: then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf.

25 ¶ And when Moses saw that the people were naked (for Aaron had made them naked unto their shame among their enemies), 26 Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, Who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him.

27 And he said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour.

28 And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses: and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men.

29 For Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves it to the people at the gate of the city (Gen. xxxiv. 29). Which was the same thing with the forum or exchange among the Romans: the market being also hold here, where there were seats for the judges and elders.

Who is on the Lord's side?] Abhors this idolatry, and cleaves to the worship of the Lord only! Let him come unto me.] To receive his commands, who was under God their leader.

All the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him.] If not the whole tribe, yet as many as had any zeal for the Lord; who were the most. This is an argument there was a general defection of the people to this idolatrous worship, that none but the sons of Levi appeared to join with Moses on this occasion.

Ver. 27. Thus with the Lord God of Israel.] The Lord himself, by his command, warrant what I bid you.

Go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp.] They were not to go into their tents (where they who were sensible of God's displeasure, it may be presumed, were bemoaning their sin), but to kill every one they met in the street.

Slay every man his brother.] All the Israelites were brethren; and they are commanded to spare none they met withal, because they were near relations, or friends, or next neighbours. Some may imagine this too hazardous an undertaking, the Levites being but a very small number in comparison with the people of Israel. But being God's warrant, they were confident none would have the courage to oppose them; for guilt makes men timorous; and the Levites also found them, as men used to be at the conclusion of a festival, weary with their dancing and sports. Besides, there are these who, by their being naked (ver. 25), understand they were unarmed; for Aaron had disarmed them to their shame, by setting up the calf for them to dance about; which made them lay aside all thoughts of their arms, and so were more easily slain by the Levites.

Ver. 29. The children of Levi did according to the word of Moses:] Who being, under God, their chief ruler, passed this extraordinary sentence upon the offenders, without the common process in courts of judgment. Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 2, in the end of it.

And there fell of the people that day about three thousand men.] The Vulgar hath twenty-three thousand, contrary to the LXX, as well as the Hebrew text, and all the eastern versions, except the Arabic, printed at Rome in this age, and manifestly out of the Vulgar Latin, as Mr. Selden hath observed in the same place, and Bochart shows largely to be against all the ancient translations and writers, Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31, p. 353, where he notes also out of Philo, these three thousand to have been ἀρχιερεῖς μαχηταὶ τῆς διακήρυξεος, "the principal ringleaders of this impolicy."
to day to the Lord, even every man upon his son, and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day.

30 And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses said unto the people, Ye have sinned a great sin: and now I will go up unto the Lord; peradventure I shall make an atonement for your sin.

31 And Moses returned unto the Lord, and said, Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold.

32 Yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin—

In memory of these disasters, the breaking of the tables, and this slaughter, the Jews keep a fast every year on the seventeenth of Tamuz, which, by Tacitus, Capellus's computation, answers to the sixteenth of our July.

Ver. 29. Consecrate yourselves to day to the Lord.] Or, Moses said, Ye have consecrated yourselves, &c. Which way soever we take it (either as spoken before the execution, to encourage them to it, or afterward, to commend them for it), the meaning is, that this act was as acceptable to God as a sacrifice, and had procured them the honour to wait upon him as his ministers.

Every man upon his son, and upon his brother.] This seems to signify that some of the tribe of Levi had also prevaricated, to whom these pious Levites had no regard, but killed them indifferently with the rest, though they met with some of their own children; for which they are highly commended by Moses in his blessing, Deut. xxxiii. 9. But it may signify no more, but that they went out with this sincere resolution to spare none, though never so dear to them.

That he may bestow upon you a blessing this day.] This blessing was the preference of the tribe of Levi to God's ministers in his house, and to enjoy all the tenth of the land for an inheritance (Num. xviii. 21, 24).

Ver. 30. It came to pass on the morrow.] Which was the eighteenth day of Tamuz, or our seventeenth of July.

Moses said unto the people, Whom he assembled together, that he might make them sensible of their sin.

Ye have sinned a great sin.] He set their sin before them, it is likely, in all its aggravating circumstances.

Now I will go up unto the Lord;] But he would not have them despair of recovering God's favour, though he could not absolutely assure them of it.

I shall make an atonement;] That God might not inflict any further punishment upon them.

Ver. 31. Moses returned unto the Lord.] Not, as yet, to the place where he was before with the Lord for forty days; but to some part of the mount, where he might put up his most fervent prayers to God, by which his anger was turned away, as well as by sorrow.

Oh, this people have sinned a great sin.] He begins his prayers with a confession of their guilt in a most pathetical manner.

And have made them gods of gold.] Contrary to the express repeated command of God (xx. 4, 23).

Ver. 32. Yet now.] Here follows his earnest and most affectionate depreciation for them.

If not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written.] Let me die, rather than live to see the evils that are coming on them, if thou punish them as they deserve. God hath no need of a book wherein to register and record any of his purposes; but the Scripture uses the language of men, as the Jews speak, who, to this day, retain this form of speech, in their prayer wherewith they begin the new year. O our Father and our King, write us in the book of the living, the book of righteousness, in the book of redemption. They desire, that is, to be preserved that year in a happy condition, free from sin, from want, and from danger. See Theodoric Hackspan, in his annotations on this place.

Ver. 33. This was all the answer Moses could obtain: that they only should perish who had offended the Divine Majesty. Which doth not deny them a pardon, if they should repent and reform. See Ver. 34. Therefore now go.] Speak no more of this matter, but return to the camp.

Lead the people unto the place of which I have spoken] Take the conduct of the people upon thee to the land which I promised to bestow on them. This supposes God would not punish them as they deserved; though, by the words following, it appears he abated something of his wonted kindness to them.

Behold, mine angel shall go before thee.] Not the angel spoken of, xxxii. 20, but some lesser minister in the heavenly court, as appears from the next chapter, ver. 2, where he saith only, "I will send an angel before thee," viz., in the pillar of cloud and fire.

Nevertheless in the day when I visit I will visit their sin upon them.] Upon the next occasion to punish other offences, I will further punish this. Whence the saying of R. Isaac, in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 11, "There hath no vengeance come upon the world, in which there hath not been half an ounce of the first calf." To which R. Uschatjah there hath respect, in these words: "Till the days of Je-roboam, the Israelites sucked but of one calf, but afterward of three." That is, their punishment was twice as great; for they made two calves, though they had seen the terrible punishment which came upon their forefathers from making one.

Ver. 35. The Lord plagued the people.] With the pestilence, as some imagine, though it be not mentioned in Scripture. Or, he means all the evils that afterward consumed them in the wilderness. But there are those who understand this of the slaughter made by the Levites; which he briefly repeats (as the manner sometimes is in these writings) as a conclusion to this history of the golden calf.

Because they made the calf, which Aaron made.] Provoked him to make.
CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 The Lord refuseth to go, as he had promised, with the people. 4 The people murmured, 7 The tabernacle is removed out of the camp. 9 The Lord talketh familiarly with Moses. 12 Moses desireth to see the glory of God.

1 And the Lord said unto Moses, Depart, and go up hence, thou and the people which thou hast brought up out of the land of Egypt, unto the land which I sware unto Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, saying, Unto thy seed will I give it:

2 And I will send an angel before thee; and I will drive out the Canaanite, the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite:

3 Unto a land flowing with milk and honey: for I will not go up in the midst of thee; for thou art a stiffnecked people: lest I consume thee in the way.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1.] This is a renewal of the order he had already given (xxxii. 34), which he further explains, by expressly assuring him he would make good his promise to their forefathers, of which Moses had remembered him (xxxii. 13.) But they were not by this order presently to remove, till Moses had been again in the mount, and the tabernacle was set up, and all the service of it prescribed.

Ver. 2. I will send an angel before thee.] I will not wholly withdraw my protection from you (as he had for the present, xxxii. 25), but send one of my ministers to discomfit your enemies, till you get possession of their land.

Ver. 3. For I will not go up in the midst of thee.] For though I intended to have dwelt among you myself, by my special presence (which was in the Shechinah, xxv. 8, xxix. 43, 45, 46), you have justly forfeited that favour. The Chaldee gives the true sense of this speech, "I will not make my majesty (so the Shechinah or Divine glory was called) to go up in the midst of thee." And accordingly it follows (ver. 7), that he did remove to a distance from them. Concerning that phrase, in the midst of thee, see xxviii. 7.

For thou art a stiffnecked people.] See xxxii. 9.

Lest I consume thee in the way.] It is not for me to see myself affronted to my face by stiffnecked offenders, and not punish them with utter destruction. This is an argument that the angel, he saith he would send before them, was not God himself (as the eternal ΔΩΤΟΣ is), for then he would have had the same reason to consume them for their disobedience.

Ver. 4. When the people heard these evil tidings.] This threatening of such a grievous punishment.

Mourning.] Fasted, perhaps, and wept; and hung down their heads with shame and sorrow.

No man did put on him his ornaments.] But every one laid aside his usual attire, and appeared in the habit of penitents; which, in aftertimes, was sackcloth.

Ver. 5.] This verse gives a reason of their mourning, because Moses had by God's order said to them, what God said to him, that they were such a perverse people, it was not safe for them that he should stay among them, and be provoked by their transgressions suddenly to destroy them.

4 ¶ And when the people heard these evil tidings, they mourned: and no man did put on his ornaments.

5 For the Lord had said unto Moses, Say unto the children of Israel, Ye are a stiffnecked people: I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee: therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee.

6 And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments by the mount Horeb.

7 And Moses took the tabernacle, and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp, and called it the Tabernacle of the congregation.

Put off thy ornaments from thee.] These words show that he had not peremptorily resolved to forsake them as he threatened, ver. 3), but might be moved by their repentance to continue with them. And therefore he orders them to put themselves in a mourning habit, in token of their hearty sorrow for their sin.

That I may know what to do.] Deal with you according as I find you disposed (see Gen. xxii. 12).

Ver. 6. The children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments:] Not only of those wherewith they had decked themselves, at their late festival, but of all other that they ordinarily wore; which they, who were not dressed, forborne to put on (ver. 4).

By the mount Horeb.] Or rather (as the Hebrew word nehar imports) from the mount; that is, a great way off from the place where God appeared; as unworthy to come into his presence.

Ver. 7. Moses took the tabernacle:] His own tent, as the LXX. interpret it, τὸ θέματός μου οναρίων: meaning, I suppose, not his own private tent, where he and his family lived; but a public tent, where he gave audience, and heard causes, and inquired of God; which Bonaventura G. Bertramus calls εἰσαγωγὴ προτερίου, in his book of Doubt, Jud. cap. 4. For such a place we cannot but think there was, before that tabernacle was erected, whose pattern he saw in the mount; where all great affairs were transacted, and where religious offices, in all probability, were performed.

Pitched it without the camp:] At the distance of two thousand cubits, as R. Solomon interprets it. Which was done to humble them, when they saw the displeasure of God and of his servant against them, declared by this departure far from them: for they might justly fear he would remove quite out of their sight.

Called it the Tabernacle of the congregation:] Gave it the same name which was afterward appropriated to the tabernacle built for Divine service alone. Because here God met with Moses, and communicated his mind to him, and hither they were all to resort, who had any business with Moses; or would receive an answer to their inquiries from God.

Every one which sought the Lord, &c.] This is commonly understood of those who came to desire resolution in any case of difficulty; which they could not have, as formerly, within the camp, but were forced to go and seek it without. Which as it showed God's displeasure, so withal gave them some hope of
And it came to pass, that every one which sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp. And it came to pass, when Moses went out unto the tabernacle, that all the people rose up, and stood every man at his tent door, and looked after Moses, until he was gone into the tabernacle. And it came to pass, as Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the Lord talked with Moses.

mercy; because it plainly appeared, God was not quite alienated and estranged from them. Ver. 8. The people rose up.] In reverence to him as their leader, whom they had lately despised. Or, it may be thought also a posture wherein they implored his intercession for them, that God would be graciously pleased to return to them, which is expressed by what follows. Ver. 8. Moses.] Expecting what would be the end of this business; both God and his minister being removed from them. Until he was gone.] As long as they could see him. Ver. 9. The cloudy pillar descended.] In which the Sheehenah, or Divine Majesty, was (xl. 33,) which was gone up before, because of their idolatry, whereby the camp was become unclean; but now came down again upon the removal of the tabernacle. Where, it is very probable, it used to be settled, as the token of the Divine presence among them; and afterward was translated to the tabernacle, made after God's appointment, where this cloud stood just as it did here, at the door of it (Numb. xii. 5.)

The Lord talked with Moses.] Which shows the Divine glory was within the tabernacle, where Moses now was: and so the people understood it, as appears by the next verse. Ver. 10. The people saw the cloudy pillar stand at the tabernacle door, and they knew it was an evident token that God was there. The people rose up and worshipped.] Bowed themselves unto the Divine Majesty, and humbly deprecated his displeasure; acknowledging, we may reasonably think, his great goodness, in descending to appear again to them, though at a distance from them.

Ver. 11. The Lord spake unto Moses face to face.] In a familiar manner, which did not affright or astonish him, by a dreadful appearance of his majesty: which, in the sight of the children of Israel, looked like devouring fire (xxiv. 17,) but appeared to Moses in a milder and more cheerful brightness. The like expression in Numb. xii. 8, seems to relate only to the discourse of God to Moses, which was clear and plain, and by a voice; not in visions and dreams, and obscure resemblances: and so it may be understood here, as Maimonides takes it (More Nevuch. par. iii. cap. 45.) But Abarbinel thinks that these expressions signify, God treated with Moses in his own person, not by an ambassador; just as one friend converses with another. And this is a common notion among the Jews, that God did not speak to Moses by an angel, but by himself: which they take to be the meaning of this phrase, face to face. Which seems to me rather to import the clearness and evidence of that Divine light, wherein God revealed himself to Moses; whether it was by himself, or an angel, it matters not. Yet the New Testament determines this question, when it tells us, the law itself was given by angels, in the hand of a mediator. And accordingly the old tradition was, that Moses saw things in a clear and bright glass; but the rest of the prophets in a glass that was dim and cloudy.

As a man speaketh unto his friend.] This is added, to show how differently God treated Moses from all other men. For he is said to have talked face to face with all the Israelites (Dent. v. 4.), but it was out of the midst of the fire, which struck a terror into them: whereas he spake to Moses out of the midst of a glorious but comfortable light, which gave him high satisfaction.

He turned again into the camp.] After some time spent in conversation with the Divine Majesty, he went to comfort the people, it is likely, with hopes of recovering his favour; of which they might have quite despaired, if he had stayed long from them.

His servant Joshua—departed not out of the tabernacle.] It is hard to tell for what end Joshua should stay behind his master; and it seems not decent that Moses should return alone without his servant to attend him. They that say he stayed to guard the tabernacle, have no foundation for it; and they have not much, who say he stayed to give judgment in small causes, which needed not Moses's resolution (according to xviii. 26.) For we never read that Joshua was a judge, but a constant attendant upon Moses's person. And therefore the words may better be translated, as they plainly run in the Hebrew, "He turned again to the camp, and his servant Joshua, the son of Nun, a young man." At which there is a stop in the Hebrew (over the word near, young man,) to distinguish these from the following words; which are,

Departed not out of the tabernacle.] That is, the Lord departed not from thence, but his presence remained there; and would not come into the camp, as Moses did. And this interpretation is the more likely, because the last words in the Hebrew are, "out of the midst of the tabernacle:" which cannot refer to Joshua, because he did not go thither; but only Moses, who conversed alone with the Divine Majesty.

Why Joshua is called a young man, when he was near sixty years old, is not easy to resolve. Perhaps it signifies a valiant man, for so he was; or, he had waited on Moses from his youth: or, as Maimonides, this is the phrase of the Hebrew nation, who call all men young, till they begin to decay; as Joseph is called, when he was thirty years old, Gen. xlii. 9. More Nevuch. par. ii. cap. 32.

Ver. 12. Moses spake unto the Lord.] When, or where Moses spake what follows, we are not here informed. It is likely, that after he was satisfied the people were very penitent, he returned to the tabernacle; and there made this address unto the Divine Majesty, for a perfect reconciliation with his people.
send with me. Yet thou hast said, I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in my sight.

13 Now therefore, I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy sight, show me now thy way, that I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy sight: and consider that this nation is thy people.

14 And he said, My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest.

15 And he said unto him, If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence.

Ver. 13. If I have found grace in thy sight, &c. The interpretation of Maimonides (More Neveh, par. i. cap. 54) is too much strained, who thinks he here desires the knowledge of God's attributes, as, ver. 18, he desires the sight of his essence. The plain meaning of this prayer is, that God himself would conduct him, and show him the way wherein he should lead his people unto their rest in the land of Canaan (xxxii. 31).

I may find grace in thy sight. That I may be fully assured of thy gracious acceptance of me.

Consider that this nation is thy people. I do not beg this merely upon my own account, but for those who have been redeemed by thee out of the land of Egypt, and have engaged themselves to be thine by a solemn covenant (xxiv.), and now return unto thee by repentance (ver. 6).

Ver. 14. My presence shall go with thee. In the Hebrew, my face, i.e. myself, as the LXX. translate: my majesty, as the Chaldee. He promises, that is, to continue with them, as he had done hitherto, and not merely send an angel to accompany them; but to lead and guide them himself, by the pillar of this cloud, and his glorious presence in the tabernacle.

I will give thee rest. Some think these words are particularly spoken to Moses; and signify, that God would give him ease in this point, and quiet his spirit (which was now very solicitous about his departure from them) by returning to them. But as the foregoing words are a promise, that he would take the conduct of the people again; so is this, that he would not leave them till he had brought them to their rest.

Ver. 15. He said unto him, If thy presence go not with me. Some translate the words, for he (i.e. Moses) had said unto him, i.e. to God. If thy presence, &c. So that these words and the following are the reasons of God's answer to him, ver. 14. And if they be not thus taken, one would have expected Moses should rather have given God thanks for his gracious promise, than further pressed him to it. But the seventeenth verse doth not well agree with this; and therefore these words are to be looked on only as part of that sentence Moses said to God concerning his promise, that his presence should go with him. Which he acknowledged to be the greater favour, because otherwise he had rather never stir from the place where they now were.

Carry us not up hence. Let us go no further, if thou thyself dost not lead and guide us in our way.

Ver. 16. Wherein shall it be known here? How shall all the people round about us be convinced that we are not abandoned by thee in this wilderness? Is it not in that thou goest with us? Is not this the great demonstration of it, that thou leadest us in a pillar of cloud and fire, day and night?

So shall we be separated. This will distinguish us, while it continues with us, from all other people whatsoever; none of which have such a token of thy presence with them. The manner, indeed, continued all this time to descend for their sustenance, which was a miraculous food: but it might have been ascribed to other causes, if this glorious token of God's presence had not still appeared among them.

Ver. 17. I will do this thing also. Distinguish you from all other people; not only by leading you in a pillar of cloud and fire, but dwelling amongst you, as I designed, xxx. 8.

For thou hast found grace in my sight. He owns Moses still to be most acceptable and dear to him as he had been (ver. 12), and therefore, at his intercession, promises to be perfectly reconciled, and return to his people.

Ver. 18. I beseech thee. Having obtained so much favour of God, he presumes to ask something beyond all this, but with all humility.

Show me thy glory. In the Hebrew the word is horeni, make me to see thy glory. Where Maimonides takes the word seen to signify, apprehend with the understanding, not with the bodily eye (More Neveh, par. i. cap. 4). For by glory he there understands (cap. 54) the Divine essence, which he makes Moses to be desirous to apprehend; which is not likely such a man as he should think possible. For thus he explains himself in this book de Fundamentis Legis, cap. i. n. 10: Moses desired to know the truth of the Divine essence, as one man knows another, whose face he beholds, and his image is so engraven in his mind, that he is thereby distinguished from all other men: so he begs that the Divine essence might be distinct in his mind from all
CHAPTER XXXIII.

19. And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy upon whom I will shew mercy.

20. And he said, Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me, and live.

21. And the Lord said, Behold, there is a place by me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock: 22. And it shall come to pass, while my glory

I know none that hath explained this whole matter better than R. Jehudah, in Sepher Cosri, par. iv. sect. 3: "For the glory mentioned in the Scripture, there is one of such a nature, that the eyes of the prophets could sustain it: another all the Israelites saw (as the cloud and the consuming fire): but he is pure and bright to such a high degree, that no prophet is able to apprehend it: but if he venture to look upon it, his composition is dissolved, i. e., he dies." Such was the glory here spoken of, a splendor so great and piercing, that none could behold it.

For there shall no man see me, and live."

Accordingly we find, when the Sheechinah, or Divine glory, filled the tabernacle, Moses was not able to enter into it (xx. 33), that is, he could not, with safety to his life, look upon it. And so it was after the temple of Solomon was built and consecrated by solemn prayer to God, "The glory of the Lord filled the house, and the priests could not enter into the house, because the glory of the Lord had filled the Lord's house" (2 Chron. vii. 1, 2). From this speech to Moses, it is likely that men in future times imagined they should die immediately, when they saw only an angel appear in such a high glittering manner that it amazed them.

Ver. 21. Behold, there is a place by me. It doth not plainly appear by the present, from whence God spoke to Moses. It is most likely from the mount, where he had long conversed with him. Or, if it was from the tabernacle (where his glory appeared, ver. 9, and continued, ver. 11), that was not far from the mount; where he tells him, he would make his glory pass before him.

Stand upon a rock. It is probable, this was the rock in Horeb, where the Lord had formerly appeared to Moses (xvii. 6).

Ver. 22. Put thee in a clift of the rock. Perhaps it was in one of the clefts which was made in the rock, when God brought water out of it (Ps. lxxviii. 15), into which he directed Moses. For that is meant by putting him in the cleft; showing him the place where he should be, while the Divine Majesty passed by.

Will cover thee with my hand, &c. That he might not be hurt by the splendor of that glory, as it passed by the cleft. This doth not certainly signify, that the glory of the Lord appeared in a human shape: for hands are ascribed to God (in accommodation to us) when nothing is meant but this invisible power: which now covered him, that he might not be struck dead by the incomensurable brightness and force of those rays which came from the face of the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 23. I will take away mine hand. As soon as the face (as it is called, ver. 20) of the Divine Majesty was gone by him (which it was impossible for him to behold, and live), he promises to remove that cloud which covered him: so that he should look upon the hinder parts of his glory, though not upon the face.

Thou shalt see my back parts. In which the glory of the Divine Majesty shone in a lower degree of light; which was not so piercing, as to put out the eyes, and take away the life of the beholders; and yet there was such a resplendent brightness in it, that Moses's face shone when he came down from and neither of the Divine Majesty at that time. Some little particles of light remaining upon his face, and sticking to it (if I may so speak) from that exceeding great splendour which shone upon him, and passed before him, as he lay in the hollow place of the rock.

But my face shall not be seen.] My glory in its full lustre, without any veil before it, cannot be seen (see ver. 20). There are many other interpretations of this verse, as well as of the 18th and 19th. Maimonides, in his book de Fundam. Legis, cap. 1, n. 11, takes it thus: “God revealed that to Moses, which no man, either before or after him, ever knew: he making him to apprehend something of his very essence, whereby God was separated in his mind from all other beings; as a man discerns another man, when he sees his back parts, and by his mind discerns his proportions distinct from all other men.” But in his More Neveoh, par. i. cap. 21, he takes this discovery to Moses, to be the knowledge God gave him of his works and attributes, viz. those mentioned xxxiv. 6. And thus Gregor. Naizianzen (Orat. xxxiv. p. 559) expounds it, τοῦτον γὰρ καὶ ὡς ἐπεξεργάσθη, &c. “These things are the back parts of God which are after him; whereby he is known as the sun is by its image in the water, &c., upon which Elias Cretensis hath this ingenious gloss, “That the face of God signifies his essence before the beginning of the world, and his hinder parts, his creation and providence in the government of the world.” But Maimonides, in the same place now mentioned, acknowledges also, that this may be interpreted according to the Targum; that God made his majesty, that is, an exceeding bright representation of himself (though not in its fullest glory) to pass before him. Which Onkelos sometimes calls Ἰαβρα, Glory; sometimes Memra, the Word; and sometimes Shechinah, the Majesty. Which seems to be the most literal and meaning; that God himself, particularly the eternal Word, in a visible glory or majesty, appeared unto him in so much splendour as human nature was able to bear; but not in his unveiled brightness, which is, as the apostle speaks, inaccessible.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1 The tables are renewed. 5 The name of the LORD proclaimed. 8 Moses intreateth God to go with them. 10 God maketh a covenant with them, repeating certain duties of the first table. 26 Moses after forty days in the mount cometh down with the tables. 29 His face shineth, and he covereth it with a veil. 4 ¶ And he hewed two tables of stone like unto the first; and Moses rose up early in the morning, and went up unto mount Sinai, as the Lord had commanded him, and took in his hand the two tables of stone.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1.] Having obtained a promise of a pardon for the people, and of greater favour to himself, than had been hitherto shown him, God directs him here to dispose things for the performance of both. Hew thee two tables of stone, like unto the first: and I will write upon these tables the words that were in the first tables, which thou brakest. And be ready in the morning, and come up in the morning unto mount Sinai, and present thyself there to me in the top of the mount. And no man shall come up with thee, neither any man be seen throughout all the mount; neither let the flocks nor herds feed before that mount.

Took in his hand the two tables] These he carried with him; but the first tables were given him when he came there (xxiv. 12). They seem to have been thin, being no heavier than he could carry them in one hand.

Ver. 5. And the Lord] The Shechinah or Divine Majesty, called also the glory of the Lord.

Descended in the cloud] Wherein it had been won to appear from the beginning of their deliverance out of Egypt; and had lately appeared to Moses in the tabernacle (xxxii. 9), when the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door of it, while the Lord talked with Moses there. And it seems, when that was done, the glory of the Lord in the cloud went up again towards heaven, and now came down upon this occasion.

Stood with him there.] The cloudy pillar, wherein the glory of the Lord was, rested upon the top of the mount where Moses now was (ver. 2).

Proclaimed the name of the Lord.] Gave him notice of his presence, as he had promised (xxxiii. 19), and is more fully expressed in the next verse.

Ver. 6. The Lord passed by before him,] Which Onkelos translates, “the Lord made his majesty to pass before him.” Which exposition Maimonides acknowledges to be right; and confirmed by the Scripture itself, when it saith (xxxii. 25), “While my glory passed before thee in a pillar.” Usually the Divine name signifies not the Divine essence itself; but some created splendour, which no eye was able to behold. (More Nevoch, par. i. cap. 21.)

Proclaimed.] As the glory of the Lord passed by he heard a voice proclaiming this description of the Divine nature.

The Lord.] Some join the next word to this, as if the Lord himself, The Lord the Lord: the more to awaken his attention, to mind what he heard (see xxxiii. 19). And this name of his signifies his self-existence, and his absolute dominion over all creatures, which received their beginning from him (see vi. 3).

God.] The Hebrew word el signifies strong and mighty; in one word, his irresistible power (Job ix. 4).

Merciful.] The word raham signifies that which we call tender mercies; such parents have to their children, when their bowels yearn towards them.

Gracious.] We call that chananah (grace or favour), saith Maimonides, which we bestow upon any man to whom we owe nothing (Gen. xxxiii. 3, 11). And therefore God is here called chanun (gracious), with respect to those whom he created, preserves, and governs, but is not obliged by any rite to these things; as his words are, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 45.

Longsuffering.] So slow to anger, that he doth not presently punish those that offend him, but bears long with them.

Abundant in goodness] The Hebrew word chesed, which we translate goodness, signifies, as Maimonides saith (More Nevoch, par. iii.); the excess and highest degree of any thing whatsoever it be; but especially, the greatest benignity. And therefore, with the addition of rabb (abundant), denotes long continued kindness; as is more fully declared in the next verse.

Truth.] Most faithful and constant to his promises; which he steadfastly keeps throughout all generations. The sense of the whole seems to be, that this is the glory of the Divine Majesty: that he hath a sovereign dominion over all, because he is the fountain of being, the original of all things; most powerful to do what he pleaseth; and so merciful, that he delights to bestow his benefits unasked; and so gracious, as to continue them to the unthankful; bearing long with them, when they provoke him; multiplying favours on those who do not strive for performance his promises, though never so great; doing good unto a thousand generations of those who adhere faithfully to him, and do not apostatize from him: for he pardons innumerable offences, of all sorts, that are committed against his laws; and when the provocations are so great, that they are fit to be punished, he proceeds not to the uttermost severity, till there be no remedy; then he punishes idolaters terribly, to the third, and fourth generations.
of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation.

8 And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped.

9 And he said, If now I have found grace in thy sight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us; for it is a stiffnecked people; and pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for thine inheritance.

10 ¶ And he said, Behold, I make a covenant: before all thy people I will do marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation: and all the people among which thou art shall see the work of the Lord: for it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee.

11 Observe thou that which I command thee this day: behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Hivite, and the Jebusite.

12 Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest; lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee:

13 But ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves:

14 For thou shalt worship no other god: for the Lord, whose name is Jeovah, is one God.

Ver. 8. Moses made haste, and bowed his head] Being transported with joy at so glorious a sight, and such gracious words, he immediately worshipped God with the humblest reverence, acknowledging his great condescension to him.

Ver. 9. He said,] Which encouraged him to renew his request to God.

If now I have found grace in thy sight,] He doth not doubt of it; but the meaning rather is, since I have found grace, &c., as appears from what he granted him (xxxii. 17, 18, &c.).

Let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us] Upon the mention of the last property of the Divine Majesty ['visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, &c.'], Moses seems to have been afraid he might be provoked to proceed to such severity with the Israelites, who had lately apostatized from him: and again beseeches him he would be so gracious, that he would not remain so long absent from them, to continue his presence among them, which he had threatened to withdraw (xxxiii. 3).

It is a stiffnecked people:] If we adhere to this translation, the meaning is, they needed such a governor, by whose authority and presence they might be kept in awe, and cured of their perverseness. But the party of xxxiv. 7, which we here translate for, often signifies not: and again the very word is rendered here: and then the meaning is, Though they be very refractory (xxxii. 9), yet do not forsake them, and leave them to themselves; but still conduct them as thou hast done.

Pardon our iniquity and our sin.] Since thou art so ready to forgive (ver. 7), do not cut us off for our late offences; but still continue to own us for thy peculiar people. This Moses had begged of God before, and obtained a promise of it (xxxiii. 16, 17, and see xix. 5), and now he beseeches him, out of his goodness which he had proclaimed, to confirm that promise, and not to revoke it upon every new provocation.

Ver. 10. Behold, I make a covenant:] Herein God vouches the truth of what he had proclaimed; being so merciful and gracious, as not only to confirm his promise, but to turn it into a covenant, like that at the giving of his laws from Mount Sinai (xxiv. 3, 7, &c.), which he renews with them in the next verse: where he engages to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan before them; and then requires them to take care, not to imitate their idolatry.

Before all thy people I will do marvels, &c.] This seems to relate to all the wonderful works he intended to do, in their introduction into the land of Canaan, by making the waters of Jordan retire, and the walls of Jericho fall down; with the rest that followed, till they got possession of their inheritance.

For it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee:] Such as shall declare the almighty power of the De-
CHAPTER XXXIV.

the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God:

15 Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice;

16 And thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sons go a whoring after their gods.

17 Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.

18 ¶ The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, as I commanded thee, in the time of the month Abb: for in the month Abb thou camest out from Egypt.

19 All that openeth the matrix is mine; and every firstling among thy cattle, whether ox or sheep, that is male.

20 But the firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb: and if thou redeem him not, then shalt thou break his neck. All the first born of thy sons thou shalt redeem. And none shall appear before me empty.

21 ¶ Six days thou shalt work, but on the seventh day thou shalt rest: in eating time and in harvest thou shalt rest.

22 ¶ And thou shalt observe the feast of

One call thee," Invite thee (as the manner was) to the feast that was usually made, upon the sacrifices offered to their gods: as the Israelites ate of the peace-offerings, and invited their friends to partake with them.

Eat of his sacrifice:" By this we see how ancient and universal the custom was of feasting upon sacrifices: which Mr. Mede truly calls eupole federales, "federal feasts" (upon Malachi ii.). For the meat was God's, being set upon his table; of which he inviting the offerers to partake: they were his guests, whom he entertained at his table, in token of reconciliation and friendship with him. And therefore, whosoever ate of the sacrifices offered to other gods, professed themselves to be their worshippers and servants. Which made the Jews so cautious in this matter, that they would not so much as drink the wine, or the water, or use the salt of an idolater, not supposing that it had been set before an idol.

So R. Levi Barzelonita, in the explication of the 112th Precept. This explains that discourse of the apostle, 1 Cor. x. 20.

Ver. 16.] If they themselves married idolaters, there was the greater danger they might be content to let their sons and daughters marry with them; especially if they were rich or beautiful; and so the whole family be unclean.

Ver. 17. Molten gods," Images are called by the name of gods, because they were worshipped together with them, as symbols of their presence. And though molten be here only mentioned (upon occasion of their late sin, in worshipping the molten calf, xxxii. 4), yet all other images are intended, as appears by xx. 4, 23.

Ver. 18.] See all this explained, xi. 15, 16, &c., xii. 6, 7, xiii. 15.

Abib, &c.] See xiii. 4, xiv. 15.

None shall appear before me empty." See xiii. 15.

Ver. 21. Nine days thou shalt work; &c.] See xx. 2, xiii. 12, xxxi. 15, where this is sufficiently explained. But here, to show the necessity of forbearing labour on this day, they are not permitted it in caring or in harvest; that is, in the two most busy times of the year; when they ploughed and sowed their ground, and when they reaped the fruits thereof (see Gen. xiv. 6).

Ver. 22. Feast of weeks," This verse also hath been explained before, xxiii. 16. Only here observe, that the first-fruits of wheat-harvest being now offered at this feast, there was a harvest before this, which began at the passover, when they offered the first-fruits of barley harvest" (Deut. xvi. 9).

Ver. 23. Thrice in the year] This likewise was explained, xxiii. 14, 17. And nothing need be added, weeks, of the firstfruits of wheat harvest, and the feast of ingathering at the year's end.

23 ¶ Thrice in the year shall all your menchildren appear before the Lord God, the God of Israel.

24 For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the Lord thy God three times in the year.

25 Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with levain; neither shall the sacrifice of the feast of the passover be left unto the morning.

26 The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the Lord thy God. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk.

27 And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel.

28 And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.

29 ¶ And it came to pass, when Moses came down from mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses' hand, when he came down but that these peculiar laws are here repeated (together with those that follow, ver. 25, 26) upon this occasion, because they were ordained to preserve the people in the worship and service of the true God, from whom they had lately departed. Who therefore puts them in mind, in the last words of this verse (which was not said before), that he was the God of Israel, to whom they were devoted by especial obligations.

Ver. 21. I will cast out the nations. Till this was done, they were not bound to observe the precept, of appearing three times in the year before the Lord.

Enlarge thy borders.] Beyond the land of Canaan, as he had promised before (xxii. 31).

Neither shall any man desire thy land, &c.] To remove all fear out of their mind, that their neighbours might invade them, when all the men were gone, and neither women, men, and children, and old men left at home, he adds this promise to all he had made before (or rather makes it a part of his covenant which he now renewes), that he would lay such restrains upon their enemies, that they should not so much as think of invading them at those three feasts; much less make any actual incursions into their country.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leaven. At the passover. See this fully explained, xxxiii. 18.

Ver. 26. At Pentecost, which was the "feast of the first-fruits" (see xxii. 19.)

Thou shalt not seethe a kid. This concerns the other great feast, that of tabernacles (see in the same place).

Ver. 27. Having recited the principal part of his covenant mentioned ver. 10, he gives the following order.

Write thou these words.] From ver. 11 to this place: just as he did these words contained in the twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third chapters of this book (see xxiv. 4), out of which these words are extracted, as the chief things respecting the institution of God; which he requires him to write in a book by itself.

For after the tenor of these words.] See xxiv. 7, where the covenant, containing these words and many other, was sealed with the blood of a sacrifice.

The Jews are so blind as to find their oral tradition upon this place, and upon one small word (πίθ), which signifies, indeed, mouth; but withal is an explicative particle, denoting the manner and value of any thing, as appears from Gen. xlii. 7; Lev. xxvii. 18, and, therefore, here rightly translated the tenor of these words. Yet R. Johannes, in the very beginning of Halicholet Olam, gathers from hence that God made a covenant now with their fathers, concerning all the unwritten laws delivered by word of mouth. Unto which, while they adhere, they can never understand their Divine writings: for what can be more plain that the covenant here mentioned was ordered to be written?

Ver. 28. He was there with the Lord.] This, saith Maimonides was the highest degree of prophecy, which none attained but Moses: whose thoughts were wholly taken off from all other things, and fixed upon God, while he was with him in the holy mount; that is, asked and received answers from the Lord (More Nevoehein, par. iii. cap. 51).

Forty days and forty nights.] As he had been at the first (xxiv. 18). Which was partly to make a new trial, how they would behave themselves in his absence; and partly to give the greater authority to the laws, he brought them from God, which he renewed, as we read in the end of this verse.

He did neither eat bread nor drink water.] But was supported by influences from the Almighty, who kept in his spirit a just height, without the common recruit of meat and drink: which when they give us refreshment, likewise make us drowsy (see xxv. 18). To which end what Maimonides saith in the place now named, that the joy wherewith he was transported made him not think of eating and drinking: for his intellectual faculties were so strong, that all corporeal desire ceased.

It seems to me probable, that, during this time, he saw again the model of the tabernacle and all its furniture, with every thing else he was ordered to make when he went first into the mount, from the beginning of the twenty-fifth to the end of the thirteenth chapter, which are briefly summed up, xxxi. 7—11. He seems also to have spent much of this time in prayer to God for the people, that he would restore them entirely to his favour, and bring them to their inheritance (Deut. ix. 18, 19, 25, 26, x. 10).

He wrote upon the tables, &c.] That is, the Lord wrote (as he said he would, ver. 1), not Moses; who wrote the foregoing words in a book; but not these, which were written by the finger of God in the tables of stone. So Moses tells us expressly, Deut. x. 9. See I. Jacobus Capelles, and others, following the Hebrew doctors, imagine that Moses was three times with God in the mount for the space of forty days; and that this was the last time. Between which and the first they place another, which they fancy is mentioned, xxxii. 30, 31, compared with Deut. ix. 18, &c. But I see no solid ground for this; for God called him up into the mount but twice; and he durst not have adventured to go so near him, as he was both these times, without his invitation.

Ver. 29. When Moses came down.] Which was upon the twenty-fifth of our August, according to the former computation (ver. 9).

With the two tables.] So he came down at the first (xxvii. 12).

Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone]
There was a radiant splendour in his countenance; which is the import of the Hebrew kara'n, which the Vulgar translates horned. Not imagining that Moses had horns, but rays of light which imitated horns. And therefore the Hebrew word karna'tis signifies both; and R. Solomon Jarchi upon this place calls these rays on Moses's face, horna de magnificence, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. ii. de Jure N. et G. cap. 6, p. 292). It is not improbable that the hair of his head was interspersed with light, as well as that rays came from his face; which strained the eyes of beholders. And his hinders had done more reasonably, if instead of horns upon Moses's forehead, they had represented him with a glory crowning his head, as the saints are usually painted in the Roman church. Which perhaps came from the ancient custom among the heathen, who thus represented their gods, as Tho. Bartholinus observes (de Morbis Biblicis, cap. v.), out of Lucian de Dea Syria, where he saith they did \( \text{\textit{εἰς ἀνθρώπων ἀκραίας ἀκραίας}} \), "carry beams upon her head." Whence it was that the Roman emperors, who were raised so much above the rest of mankind, that they honoured them as a sort of deities, were thus represented; as appears by many testimonies, particularly Pliny, who, in his panegyric to Trajan, lauds and jeers at the radiatum Dominatii caput.

While he talked with him [vii.] While he conversed so familiarly with the Divine Majesty, and both saw his glory and heard him proclaim his name (ver. 5—7). At his first being in the mount, there was no such brightness left upon his countenance; for he did not see the Divine Majesty in so great a splendour as he did now, when the Lord, upon his petition, vouchsafed him such a sight of his glory as he could bear (xxxiii. 18, 23), which was so exceeding piercing, that it altered the very skin of Moses's face, and made it luminous; of which Moses doth not seem to have been sensible, till some time after he came down from the mount (when Aaron, as well as others, were afraid to come nigh him), having his thoughts wholly possessed with the far more transcendent glory of the Divine Majesty, of which he had a glimpse.

From this familiar conference which Moses had with God, it is likely the heathen took occasion to invent the like stories of their Zamoilics, who pretended to receive his laws from Vesta; and Minos and Lycurgus, who said they received theirs from Jupiter and Apollo; with several others mentioned by Dionysius, Lib. ii. A similar story may be heard from the god Jove; so they pronounced the name Jehovah. But they had no such testimony as this of their communication with the Divine Majesty; much less were their laws confirmed by such miracles as lasted for the space of forty years under the conduct of Moses, in the sight of all people.

Ver. 30. When Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, beholding the skin of his face shone, this highly established his authority, and bred in them a reverence to the laws he brought, that they were all witnesses of the brightness or glory of his countenance (as the apostle calls it, 2 Cor. iii. 7), which demonstrated he had been with God, as he affirmed, and had beheld the glory of his majesty, and received from him the tables of testimony. By all the children of Israel, in this verse, seems to be meant all the rulers of the congregation mentioned in the next.

Were afraid to come nigh him.] The light which shone from his countenance was so great, that it dazzled the eyes of beholders, even of Aaron himself, who did not know whether it would be safe to approach him. This was an illustrious testimony that he had been with God, who dwells, as the apostle speaks, in light inaccessable.

Ver. 31. Moses called unto them.] Invited them to come near him, and not to fear any hurt.

Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him.] viz. After he had put a veil upon his face, till which they could not steadfastly look upon it (as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. iii. 7), the light of it being so strong, that it hurt their eyes, if they fixed them there.

Moses talked with them.] Acquainted them with what he had seen and heard.

Ver. 32.] There was a general assembly of all the tribes summoned, that he might deliver to them all that which he had received from God (see xxxv. 1).

He gave them in commandment.] All the orders he had given about the building of the tabernacle, and the rest contained in the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth chapters, and those that follow to the thirty-second. For at his first coming from the mount, finding them in an apostasy from God, he said nothing to them about these matters; but, in abhorrence of their foul idolatry, broke the tables of testimony which God had given him to deliver to them.

Ver. 33.] This scene also belong as well to ver. 31, as to the 33d, and accordingly I have interpreted it. Though there are those who think he persuaded Aaron and the rulers to approach without a veil; but put it on when he spake to the people, who were less able to bear it. But there seems to be the same reason for both; Aaron being no less afraid than any of them; and the majesty of his countenance appeared sufficiently, even when it was veiled; for the brightness was not quite obscured, though very much shaded by it.

Ver. 34. He took the veil off, until he came out.] He went into the tabernacle, where he spake with him, face to face, as a man speaks to his friends (xxxiii. 9—11). He came out, and spake unto the children of Israel.] This seems to relate unto the frequent occasions Moses had to go and consult with God in difficult cases, whose mind he declared to them when he had received it.

Ver. 35. Skin of Moses's face shone, &c.] Some great men have thought that the brightness continued on Moses's face till his death; so that he spake to them with a veil on his face, from this time, as long as he lived: of which we cannot be certain; though thus much is evident, from this and the foregoing verse, that the splendour of his countenance did remain for some time after he came down from God's presence.
And the children of Israel saw the face of Moses, that the skin of Moses' face shone: and Moses put the vail upon his face again, until he went in to speak with him, and consecrated Aaron and his sons, and delivered all the laws he had received about the service of God, which are recorded in the book of Leviticus: that is, all the time they stayed near mount Sinai; from whence they removed a little more than half a year after this (Numb. x. 11, 12).

CHAPTER XXXV.

1 The sabbath. 4 The free gifts for the tabernacle. 20 The readiness of the people to offer. 30 Bezaleel and Aholiab are called to the work.

And Moses gathered all the congregation of the children of Israel together, and said unto them, These are the words which the Lord hath commanded, that ye should do them. 2 Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the Lord: whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death. 3 Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the sabbath day. 4 ¶ And Moses spake unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the Lord commanded, saying,

5 Take ye from among you an offering unto the Lord: whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it, an offering of the Lord; gold, and silver, and brass,

6 And blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair,

7 And rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins, and shittim wood,

8 And oil for the light, and spices for anointing oil, and for the sweet incense,

9 And onyx stones, and stones to be set for the ephod, and for the breastplate,

10 And every wise hearted among you shall come, and make all that the Lord hath commanded;

kindle a fire for any such purpose. For that is the rule they give in Haileoth Olam, cap. 2, that such particular prohibitions forbid the whole kind, i.e. all manner of work whatsoever; which is here mentioned, to show they might not kindle a fire for this work of the tabernacle.

Ver. 4.] See ver. 1. This is the thing which the Lord commanded.] Having secured the observation of the Sabbath, according to the direction given just before he came down from the mount the first time (xxxii. 13—15), he now relates to them what commands he received from God, concerning all that follows.

Ver. 5. Take ye from among you an offering unto the Lord.] And first he makes a motion to them from the Lord, that they would make a free oblation of material for the building of the tabernacle, and all other things which the Lord commanded to be made (ver. 10, &c.). Take ye, is as much as bring ye, and so we translate it xxv. 2 (see there). Where it appears that this was the very first thing God said to him (concerning a voluntary offering, which was the foundation of all the rest), and therefore is first propounded to the people by him.

Whosoever is of a willing heart, &c.] See xxv. 9.

Ver. 6—9.] All these have been explained in the twenty-fifth chapter, ver. 3—5, &c.

Ver. 10. Every wise hearted among you.] Every skilful person in the art of making the things following. The same is said of the women, ver. 25. The Hebrew word chooknah, which we translate wisdom, is used variously, as Maimonides observes; sometimes for the understanding of Divine things; sometimes for moral virtue; and sometimes for skill in any art (of which he alleges this place as an instance), and sometimes for craft and subtility (see More Neocho, par. iii. cap. 54). The word leb (or h. art), is used here according to the vulgar opinion of...
11 The tabernacle, his tent, and his covering, his taches, and his boards, his bars, his pillars, and his sockets,

12 The ark, and the staves thereof, with the mercy seat, and the vail of the covering,

13 The table, and his staves, and all his vessels, and the shewbread,

14 The candlestick also for the light, and his furniture, and his lamps, with the oil for the light,

15 And the incense altar, and his staves, and the anointing oil, and the sweet incense, and the hanging for the door at the entering in of the tabernacle.

16 The altar of burnt offering, with his brazen grate, his grates, and all his vessels, the laver and his foot,

17 The hangings of the court, his pillars, and their sockets, and the hanging for the door of the court,

18 The pins of the tabernacle, and the pins of the court, and their cords, 19 The cloths of service, to do service in the holy place, the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments of his sons, to minister in the priest's office.

20 And all the congregation of the children of Israel departed from the presence of Moses.

21 And they came, every one whose heart stirred him up, and every one whom his spirit made willing, and they brought the Lord's offering to the work of the tabernacle of the congregation, and for all his service, and for the holy garments.

22 And they came, both men and women, as many as were willing hearted, and brought brace-

Ver. 19. Cloths of service, &c.] Of which there is an account in the whole twenty-eighth chapter. And Moses here makes this large enumeration of all the things which God had commanded (ver. 10), that they might be stirred up to be more liberal in their offering, when they saw how many things were to be done.

Ver. 20. All the congregation] Whom he had summoned to meet together (ver. 1). Departed] When he had reported to them what orders he had received from the Divine Majesty in the mount (ver. 4, 5, &c.).

Ver. 21. They came.] Being dismissed to their own tents, they went thither only to fetch an offering to the Lord; which they came and brought immediately. Every one whose heart stirred him up.] Whose mind was raised to a free and cheerful readiness. The Hebrew words are, lifted him up; that is, had animam excelsum, "a noble mind," or was of a generous spirit; as the following words import, "Every one whom his spirit made willing.

Brought the Lord's offering.] An offering to the Lord, as Moses exhorted (ver. 5).

To the work of the tabernacle] For the building a sanctuary, wherein God might dwell among them (xxv. 8).

For all his service.] For all that belonged to the furniture of it, both within and without, which are mentioned in the verses beforegoing.

For the holy garments.] That the priests might minister there in their office (ver. 19).

Ver. 22. As many as were willing hearted.] Who seem to have been the greatest part of the congregation.

And brought bracelets, and earrings, and rings,] They were no less forward to offer to the service of God, than they had been to the making the golden calf (xxxi. 2, 3), for which offence they now make some sort of satisfaction; being more liberal in contributing to this work, than they were to that. For we read there only of their earrings, which they brake off from their ears and brought to Aaron; but here of their bracelets also, and rings, with other things. For though they may be supposed to have parted with a great deal, on that wicked account; it did not make those who were touched with what Moses said, less willing to give a fresh to a holy use.

Tablets.] The Hebrew word camoz, or camaz, is of very uncertain signification; for some make it an ornament of the arms, and others of some other part; but the Chaldee takes it for something about the
EXODUS.

23 And every man, with whom was found blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and red skins of rams, and badgers' skins, brought them.

24 Every one that did offer an offering of silver and brass brought the Lord's offering: and every man, with whom was found shittim wood for any work of the service, brought it.

25 And all the women that were wise hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen, and of goats' hair.

26 And all the women whose heart stirred them up in wisdom spun goats' hair.

27 And the rulers brought onyx stones, and breast; a fascia (sixth Elias) wherewith women tied up and compressed their breasts, to make them appear more beautiful, by being round. This Bochartus approves, in his Canon. lib. ii. cap. 5.

Offering of gold] The first oblations that were brought, either by the women or the men, were all of gold: and then followed manner things, which the people of lower condition brought to the Lord.

Ver. 23.] The common sort of people also offered such things as they had, yarn, and fine linen, goats' hair and skins (see ch. xxv. 5). Ver. 24.] Those of a middle condition offered silver, and brass, and shittim wood. All which were necessary for several uses: for the ark and the table were to be overlaid with gold; of which the candlesticks and several other things were to be made (see ch. xxv.). The inward curtains were to be made of the yar; and the outward of goats' hair, and the covering of both of skins. The foundations of the tabernacle were of silver; and the taches of the curtains and altar of burnt-offering of brass; and shittim-wood was used about the boards of the tabernacle, the ark, table, &c. (see ch. xxv. xxvi. xxvii.).

Ver. 25.] Not only the men, but the women also, brought materials for the house; and more than that, such among them as had both yarn and thread; which was the proper work of women, not men. Unto which work alone they were bound to apply themselves, if by the custom of the place no other work (such as knitting, and sewing with their needle, &c.) was usually performed by them, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. de Uxor. Hebr. cap. 10, where he treats of all the employments of their women.

Ver. 26.] And they that were minute and careful, and that had some skill in the art of spinning, made there good linen. And as they themselves were minute in their work, so were also their materials; for all that was brought in the name was either spun or woven, as appears not only out of the sacred books, but out of Homer, Plato, Cicero, and many other authors.

In wisdom spun goats' hair.] With great art spun goats' hair; which was not so easy as to spin wool and flax. For though their goats were shorn in those countries, as sheep are here (their hair being longer than ours), yet there was a great deal of skill required to work it into a thread, and to make stuff of it (see Bochart, Hierozoile, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51). In time also women were wont to weave as well as spin, as appears not only out of the sacred books, but out of Homer, Plato, Cicero, and many other authors, mentioned by Braunius, in his book de Vestiti Sacredi. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 17, where he observes, (N. 33) out of Herodotus, that he, showing the Egyptian customs to be different in many things from those of other nations, mentions this among the rest, that their men

31 And he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship;

32 And to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones to set and in working of wood, in all manner of cunning handwork.

33 ¶ And they brought gold

34 And spicke, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, and for the sweet incense.

35 The children of Israel brought a willing offering unto the Lord, every man and woman, that which they had willing to bring for all manner of work, which the Lord had commanded to be made by the hand of Moses.

36 ¶ And Moses said unto the children of Israel, See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah;

37 And he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship;

38 And to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones to set and in working of wood, in all manner of cunning handwork.

39 ¶ And they brought gold

40 And spicke, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, and for the sweet incense.

41 The children of Israel brought a willing offering unto the Lord, every man and woman, that which they had willing to bring for all manner of work, which the Lord had commanded to be made by the hand of Moses.

42 ¶ And Moses said unto the children of Israel, See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah;

43 And he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship;

44 And to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones to set and in working of wood, in all manner of cunning handwork.

45 ¶ And they brought gold

46 And spicke, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, and for the sweet incense.

47 The children of Israel brought a willing offering unto the Lord, every man and woman, that which they had willing to bring for all manner of work, which the Lord had commanded to be made by the hand of Moses.

48 ¶ And Moses said unto the children of Israel, See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah;

49 And he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship;

50 And to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones to set and in working of wood, in all manner of cunning handwork.
33. And in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work.

34. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he, and Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Instruct others in his arts. For this was a gift of God, as much as any of the rest, to be able to inform others dexterously, in those things which he knew himself: as it was, to be able to comprehend what Moses told him God had ordered, and put it in execution. For in the end of the next verse cunning works, is as much as ingenious inventions, devised with much art. Such were the engines made by king Uzziah, which are said to be invented by cunning workmen, or excellent engineers, as we now speak (1 Chron. xxvi. 15): see xxxi. 4, where this verse hath been explained.

Ver. 33. Cutting of stones, &c. See xxxi. 5.

Ver. 34. He hath put in his heart that he may teach. It is often observed, how much the Israelites were indebted to the wisdom of God, which enabled him to represent to Bezaleel what had been set before him; so it was by an extraordinary operation on his mind, that he conceived presently what was represented, and had skill to perform it according to direction.

Ver. 35. This is repeated so often, and such particular mention is here made again of their skill in every thing, though of ever so difficult contrivance, to assure the Israelites that they were so well qualified for the work, that they might be intrusted with the offerings they had made. And accordingly they were (xxvi. 3).

CHAPTER XXXVI.

1. The offerings are delivered to the workmen. 5. The liberality of the people is restrained. 8. The curtains of cherubins. 14. The curtains of goats' hair. 19. The covering of skins. 20. The boards with their sockets.

31. The bars. 35. The veil. 37. The hanging for the door.

1. Then wrought Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise hearted man, in whom the Lord put wisdom and understanding to know how to work all manner of work for the service of the sanctuary, according to all that the Lord had commanded.

2. And Moses called Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise hearted man, in whose heart the Lord had put wisdom, even every one whose heart stirred him up to come unto the work to do it:

3. And they received of Moses all the offering, which the children of Israel had brought for the work of the service of the sanctuary, to make it utritional. And they brought yet unto him free offerings every morning.

4. And all the wise men, that wrought all the work of the sanctuary, came every man from his work which they made:

5. And they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work which the Lord commanded to make.

6. And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing, the next verse) to the workmen, as soon as he received them.

Ver. 4. After they had continued some time at their work, they all agreed to desist a while, and go to Moses, to let him know that there needed no further offerings, for they had sufficient already; nay, more than enough, as it follows, ver. 5.

Ver. 5. A wonderful instance of integrity, that there should not be one man found among them (for the words in the Hebrew are very emphatical, isch, isek, [man, man], that is, none excepted) who was inclined to purloin any thing for his own proper use: but by common consent, they left their work, to put a stop to all further contributions. A sign they were men endued with extraordinary virtue, as well as skill in their employments.

Ver. 6. Moses gave commandment,] To those that attended on him; or perhaps to Bezaleel and Aholiab and the rest.

They caused it to be proclaimed?] By some under officers, who, it is likely, were wont to execute such commands.

Let neither man nor woman make any more work.] It seems some men prepared and made ready some of the things which they offered: as the women spun 2K
7 For the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much.
8 ¶ And every wise hearted man among them that wrought the work of the tabernacle made ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubims of cunning work made he them.
9 The length of one curtain was twenty and eight cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: the curtains were all of one size.
10 And he coupled the five curtains one unto another: and the other five curtains he coupled one unto another.
11 And he made loops of blue on the edge of one curtain from the selvedge in the coupling: likewise he made in the uttermost side of another curtain, in the coupling of the second.
12 Fifty loops made he in one curtain, and fifty loops made he in the edge of the curtain which was in the coupling of the second: the loops held one curtain to another.
13 And he made fifty taches of gold, and coupled the curtains one unto another with the taches: so it became one tabernacle.
14 ¶ And he made curtains of goats' hair for the tent over the tabernacle: eleven curtains he made them.
15 The length of one curtain was thirty cubits, and four cubits was the breadth of one curtain: the eleven curtains were of one size.
16 And he coupled five curtains by themselves, and six curtains by themselves.
17 And he made fifty loops upon the uttermost edge of the curtain in the coupling, and fifty loops made he upon the edge of the curtain which coupleth the second.
18 And he made fifty taches of brass to couple the tent together, that it might be one.
19 And he made a covering for the tent of rams' skins dyed red, and a covering of badgers' skins above that.
20 ¶ And he made boards for the tabernacle of shittim wood, standing up.
21 The length of a board was ten cubits, and the breadth of a one cubit and a half.
22 One board had two tenons, equally distant from another: thus did he make for all the boards of the tabernacle.

Ver. 14.] What is here meant by tent, see xxxv. 11.
Ver. 19. Covering for the tent] This curtain covered the tent, as the curtain of which the tent was made covered the tabernacle (see xxvi. 14, xxxv. 11).
23 And he made boards for the tabernacle; twenty boards for the south side southward:
24 And forty sockets of silver he made under the twenty boards; two sockets under one board for his two tenons, and two sockets under another board for his two tenons.
25 And for the other side of the tabernacle, which is toward the north corner, he made twenty boards, 26 And their forty sockets of silver; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board.
27 And for the sides of the tabernacle westward he made six boards.
28 And two boards made he for the corners of the tabernacle in the two sides.
29 And they were coupled beneath, and coupled together at the head thereof, to one ring: thus he did to both of them in both the corners.
30 And there were eight boards; and their sockets were sixteen sockets of silver, under every board two sockets.
31 ¶ And he made bars of shittim wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle,
32 And five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the tabernacle for the sides westward.
33 And he made the middle bar to shoot through the boards from the one end to the other.
34 And he overlaid the boards with gold, and made their rings of gold to be places for the bars, and overlaid the bars with gold.
35 ¶ And he made a vail of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen: with cherubims made he it of cunning work.
36 And he made thereunto four pillars of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold: their hooks were of gold: and he cast for them four sockets of silver.
37 ¶ And he made an hanging for the tabernacle door of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, of needlework;
38 And the five pillars of it with their hooks: and he overlaid their chapiters and their fillets with gold: but their five sockets were of brass.

Ver. 7.] There were materials of all sorts, for every thing that was to be made, beyond what was necessary.
Ver. 8.] They began first (as was but fit) with the house of God, before they made the furniture. For that was first ordered in general words (xxv. 8), though the structure of it be not directed till the twenty-sixth chapter. Where every thing mentioned in this is explained, and therefore there will need no more to be done here, but to point to a few things which are explained elsewhere, particularly in the foregoing chapter.
CHAPTER XXXVII.

1 And Bezaleel made the ark of shittim wood; two cubits and a half was the length of it, and a cubit and a half the breadth of it, and a cubit and a half the height of it:

2 And he overlaid it with pure gold within and without, and made a crown of gold to it round about.

3 And he cast for it four rings of gold, to be set by the four corners of it; even two rings upon the one side of it, and two rings upon the other side of it.

4 And he made staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold.

5 And he put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, to bear the ark.

6 ¶ And he made the mercy seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half was the length thereof, and one cubit and a half the breadth thereof.

7 And he made two cherubims of gold, beaten out of one piece made he them, on the two ends of the mercy seat;

8 One cherub on the end on this side, and another cherub on the other end on that side: out of the mercy seat made he the cherubims on the two ends thereof.

9 And the cherubims spread out their wings on high, and covered with their wings over the mercy seat, with their faces one to another; even to the mercy seatward were the faces of the cherubims.

10 ¶ And he made the table of shittim wood; two cubits was the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof:

11 And he overlaid it with pure gold, and made a crown of gold round about.

12 Also he made thereunto a border of an hand breadth round about; and made a crown of gold for the border thereof round about.

13 And he cast for it four rings of gold, and put the rings upon the four corners that were in the four feet thereof.

14 Over against the border were the rings, the places for the staves to bear the table.

15 And he made the staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold, to bear the table.

16 And he made the vessels which were upon the table, his dishes, and his spoons, and his bowls, and his covers to cover withal, of pure gold.

17 ¶ And he made the candlestick of pure gold: of beaten work made he the candlestick; his shaft, and his branch, his knobs, and his flowers, were of the same:

18 And six branches going out of the sides thereof; three branches of the candlestick out of the one side thereof, and three branches of the candlestick out of the other side thereof:

19 Three bowls made after the fashion of almonds in one branch, a knob and a flower; and three bowls made like almonds in another branch, a knob and a flower: so throughout the six branches going out of the candlestick.

20 And in the candlestick were four bowls made like almonds, his knobs, and his flowers:

21 And a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, according to the six branches going out of it.

22 Their knobs and their branches were of the same: all of it was one beaten work of pure gold.

23 And he made his seven lamps, and his snuffers, and his snuffdishes of pure gold.

24 Of a talent of pure gold made he it, and all the vessels thereof.

25 ¶ And he made the incense altar of shittim wood: the length of it was a cubit, and the breadth of it a cubit; it was foursquare; and foundation: for he is said to have made also every thing else in the tabernacle: the table, and all its vessels: in short, every thing mentioned in this chapter, and in the next also, and in the foregoing (ver. 10, 11, &c.). He therefore is said to have made the ark, &c., because he gave directions to the under workmen, and saw them make it.

Ver. 10. He made the table of shittim wood.] Next to the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubims which belong to it, the table and the vessels appertaining to it were the principal things within the tabernacle. See xxv. 23, &c. where all the things mentioned between this verse and the seventeenth are explained.

Ver. 17. He made the candlestick.] The orders which Moses received for the making this, the branches and the lamps thereof, and every thing appertaining to it, are set down xxv. 31, 32, &c. which Bezaleel exactly followed.

Ver. 35.] This, and all that follows in the three next verses, see explained, xxx. 1, &c.
two cubits was the height of it; the horns thereof were of the same.

26 And he overlaid it with pure gold, both the top thereof and the sides thereof round about, and the horns of it: also he made unto it a crown of gold round about.

27 And he made two rings of gold for it under the crown thereof, by the two corners of it, upon the two sides thereof, to be places for the staves to bear it withal.

28 And he made the staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold.

29 ¶ And he made the holy anointing oil, and the pure incense of sweet spices, according to the work of the apothecary.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

1 The altar of burnt offering. 8 The laver of brass.

1 And he made the altar of burnt offering of shittim wood: five cubits was the length thereof, and five cubits the breadth thereof; it was foursquare; and three cubits the height thereof.

2 And he made the horns thereof on the four corners of it; the horns thereof were of the same: and he overlaid it with brass.

3 And he made all the vessels of the altar, the pots, and the shovels, and the basons, and the fleshhooks, and the firepans: all the vessels thereof made he of brass.

4 And he made for the altar a brasen grate of network under the compass thereof beneath unto the midst of it.

5 And he cast four rings for the four ends of the grate of brass, to be places for the staves.

6 And he made the staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with brass.

7 And he put the staves into the rings on the sides of the altar, to bear it withal; he made the altar hollow with boards.

8 ¶ And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the lookingglasses of the women assembling, which assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

9 The court. 21 The sum of that the people offered.

9 ¶ And he made the court: on the south side southward the hangings of the court were of fine twined linen, an hundred cubits:

10 Their pillars were twenty, and their sockets twenty; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets were of silver.

11 And for the north side the hangings were an hundred cubits, their pillars were twenty, and their sockets of brass twenty; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver.

12 And for the west side were hangings of fifty cubits, their pillars ten, and their sockets ten; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver.

13 And for the east side eastward fifty cubits.

14 The hangings of the one side of the gate were fifteen cubits; their pillars three, and their sockets three.

15 And for the other side of the court gate, on this hand and that hand, were hangings of fifteen cubits; their pillars three, and their sockets three.

16 All the hangings of the court round about were of fine twined linen.

17 And the sockets for the pillars were of 9, xxxiv. 17). This shows the laver was made of the finest and most pure brass.

Of the women assembling.] The Hebrew word Haltszoboth signifies that they came by troops to make this present to the Lord. And the LXX. and Chaldee understanding it of such women as came together to serve God, by fasting and prayer (for there is the same word used in I Sam. ii. 22), most interpreters think, they that made this oblation were very devout women, who were wont to spend much time at the tabernacle, where the presence of God was. For Moses's tent served instead of the tabernacle of the congregation, and was so called, till this tabernacle was built (xxxviii. 7, &c.,). Thus Aben Ezra also observes, upon these words: that these women, making a free-will offering of the looking-glasses, where they were wont to behold the beauty of their faces, and to dress and adorn their heads, it seems to argue their very religious mind, despising the vanity of the world, and delighting far more in the service of God.

Ver. 9.] All that follows from this place to ver. 21, is explained in the twenty-seventh chapter, from ver. 9, to ver. 30, except two or three words, which I shall here take notice of.

Ver. 17. Chapters of silver.] There is no mention of rashim (chapters) in the twenty-seventh chap-brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver; and the overlaying of their chapiters of silver; and all the pillars of the court were filleted with silver.

18 And the hanging for the gate of the court was needlework, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen: and twenty cubits was the length, and the height in the breadth was five cubits, answerable to the hangings of the court.

19 And their pillars were four, and their sockets of brass four: their hooks of silver, and the overlaying of their chapiters and their fillets of silver.

20 And all the pins of the tabernacle, and of the court round about, were of brass.

21 ¶ This is the sum of the tabernacle, even of the tabernacle of testimony, as it was counted, according to the commandment of Moses, for the service of the Levites, by the hand of Ithamar, son to Aaron the priest.

... but only of vauim (or hooks) which were of silver, ver. 10, and 17. But this verse shows that those hooks were in the chapiters, or heads of the pillars, out of which those arose, as an ornament to them.

Ver. 18. The height in the breadth, &c.] This is a Hebrew phrase, signifying the height of the hanging itself: whose breadth, when it lay along, was called its height when it was hung up. And that was five cubits; proportional to the hangings of the court, which was five cubits high (xxxvii. 18).

Ver. 21. This is the sum of the tabernacle, &c.] Some will have this relate to the forenamed things, mentioned in this and in the foregoing chapters. But I take it rather to be a preamble to the account which Moses ordered to be taken of all the gold, silver, and brass that was employed in building of the tabernacle. Which being summed up, amounted to so many talents as are mentioned, ver. 24, &c.

For the service of the Levites,] Rather, by the ministry of the Levites; whom Moses appointed to take the account of all the expenses. By the hand of Ithamar,] Under the conduct of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron; whom he appointed to preside over the Levites, in taking this account.

Ver. 22. Bezaleel—made all that the Lord commanded Moses.] Which gold, silver, and brass was committed into the hands of Bezaleel (though in the presence of all the rest of the workmen, xxxvi. 2, 3), as the principal person, who was to see it employed in making every thing which the Lord commanded Moses.

Ver. 23. With him was Aholibah.] Unto whom God joined Aholibah as his associate in so great an undertaking: who made use of several others, whom they taught in those arts, which God, by an extraordinary inspiration, had made them to understand (xxxv. 30, 31, 34, 35).

Ver. 21. All the gold that was occupied.] About the ark, the table, the candlestick, and all belonging to them (xxxvii. 2, 11, 17, 24, 26), and about the holy garments mentioned xxxix. 5, &c. 15, 25, 30. What was not employed about this work (for the people brought more than enough, xxxvi. 5, 7), it is very probable was laid up in the treasury, for sacred uses, as there should be occasion.

Twenty and nine talents, and seven hundred and thirty shekels.] It hath been noted before, that a shekel is near half a crown of our money: now it is evident (from ver. 25, 26), that there were three thousand shekels in a talent; so that a talent of silver, as Dr. Cumberland, bishop of Peterborough, computes it (in his learned treatise of Scripture Weights and Measures, chap. 4), amounts to three hundred and fifty-three pounds, eleven shillings, and some odd pence, in our money. And a talent of gold (reckoning gold to be about fourteen times in value) to five thousand and seventy-six pounds, three shillings, and tenpence.

Ver. 25.] There being six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty men, that offered each of them half a shekel (as the next verse tells us), they make three hundred and one thousand, seven hundred and seventy-five thousand shekels. Which, amounting to a hundred talents, with one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five shekels more, demonstrates that a talent contains three thousand shekels. For no number (as the same learned bishop hath shown) but three thousand, dividing three hundred and one thousand, seven hundred and seventy-five, will produce a hundred, and leave one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five in remainder.

Ver. 26. A bekah for every man, that is, half a shekel, &c.] See xxx. 13. Some may possibly think it unaccountable, that so great treasures should be found among the Israelites in the desert; and especially that they should be furnished with such precious stones, as are mentioned in the next chapter, ver. 10, &c., as they were before, xxviii. 17, 18, &c. But such persons should consider, that their ancestors were very great men, and had gathered great riches, before they came into Egypt; where Joseph, it is likely, left them no small treasures: and though Pharaoh perhaps squeezed them (as I have shewn in the first), yet the remainder were not impoverished of their riches, and were reimbursed what they lost, by what they borrowed of the Egyptians. From whose dead bodies thrown on the sea-shore, we may well suppose they got still more; as they did also from the Amalekites, who being a people near to Arabia (from whence a great part of the precious stones came), we may likewise suppose were not unfurnished with them. And besides all this, they had shittim-wood good store in the wilderness (as I noted chapter xxv.); and some of the Jews, particularly Abarbinel, think it not improbable, that they traded with the neighbouring 27 And of the hundred talents of silver were cast the sockets of the sanctuary, and the sockets of the vail: an hundred sockets of the hundred talents, a talent for a socket.
28 And of the thousand seven hundred seventy and five shekels he made hooks for the pillars, and overlaid their chapiters, and filleted them.
29 And the brass of the offering was seventy talents, and two thousand and four hundred shekels.

30 And therewith he made the sockets to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the brasen altar, and the brasen grate for it, and all the vessels of the altar.
31 And the sockets of the court round about, and the sockets of the court gate, and all the pins of the tabernacle, and all the pins of the court round about.

Ver. 29.] This verse gives an account of the value of the brass, which the people offered; as the former verses of the gold and silver.
Ver. 30.] This verse and the next gives an account how the brass was employed, according to God's order before mentioned (xxvi. 37, xxvii. 2-4).
Ver. 31.] See xxvii. 10, 17-19. Here is not such a particular account given upon what things the gold was employed (but only in general, in all the work of the holy place, ver. 24), because all things that were not made of silver and brass were made of gold; and a great deal, it appears by the next chapters, was employed in making Aaron's glorious attire.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

1 The cloths of service and holy garments. 2 The ephod. 3 The breastplate. 4 The robe of the ephod.
27 The coats, mitre, and girdle of fine linen. 30 The plate of the holy crown. 32 All is viewed and approved by Moses.

1 And of the blue, and purple, and scarlet, they made cloths of service, to do service in the holy place, and made the holy garments for Aaron; as the Lord commanded Moses.
2 And he made the ephod of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen.
3 And they did beat the gold into thin plates, and cut it into wires, to work it in the blue, and in the purple, and in the scarlet, and in the fine linen, with cunning work.
4 They made shoulderpieces for it, to couple it together: by the two edges was it coupled together.
5 And the curious girdle of his ephod, that days they had not the art which we have now, of drawing a piece of gold into round wires or threads of what length we please; but, as Moses here describes it, they beat it first into broad thin plates, and then cut off lesser and narrower wires (as we call them), which were not round, but of a very small breadth; which they wove with the other materials here mentioned. But nothing is here said of silver thus wrought; for they had not the art of weaving silver in this manner, in ancient times, as Sibthorp observes upon Vopiscus, in the life of Aurelian; in whose days the art of making silver into threads, and weaving it with their garments, was not known; but was much in use in the time of the latter Greek emperors.
To work it in the blue, &c.] The manner of it was thus (as Maimonides saith): "They took one thread of wire of gold, and joined it with six threads of blue, and twisted all seven into one. And so they mingled the like thread of gold with six of purple; and another with six of scarlet; and another with six of fine linen; so that there were twenty-eight threads in all." Which R. Solomon Jarchi expresses thus upon xxxviii. 8. These five kinds (blue, purple, scarlet, fine linen, and gold) were twisted into one thread. For the gold being stretched into a thin place, and threads cut out of it, they wove a thread of gold (and so they did with the rest), after which they twisted all three threads into one (see Joh. Brannius de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. lib. I. cap. 17, n. 26).
CHAPTER XXXIX.

was upon it, was of the same, according to the work thereof; of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen; as the Lord commanded Moses.

6 ¶ And they wrought onyx stones inclosed inouches of gold, graven, as signets are graven, with the names of the children of Israel.

7 And he put them on the shoulders of the ephod, that they should be stones for a memorial to the children of Israel; as the Lord commanded Moses.

8 ¶ And he made the breastplate of cunning work, like the work of the ephod; of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. 9 It was foursquare; they made the breastplate double; a span was the length thereof, and a span the breadth thereof, being doubled.

10 And they set in it four rows of stones: the first row was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this was the first row.

11 And the second row, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond.

12 And the third row, a jasper, an agate, and an amethyst.

13 And the fourth row, a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper: they were inclosed inouches of gold in their inclosings.

14 And the stones were according to the names of the children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet, every one with his name, according to the twelve tribes. 15 And they made upon the breastplate chains at the ends, of wreathen work of pure gold.

16 And they made twoouches of gold, and two gold rings; and put the rings in the two ends of the breastplate.

17 And they put the two wreatheanchains of gold in the two rings on the ends of the breastplate.

18 And the twowellsof the two wreatheanchains they fastened in the twoouches, and put them on the shoulderpieces of the ephod, before it.

19 And they made two rings of gold, and put them on the two ends of the breastplate, upon the border of it, which was on the side of the ephod inward.

20 And they made two other golden rings, and put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the forepart of it, over against the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod.

21 And they did bind the breastplate by his rings unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it might be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breastplate might not be loosed from the ephod; as the Lord commanded Moses.

22 ¶ And he made the robe of the ephod of woven work, all of blue.

23 And there was an hole in the midst of the robe, as the hole of an habergeon, with a band round about the hole, that it should not rend.

24 And they made upon the hems of the robe pomegranates of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and twined linen.

25 And they made bells of pure gold, and put the bells between the pomegranates upon the hem of the robe, round about between the pomegranates;

26 A bell and a pomegranate, a bell and a pomegranate, round about the hem of the robe to minister in; as the Lord commanded Moses.

27 ¶ And they made coats of fine linen of woven work for Aaron, and for his sons.

28 And a mitre of fine linen, and goodly bonnets of fine linen, and linen breeches of fine twined linen.

29 And a girdle of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, of needlework; as the Lord commanded Moses.

30 ¶ And they made the plate of the holy crown of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing, like to the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD.
31 And they tied unto it a lace of blue, to fasten it on high upon the mitre; as the Lord commanded Moses.
32 ¶ Thus was all the work of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation finished: and the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses; so did they.
33 ¶ And they brought the tabernacle unto Moses, the tent, and all his furniture, his taches, his boards, his bars, and his pillars, and his sockets,
34 And the covering of rams’ skins dyed red, and the covering of badgers’ skins, and the vail of the covering,
35 The ark of the testimony, and the staves thereof, and the mercy seat,
36 The table, and all the vessels thereof, and the shewbread,
37 The pure candlestick, with the lamps thereof, even with the lamps to be set in order, and all the vessels thereof, and the oil for light,

Ver. 32. Thus was all the work—finished.] Every thing belonging to the house of God (which he commanded Moses to make) was completed exactly according to his directions; though they were not yet set in their place, which God orders in the next chapter.
Tabernacle of the tent, &c.] See xi. 2.
So did they.] This hath a more particular respect to the workmen; yet all the materials being brought by the body of the people, they are also comprehended in this expression.
Ver. 33.] In this and the following verse he makes a recapitulation of all the particulars mentioned in the foregoing chapter: which they brought to Moses, that they might see whether they were made according to his order. It is probable that the whole congregation, or the heads of them, accompanied Bezaleel and the other artificers, when they brought these things to Moses for his approbation.
Covering of rams’ skins, &c.] Of this covering, and of the next, see xxvi. 14, xxxvi. 19.
Vail of the covering.] See xxvi. 35.
Pure candlestick.] Of pure gold, as we read xxv. 31, xxxvii. 17.
Ver. 34. So the children of Israel made all the work.] Here again the whole body of the people are said to have made all the work forementioned (see ver. 37), because they contributed to it, and also helped to prepare some materials for the workmen (xxxv. 25, xxxvi. 6).

Ver. 43. Moses did look upon all the work.] Took a solemn view of it; and examined it carefully whether it was performed according to the order they had received.
Done it as the Lord had commanded.] This is the tenth time that Moses, in this one chapter, saith all was done as the Lord commanded; ver. 1, 5, 7, 21, 26, 29, 31, 32, 42; and here in this last verse; to show how exact they were in their obedience; and that nothing was done according to their own reason and opinion, but all according to the Divine precept, without addition or diminution. They are the words of the author of Sepher Cosri (par. iii. n. 23), who well observes, that all was done and brought to perfection by two things, which are the pillars of the law; the one is, that the law is from God; and the other, that it be accepted by the church with a faithful heart. And thus was the tabernacle ordered by the divine precept; and it was made by the whole church or congregation (xxv. 9).
Moses blessed them.] Both the workmen, who had done their work faithfully; and the children of Israel, who had contributed their materials, and also now, together with Bezaleel and the rest of the artificers, presented the whole to him.

CHAPTER XL.

1 The tabernacle is commanded to be reared, 9 and anointed. 13 Aaron and his sons to be sanctified. 16 Moses performeth all things accordingly.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 On the first day of the first month shalt thou set up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation.

CHAP. XL.

Ver. 1.] After he had taken a survey of all the work before mentioned, God gave him the following command, in the latter end (it is probable) of the twelfth month.
Ver. 2. First day of the first month] Of the second year after their coming out of Egypt (ver. 17), which was a complete year (within fourteen days) after that great deliverance.

38 And the golden altar, and the anointing oil, and the sweet incense, and the hanging for the tabernacle door,
39 The brazen altar, and his grate of brass, his staves, and all his vessels, the laver and his foot,
40 The hangings of the court, his pillars, and his sockets, and the hanging for the court gate, his cords, and his pins, and all the vessels of the service of the tabernacle, for the tent of the congregation,
41 The cloths of service to do service in the holy place, and the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and his sons’ garments, to minister in the priest’s office.
42 According to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel made all the work.
43 And Moses did look upon all the work, and, beheld, they had done it as the Lord had commanded, even so had they done it: and Moses blessed them.
CHAPTER XL.

3 And thou shalt put therein the ark of the testimony, and cover the ark with the vail.
4 And thou shalt bring in the table, and set in order the things that are to be set in order upon it; and thou shalt bring in the candlestick, and light the lamps thereof.
5 And thou shalt set the altar of gold for the incense before the ark of the testimony, and put the hanging of the door to the tabernacle.
6 And thou shalt set the altar of the burnt offering before the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation.
7 And thou shalt set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and shalt put water therein.
8 And thou shalt set up the court round about, and hang up the hanging at the court gate.
9 And thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein, and shalt hallow it, and all the vessels thereof: and it shall be holy.
10 And thou shalt anoint the altar of the burnt offering, and all his vessels, and sanctify the altar: and it shall be an altar most holy.

covered the inward (see ver. 17, 19, 29). Why it is called chel moed [the tent of the congregation] see xxix. 44.

Ver. 3. Put therein the ark of the testimony.] This was the principal end of building this house, that God (as was said before) might dwell among them; and his residence was over this ark. Which therefore is ordered, in the first place, to be brought into the holy of holies, prepared for it as soon as the house was erected. Why called the ark of the testimony, see xxvi. 29, 31.

Covered the ark with the vail.] Which hung before it; that nobody (not the priests themselves) might see it (xxv. 33).

Ver. 4. Bring in the table, &c.] When the ark was placed in the holiest of all, then the table, with all belonging unto it, and the candlestick (whose lamps were to be lighted) are ordered to be set in the sanctuary, which was divided by the veil from the other (xxvi. 35).

Ver. 5. Set the altar of gold.] See xxx. 6.

Put the hanging.] See xxxvi. 36, 37. This is ordered to be hung up, when the table, candlestick, and altar of incense, were put into the holy place, because there were no more things but these three to be there.

Ver. 6. In this and the two following verses, he is ordered to place the altar of burnt-offering, and the laver, as he had been before directed (xxx. 18), and to set up the outward court, and the hanging at the gate of it, in order to place the altar and the laver there (xxvii. 9, &c.).

Ver. 7. Anointing oil.] Mentioned xxx. 23, &c. Every thing being disposed in its proper place, now follows their consecration. For they were not consecrated separately, before the house was erected, and its furniture brought in: but after every thing was set in the order which God appointed.

Anoint the tabernacle, &c.] As was before directed, and now ordered to be put in execution, xxx. 26—29, where this and the two following verses are explained.

Ver. 12. Bring Aaron and his sons] The laver being sanctified (ver. 11), many think that the sanctification of Aaron and his sons (i.e. their separation to their office) began in their being washed with water. But I look upon this as a mistake, there being a washing prescribed before the laver was ordered (xxix. 4), where they were to wash only when they went in to minister (xxx. 19—21).

Ver. 13. Put upon the holy garments.] Mentioned in the twenty-eighth chapter.

Anoint him, &c.] See xxx. 30, 31.

Ver. 15. Anoint them.] See concerning this xxix. 7, where both their anointing and their father’s is explained.

For their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood, &c.] Not only consecrate them to the priest’s office as long as they live; but consecrate their posterity also, who shall need no other anointing in succeeding generations: but minister to God by virtue of that anointing, as long as that priesthood lasted. So the Hebrews interpret it. None of them needed in aftertimes, saith R. Levi ben Gersom (upon 1 Kings i.) to be anointed, but only the high-priest; whose successors were to be anointed, as they gather from Lev. vi. 22, “The priest of his sons, who shall be anointed in his stead,” &c. (see Selden de Succession, in Pontificat. lib. iii. cap. 9).

Ver. 16. Thus did Moses.] He took the same care in erecting the tabernacle, and disposing every thing in its place, that the workmen had done in making all things according to God’s mind (xxxix. 43).

Ver. 17, 18, &c.] This and the following verses, ver. 34, give an account of the execution of what God commanded in the foregoing part of this chapter.

But it is not easy to resolve, whether every thing was executed at the very time, or no. For full understanding of which, it will be necessary to mark diligently the order wherein God requires all the foregoing commands to be performed. And first he bids him set up the tabernacle, and put every thing belonging to it in its place, ver. 2, 3, and so forward to ver. 9. And next, to consecrate it, and all the vessels thereof, with the altar of burnt-offerings and its vessels, &c. (ver. 9—11). And then to proceed to 19 And he spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle, and put the covering of the tent above upon it; as the Lord commanded Moses.

20 ¶ And he took and put the testimony into the ark, and set the staves upon the ark, and put the mercy seat above upon the ark:

21 And he brought the ark into the tabernacle, and set up the vail of the covering, and covered the ark of the testimony; as the Lord commanded Moses.

22 ¶ And he put the table in the tent of the congregation, upon the side of the tabernacle northward, without the vail.

23 And he set the bread in order upon it before the Lord; as the Lord had commanded Moses.

24 ¶ And he put the candlestick in the tent of the congregation, over against the table, on the side of the tabernacle southward.

25 And he lighted the lamps before the Lord, as the Lord commanded Moses.

26 ¶ And he put the golden altar in the tent of the congregation before the vail:

27 And he burnt sweet incense thereon; as the Lord commanded Moses.

28 ¶ And he set up the hanging at the door of the tabernacle.

29 And he put the altar of burnt offering by

Ver. 19. Spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle.] The okeil, which we translate tent, sometimes signifies the whole house of God (see ver. 19), but here only the external part of it, which covered that which was properly called mishchan [the tabernacle]. Which Moses having erected with all its sockets, boards, bars, and pillars, ver. 18 (and hung it, we must suppose, with the inward hangings, which were the richest), he spread abroad over them the curtains of goats' hair, called the tent (xxvi. 11), to be a covering over the tabernacle (xxvi. 7, xxxvi. 14, 19). So it is tabernaculized, as is said in a horse, ensheathed with strong walls (as we call them) to secure it from the injury of the weather.

Put the covering.] Mentioned in xxvi. 14.

Ver. 20. He took and put the testimony into the ark.] The two tables of stone, as he had been commanded, xxv. 16, which he mentions again in the repetition of the law (Deut. x. 5). Hence the ark is called the ark of the covenant, or testimony, in the next verse, and ver. 3, of this chapter.

Ver. 21. He brought the ark into the tabernacle.] It is probable that he had placed the ark, after it was made, in his own tent, which, for the present, was called the tabernacle of the congregation, and had the glory of the Lord in it (xxxiii. 7, 9), but now he brought it into the tabernacle, which by God's order was prepared for it.

And set up the vail, &c.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 22. He put the table in the tent of the congregation.] Here the whole house is called the okeil (or tent), as I observed upon ver. 19. But immediately the word mishchan (which we translate tabernacle) is used, as the most proper expression for the inside of the house, as the other most properly denotes the outside of it. All is made more clear in the thirty-fourth verse; where we read that "the cloud covered the tent of the congregation," that is, the outside of the house; and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle within. Though afterward (ver. 38), the cloud is said to be upon the tabernacle, as (ver. 26) it is said to be over the tabernacle, because it was over the tent which covered it.

Ver. 26. He lighted the lamps before the Lord, &c.] In this, and all that follows, of burning sweet incense (ver. 27), offering the burnt-offering and meat-offering (ver. 29), Moses acted as a priest, appointed by an extraordinary commission from God, only for this time; that he might consecrate the house of God, and the priests that were to minister therein; which being done, his priesthood ceased. And he did all that is mentioned in these verses, when the tabernacle was consecrated, and the glory of the Lord had filled it; testifying the Divine presence to be there.

Ver. 31. Moses and Aaron and his sons washed their hands, &c.] This shows that Moses acted now the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation, and offered upon it the burnt-offering and the meat offering; as the LORD commanded Moses.

30 And he set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and put water there, to wash withal.

31 And Moses and Aaron and his sons washed their hands and feet thereat:

32 When they went into the tent of the congregation, and when they came near unto the altar, they washed; as the LORD commanded Moses.

33 And he reared up the court round about the tabernacle and the altar, and set up the hangings of the court gate. So Moses finished the work.

34 And a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle.

35 And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle.

36 And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Israel went onward in all their journeys:

37 But if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not till the day that it was taken up, as a priest, and therefore washed himself before he went to sacrifice at the altar, as the priests afterward were always bound to do (xxx. 19—21). But it must be understood, that neither this washing here spoken of, nor his offering sacrifice, mentioned ver. 28, was till some days after this (see ver. 17).

Ver. 33. So Moses finished the work.] And then anointed the tabernacle, and all contained in it, according to God's order (ver. 9—11). The execution of which, though now not here mentioned in so many words, is expressly said to be on the same day that he had completely set up the tabernacle (Numb. vi. 17).

Ver. 34. Then a cloud (or, then the cloud) covered the tent of the congregation.] After it was anointed and sanctified for the Divine residence (and the princes, perhaps, had also finished that large offering which we read, Numb. vii. was made on this day), God was pleased to fill this place with his glorious presence. For the cloudy pillar, which descended upon Moses's tent, and stood there before the door of it (xxxiii. 9), removed now from thence, and came hither; not standing at the door of it in the form of a pillar, but spreading itself all over the outside of the tabernacle, so that it was covered with it, as we read also Numb. ix. 15.

The glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle.] See ver. 33. God promised (xxv. 8—9) he now performed, notwithstanding their revolt from him, by worshipping the golden calf. Which made him withdraw himself from them (xxxiii. 7, &c.), till, upon Moses's earnest intercession for them, and their repentance, he graciously consented to return to them, and abide among them (ver. 14, 15, &c.). As he now did by settling his glorious presence in this tabernacle, which was set up in the midst of them. For, whereas the other tabernacle of Moses was removed a mile or two from their camp (xxxiii. 7), this tabernacle was pitched (a month after this, Numb. i. 1) in the midst of their camps, as we read, Numb. ii. 9, 17.

Ver. 35. Moses was not able to enter.] For the glory of the Lord shone so bright and so strong, beyond all that it had ever done, that no eye could look upon it. And it filled not only the most holy place, but the whole body of the tabernacle; so that he dared not venture to come within it till he was called (Lev. i. 1). After which time he seems to have had liberty to go in unto God when he pleased (Numb. vii. 89, ix. 8, 9). For after this great day, the glory of the Lord retired into the most holy place, within the veil; and resided constantly there, over the ark of the testimony: from whence he spake to Moses, when he came to consult him in the holy place (see the forementioned Numb. vii. 89).

Whence he is said "to dwell between the cherubims;" though, on some occasions, this glory appeared without upon the tabernacle (but over the ark, it is likely, Numb. xvi. 42). And so perhaps it did (xvi. 17, 35), and sometimes at the door of the tabernacle (Deut. xxxiii. 14, 15).

Because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle.] The cloud and the glory of the Lord were not two different things; but one and the same, as the pillar of cloud and of fire were. For outwardly it was a cloud, and inwardly a fire: and, accordingly, here the external part of it covered the tabernacle without; while the internal part shone in full glory within the house. Thus it was upon Mount Sinai, where Moses is said to "draw near to the thick darkness where God was" (xxx. 1), that is, the glory of the Lord was in that thick darkness. And so we read before, that the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud" (xvi. 10). And so those words are to be interpreted, xxiv. 16, "The glory of the Lord abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it (that is, covered the glory of the Lord, not the mount) six days." After which, on the seventh day, the glory of the Lord broke through it, and appeared like devouring fire, in sight of all the people (ver. 17).

Ver. 36. When the cloud was taken up, &c.] That is, the Lord (whose glorious presence was in the cloud) led and conducted them in all their removals. And therefore they are said to have "journeyed at the commandment of the Lord," because when the cloud (wherein the Lord was) was taken up, then they journeyed (Numb. ix. 17, 18, 20, 23).

Ver. 37. But if the cloud were not taken up, &c.] They were wholly governed by its motions, and followed its directions.

Ver. 38. The cloud of the Lord.] So it is called also in Numb. x. 34, because the glory of the Lord was in it.

Was upon the tabernacle by day.] And so it was by night, but then had another appearance, as it here follows.

And fire was on it by night.] The fire and the cloud (as I said, ver. 35) were not different things; but the same pillar which was dark by day, when there was no need of light, shone like fire by night, when the dark part of it could not be seen, to lead and conduct them. It appeared, therefore, like a cloud by day, and turned the light side to them (which was as bright as fire) by night, that they might march, if there were occasion, by its direction, both day and night. And thus it is described, xiii. 21, 22; Numb. ix. 15, 16, &c. And so this verse may be translated, "the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and the fire was [so] in it (i. e. in the cloud) by
THE THIRD BOOK OF MOSES,

CALLED

LEVITICUS.

The Greeks and Latins give it this name of Leviticus, not because it treats of the ministry of the Levites, properly so called (of which the book of Numbers gives a fuller account than this book doth), but because it contains the laws about the religion of the Jews, consisting principally in various sacrifices; the charge of which was committed to Aaron the Levite (as he is called Exod. iv. 14) and to his sons, who alone had the office of priesthood in the tribe of Levi: which the apostle therefore calls a Levitical priesthood, Heb. vii. 11.

CHAPTER I.

1 And the Lord called unto Moses, and spake unto him out of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying,

And spake unto him out of the tabernacle] Hitherto he had spoken to him out of heaven, or out of a cloud; but now out of his own house.

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man of you bring an offering unto the Lord, ye shall bring your offering supposed to have been done, as immediately after the consecration of the tabernacle, as soon as the glory of the Lord entered into it. And so I find Hesychius understood it, who, observing this book to begin with the word And, which is a conjunction used to join what follows with that which goes before, thence concludes, that the beginning of this book is knit to the conclusion of the last; and consequently, what is here related was spoken to Moses on the same day he had set up the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord filled it. When Moses might well think (as the Jerusalem Targum explains it), that if Mount Sinai was so exalted by the Divine presence there for a short space, that it was not safe for him to approach it, much less come up into it, till God commanded him; he had much more reason not to go into the tabernacle, which was sanctified to be God's dwelling-place for ever, till God called to him by a voice from his presence: nay, he durst not so much as come near the door, where I suppose he now stood, without a particular direction from the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] The tabernacle being erected, it was fit, in the next place, to appoint the service that should be performed in it: which consisted in such sacrifices as are here mentioned in the beginning of this book. There could not be a more natural order, in setting down the laws delivered by Moses, than this which is here observed.
fering of the cattle, even of the herd, and of the flock.

If any man of you bring, it is the observation of Kimchi, that in the very beginning of the laws about sacrifices, God doth not require them to offer any, but only supposest they would; having been long accustomed to it, as all the world then was. To this he applies the words of Jeremiah, vii. 21, and takes it for an indication that otherwise God would not have given so many laws concerning sacrifices, but only in compliance with the usage of the world; which could not then have been quite broken, without the hazard of a revolt from him. And therefore they are directed to the right object, the eternal God; and limited to such things as were most agreeable to human nature.

An offering unto the Lord. The Hebrew word korban, which we translate an offering, and the Greeks translate a gift, is larger than zebach, which we translate a sacrifice. For, as Abarbinel observes in his preface to this book, though every sacrifice was an offering, yet every offering was not a sacrifice. A sacrifice being an offering that was slain; but there were several offerings of mannish things (as those mentioned in the beginning of the second chapter of this book, which were not properly sacrificies; but were accepted of God as much as the offering of beasts, when they had nothing better to give. And therefore the same Abarbinel will have the name of korban to be given to these offerings, because they are offered to God. For it is derived from a word which signifies to draw near: from whence he thinks those words in Deuteronomy iv. 7: "What nation is there that hath God so nigh unto him?" &c.

It shall bring. He speaks in the plural number, say some of the Hebrew doctors (who have accurately considered these things), to show that two men might join together to offer one thing.

Your offering of the cattle. I do not know what ground Maimonides had to assert, in his More Nechochim (par. iii. cap. 40), that the heathen in those days had brute beasts in great veneration, and would not kill them (for it is no argument there was such a superstition in Moses’s time, because there were people in the days of Maimonides, as there are now, who were possessed with such opinions). But he thinks God insinuated, that they offered sacrifices to God, which the Jews to offer such beasts as are here mentioned; that what the heathen thought it a great sin to kill, might be offered to God, and thereby men’s sins be expiated. By this means, saith he, men’s evil opinions, which are the diseases and ulcers of the mind, were cured; as bodily diseases are by their contraries. Yet, in the thirty-second chapter of that book, he saith, God ordered sacrifices to be offered, that he might not wholly alter the customs of mankind, who built temples, and offered sacrifices everywhere; taking care (it may be added) at the same time, that they should be offered only to himself, at one certain place, and after such a manner as to preserve his people from all idolatrous rites: which if they had continued, he addeth, Xerxes in his book of Leviticus (as Procopius Gaezeus tells us some did) because it treated too much of sacrifices, they would not have thought it unworthy the Creator of the world; especially if they had looked further to the wisdom hidden under these things, which were examples, shadows, and patterns of heavenly things, as the apostle speaks (Heb. viii. i., ix. 13). And so was the tabernacle itself a figure (as we read, ver. 9) "for the time present, of a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands."
leviticus.

shall offer it of his own voluntary will at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord.

4 And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt offering; and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him.

5 And he shall kill the bullock before the Lord: and the priests, Aaron's sons, shall bring of the burnt offering: and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him.

6 And he shall kill the bullock before the Lord: and the priests, Aaron's sons, shall bring i. e. that he may find a favourable acceptance with God.

At the door of the tabernacle: Where the altar of burnt-offering was placed (Exod. xl. 6, 29). And this was so necessary, that it is required upon pain of death to bring the burnt-offering to no other place (xvii. 3, 4, &c.). For which cause, it is likely, the door of the tabernacle is here mentioned rather than the altar; that it might be understood to be unlawful to offer at any other altar, but that which stood at the door of the tabernacle.

Before the Lord: With their faces towards that holy place where the Divine Majesty dwelt: unto the sacrifice was brought, and at the door of the tabernacle received by the priest, from the hand of the offerer.

Ver. 4. He shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt offering: Both his hands; as some gather from xvi. 21, and (as Maimonides saith) he was to do it with all his might. This was a right belonging to peace-offerings, as well as to burnt-offerings (iii. 2), and to sin-offerings also (iv. 4). The meaning of which in this sort of offerings, seems to have been, that he who brought the sacrifice renounced all his interest in it, and transferred it wholly to God, unto whose service he entirely devoted it. It being like to the old ceremony among the Romans, who laid their hands on their servants when they gave them their liberty and absolved them of all right in them, saying, Hunc hominem liberum esse volo, "I will that this man be free;" which is called manumission. In other offerings it had another meaning, as I shall observe in due place: and it was imitated by the gentiles, though not without the addition of impious superstitious. For they writhed back the head of the beast upward, when they sacrificed to the gods above; and thrust down its head towards the ground, when they sacrificed to their infernal deities; as J. Brentius hath observed in his preface to this book.

It shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him: It shall be so acceptable, as to recommend him to the favour of the Divine Majesty. For so the Hebrew word expar seems to have signified, not properly to make reconciliation (which is the chief signification of a sin-offering), but to own him to be in a state of reconciliation with God: unto whom he was supposed to give up himself wholly, as he did this beast. The Jews, indeed, who stick to the literal signification of the word, fancy that these burnt-offerings expiated evil thoughts and desires: but there is no ground for this in Scripture; and the most that can be made of it is, that God accepted his prayers which he made in general, for the forgiveness of all his sins, when he laid his hand upon the head of this sacrifice. For it must be here observed, that laying on of hands was always accompanied with prayer, as appears by Jacob's laying them on the head of Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. xxviii. 14, 16, 20), and also by laying them on the scape-goat (xvi. 21, of this book). Insomuch, that laying on of hands signifies sometimes in the New Testament to pray (Matt. xix. 13; Mark v. 23), and other places. But if a man had committed any sin, there are other sacrifices peculiarly appointed by the law for their expiation; which he was bound to offer with confession of sin, and prayer to God for pardon.

Ver. 5. He shall kill the bullock: That is, the man himself who brought it, as Rashi interprets it: or one the blood, and sprinkle the blood round about upon the altar that is by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

6 And he shall flay the burnt offering, and cut it into his pieces.

7 And the sons of Aaron the priest shall put of the Levites, as others understand it: for they killed the paschal lamb at that great passover mentioned 2 Chron. xxx. 17, as Bochart observes. But he should have added the reason of it, which might be, that a great many of the congregation having not sanctified themselves (as we read in that place), therefore the Levites had the charge of the killing of the passover, for every one that was not clean, to sanctify them unto the Lord. Otherwise every man might kill his own passover (Exod. xii. 6), as they might do all their other sacrifices. For certain it is, this was none of the work of priests, as Malamodes shows in a passage mentioned by Dr. Cudworth (in his book concerning the Lord's supper, p. 27), out of Biath Ammaidkath: where he quotes this very place to prove, that "the killing of the holy things might lawfully be done by a stranger; yea, of the most holy things: whether they were the holy things of private persons, or of the whole congregation; the common objection to this is, that none might come into the court where the altar was but the priests. To which the answer is plain, that upon this occasion other persons might come so far within the court, because it was indispensably necessary that the man who brought the sacrifice should lay his hand upon the head of it; which was to be done at the altar where the work was to be performed.

Before the Lord.] See ver. 3. The priests—shall bring the blood.] Now begins the work of the priests: the receiving of the blood and that which immediately followed, belonging to their office. They received it in a basin (Exod. xxiv. 6), as the manner also was among the heathen; which our learned Dr. Bishop Holles observes upon Codex Ionaensis (p. 85), out of Homer's Odys. lib. iii., where Thrasymedes is represented as cutting the ox asunder with a cleaver; and Perseus as receiving the blood in a basin, which he calls μεταβλητός. A word used in Crete, as Eustathius notes, for such kind of vessels; which some think was originally αιβλητος, from the receiving of the blood.

Sprinkle the blood round about upon the altar, &c.] That this might be done readily, one priest received the blood, and another took it from him, and sprinkled it about the altar; or, as the Jews understand it, on every side of the altar; which they performed by two sprinklings, at the opposite corners of it. Which was a rite also used in peace-offerings and trespass-offerings: but in sin-offerings the blood was poured out at the foot of the altar (see vii. 9). Thus the heathen also themselves took care the blood of their sacrifices should not run upon the ground, but be received, as I said, in vessels prepared for that purpose; and then poured upon their altars, and so offered and consecrated to their gods. So Lucian, in his book of sacrifices, represents the priest, τα μαραγκονα τοιούτα παρα βαπτιστησαν, "as pouring the blood upon the altar" (See Dilherrus Disput. Philolog. tom. ii. p. 253).

Ver. 6. Flay the burnt offering.] Next followed the taking off the skin; which God ordered to be given to the priests (vii. 5). Though the heathen burnt skin and all, in some places, as Bochart observes out of several, or of the whole congregation (Hieroz. par. ii. lib. i. p. 321). But whereas he5k it was customary to flay the beast, is here not expressed. The Jews say it belonged not to the priests to do this, but to the man himself, who brought the beast to be offered. For (to show in brief what belonged to the owners of the sacrifices, and what to the priests) it may be fit to note out of Matthew, that each of them had five things to do. The owner of the sacrifice laid his hand upon it, killed, slayed, cut it up, and washed the inwards: and then the priest received the blood in a vessel; sprinkled the blood; put fire on the altar; ordered the wood on the fire; and ordered the pieces of the sacrifice upon the wood. And that the beast might more easily be slain, there were eight stone pillars (as the Jews tell us in Midrash, cap. 2), and beams laid over them; in each of which there were three iron hooks fixed; that the greatest beasts might hang upon the highest, the lesser upon the middlemost, and the least of all on the lowest; and so be more commodiously stripped of their skins. Concerning this exorcism both Homer and Virgil speak, as the aforesaid Dilherrus hath observed in the same book, p. 255.

Cut it into his pieces.] This followed the exorcism among the gentiles also, as the same author shows. And it was done with such accuracy, that Homer saith they dissected the sacrifice εἰς πάσαν μέρος καὶ παρὰ πάσαν μέρος; from whence some great men have thought St. Paul borrowed the word διφορετίας, to express the care the magi took upon the great work, in dividing rightly the word of truth (2 Tim. ii. 15). These pieces were not the same very in bulk and goats, that they were in sheep, as will appear afterward; and therefore the greater care was to be used in the cutting of them; especially when, besides those parts which were offered to God, the priests and the people were to have share also.

Ver. 7. The priest shall put fire upon the altar.] This, as I said before, was one of the works of the priests: who did not put fire daily upon the altar (for being once kindled, they were to keep it always burning, vi. 13); but stirred it up, and blew the coals. Which is meant by giving fire, as the phrase is in the Hebrew; that is, disposing it so that it might burn quicker. Yet, if the fire were taken off from the altar, as when they removed the camp (Numb. iv. 14), none might lay it on again but the priest. Or, if it were extinct, as it was in the days of Ahaz, who shut up the door of the house of God, which was not opened till Hezekiah reigned (2 Chron. xxxviii. 24, xxxix. 34), none but they might kindle it again.

Lay the wood in order upon the fire.] This the priests did every morning and every night, that the fire might be preserved from going out. And when the time of the morning and evening sacrifice came, they brought new wood, and laid it in such order upon the fire, that it might the better consume the parts of the sacrifice: that were laid thereon.

Ver. 8. The priests—shall lay the parts, the head, and the fat.] The Hebrew word pedereth not simply to signify the fat (for which they have another word, χελεβ), but that fat which is separated from the rest of the flesh. So it is to be understood here, and in iii. 9, iv. 35. Which being gathered together, and thrown into the fire, fed the flame, and made it burn more fiercely: by which means the other parts, into which the sacrifice was divided, were sooner consumed. Particularly, St. Jerome takes it for that fat which adhered to the liver: and in water: and the priest shall burn all on the altar, to be a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lorn.

10 ¶ And if his offering be of the flocks, namely, of the sheep, or of the goats, for a burnt sacrifice; he shall bring a male without blemish.

11 And he shall kill it on the side of the altar northward before the Lorn: and the priests, Aaron's sons, shall sprinkle his blood round about upon the altar.

12 And he shall cut it into his pieces, with both Solomon Jarchi and David Kimchi observe, that this pasheh was thrown upon the head of the sacrifice (when it was cast into the fire), just in the place where the head was cut off from the body; because, otherwise, the gore which issued from it might have extinguished the flame (see Exod. xxxi. 27).

In order upon the wood, &c.] That they might lie upon the wood, so as to have the same situation in the altar that they had in the beast when it was alive.

Solomon Maimonides in Maase Korban, cap. 6. Ver. 9. But his inwards and his legs shall he wash in water.] These parts were not to be burnt upon the altar; but they were thrown into clean water, being thrown in water. For which end there was a private room afterward, in the court of the temple (as now, it is likely, there was in the tabernacle), called the washing-room (as we find in Codex Middoth, cap. 5, sect. 2). There they having washed them privately, and freed the inwards from their filth, they brought them into the court, where there were two marble tables, between the pillars before mentioned (ver. 6), and there they were washed more exactly, as we read in the same book (cap. 3, sect. 5). Where Const. L'Empereur observes, out of R. Habadia, the reason why they used to lay the flesh upon such tables, was, because marble made it cold and stiff, and preserved it from sinking in very hot weather.

From whence this sacrifice is called isheh, an offering made by fire (from ish, which signifies fire), because it was altogether consumed in the fire; and no part of it left, so much as for the priests to eat of it.

Of a sweet savour unto the Lord. i. e. Most acceptable. For it is a form of speech taken from men, who are directed to offer a burnt-sacrifice which is to be acceptable unto the Lord.

Dr. Bliss. But none can reasonably imagine it was the mere sacrifice that was pleasing unto God, but, as Conrad, Pellicanus well notes, the devotion, faith, obedience, and sincerity of their minds who made the oblation.

Ver. 10. If his offering be of the flocks, namely, of the sheep, or of the goats, &c.] If a man be not able to bring a burnt-sacrifice (which could not be so well spared, being of great use in agriculture), he might bring one of these creatures, which were of less value; only perfect in their kind, as it here follows.

He shall bring it a male without blemish.] See Exod. xii. 5. What the blemishes were, that made any animal unfit for the altar, Moses tells us in this book, xxii. 22-24, where he mentions twelve, which shall be here considered.

Ver. 11. He shall kill it on the side of the altar northward] The greater sacrifices, which the Jews call the most holy things, had this peculiar place assigned them, where they were to be killed, viz. all the burnt-offerings (whether of bullocks, sheep, or goats), and all offerings for sin (vi. 25), and all trespass-offerings (vii. 3). But all the other sacrifices, which they call the lesser holy things (such as the peace-offerings of particular men, the paschah lamb, the first-born, and that which was tithed), might be killed in any part of the court, where the altar stood; there being no peculiar place appointed by the law for that purpose, but only at the entrance of the tabernacle. Yet a peace-offering for the whole congregation, was looked upon as belonging to the things most holy; and so was slain (as Maimonides tells us) at the north side of the altar: where there were certain rings fixed, to which the head, or, as some say, the feet of the bullock, was fixed, in order to its being killed. But they were not perfect rings, as L'Empereur observes, being rather half-segments of rings, one part of which was fastened to the pavement, and by the other the neck of the beast was tied to it (see Codex Middoth, cap. 3, sect. 5). The reason of this difference seems to be, only to make a distinction between these and other sacrifices. And all this is to be understood of the four-footed beasts here mentioned, not of birds; which were sacrificed after another manner, as appears from ver. 15.

Sprinkle his blood] See ver. 5, and vii. 2.

Ver. 12.] This verse hath been sufficiently explained, ver. 5, 6, 8.

Ver. 13.] See ver. 9, where this also is explained.

Rice is a burnt-sacrifice.] As much as to say, this is as acceptable to the Lord as the sacrifice of a bullock, when offered with a pious mind.
